MADRAS: Titters of amusement were raised in the auditorium when port workers presented the Union minister, Mr K.P. Unnikrishnan, with a momento that seemed to resemble his portly figure. But the minister himself set the embarrassed organisers at ease by saying the wooden idol reminded him of both his size and responsibilities. In his opening remarks at a function in the Madras port trust, Mr Unnikrishnan said very few people knew that the figure of a paunchy ascetic with raised hands depicted the Buddha and was understood to represent "wisdom" in some south-east Asian countries—The Times Of India (V. Balaji, Bhopal)

NEW DELHI: Cashing in on the popularity of the TV serial 'The Sword Of Tipu Sultan', three enterprising persons started minting coins of Tipu's era and of the erstwhile Mysore State but ultimately landed behind bars. Central District police yesterday claimed to have arrested three residents of East Delhi and recovered several hundred Indian and antique forged coins from them, besides implements and raw material used for minting the coins—The Hindustan Times (Prem C. Sinha, Patna)

OPERATION FLOOD

Wanted: a Cabinet secretary

No sooner had the V.P. Singh government officially resigned that a search was mounted for a new Cabinet secretary, it being generally recognised that Vinod Pande had to go.

The candidates of the 1955 batch are Shiromani Sharma, secretary, heavy industry and S.K. Mishra, secretary, agriculture. All other things being equal, Sharma has a disadvantage in that no influential politician is rooting for him. On the other hand, Mishra has the support of Devi Lal (he was the Tau's secretary for a brief while) and Mulayam Singh Yadav, who is said to be especially close to Sukhda Mishra, a minister in his Cabinet and the wife of SK.

But if Chandra Shekhar prefers to appoint someone from the 1956 batch, the job may either go to Varadarajan or to defence secretary Naresh Chandra. The latter has the edge because Varadarajan is due to retire shortly.

The dark horse in the race is the Gujarat chief secretary, H.K. Khan (former petroleum secretary), who, apparently, played an important role in getting Congress support for the beleaguered Chimanbhai government. The Gujarat chief minister is squarely behind him and the general feeling is that even if he misses out on the Cabinet secretaryship, he will make it to the Prime Minister's office in some other capacity.

Drama of the absurd

As the Tau walked up to take his oath, the scene had a touch of [illegible] about it. For, in a repeat of his earlier performance, Devi Lal insisted on taking the oath as up-pradhan mantri. And President Venkataraman, well-used to his ways by now, didn't attempt to put him right.

The Chaudhary's clan was out in full strength, with Ranjit Singh's son standing out in his red coat and bow tie. And, as indication of the changed equations in the Tau's camp, Chautala was conspicuous by his absence.

But one wrong 'un turned up, utterly unrepentant. And, almost as if to prove a point, Dr Sanjay Singh sat on the seat behind the Raja, who spent all his time pretending that he wasn't aware of his former protege's presence.

Dr Sanjay Singh: on the Raja's back

CHECK-LIST

The necks on the block

■ Montek Singh Ahluwalia: A particular bug-bear of Shekhar's. The former Young Turk has managed the difficult feat of travelling from the Sixties to the Nineties without letting any reason or logic come near his economic philosophy. So poor Ahluwalia, the most brilliant economist in government will go because the PM hates anyone who ever worked for the World Bank.

■ Vinod Pande: Three months ago, Chandra Shekhar condemned Pande's tendency to give political interviews (in a conversation with SUNDAY) and called him a 'fool'. The most politicised Cabinet secretary in memory is on extension and will be glad to resign. It turns out he isn't even a good astrologer: he told us V.P. Singh was safe till next March!

■ Bhure Lal: From obscurity to obscurity with a brief patch in the limelight. Lal was the Raja's hatchet man in his finance ministry days before being consigned to limbo. He emerged when VP became PM and now will return to obscurity. Has some goodwill though and people regard him as being basically straight-forward.

■ Rajendra Shekhar: There is pressure on the Prime Minister to fire the director of the CBI but if he does so, it will be a mistake. Shekhar is an upright, decent person who had no role to play in the fiasco of the V.P. Singh regime's Bofors inquiries. He professionalised the CBI after the scandal of Mohan Katre's tenure.

The Tau of agriculture

As far as the Devi Lal camp is concerned, nothing has changed. Even while the Chaudhary was out of power, his supporters insist, he was running the agricultural ministry from his Willingdon Crescent residence, what with farming on the back lawns and the selling of quality seeds outside.

Yes, Devi Lal will continue tending the prize

Devi Lal: conducting tours

Jersey cows he rears in his backyard. And if you're particularly good, the Tau will present you to them as a special, special treat.

Prime Minister of the people

With Chandra Shekhar taking over as Prime Minister, it's boom time for the shopkeepers of South Avenue Lane, especially those who have been catering to the needs of the bearded man from Ballia.

While Peter, his tailor, kept a short-sleeved jacket ready for Chandra Shekhar to wear during the swearing-in (yes, the Prime Minister did wear it for the all-important occasion), the leader's barber stationed himself on the steps of Rashtrapati Bhavan—resplendent in a formal suit—to watch the ceremony.

Well, at least, he had a better luck than Yashwant Sinha, Digvijay Singh and such other close associates of Shekhar, who were hard put to find a seat for themselves.

Holy cow!

As far as personal habits go, Mulayam Singh Yadav is quite an ascetic: no smoking or drinking for the UP chief minister. But the state exchequer bears witness to the fact that Yadav has his share of expensive idiosyncrasies.

For instance, Mulayam Singh finds it impossible to go through the day unless he starts off with a large tumbler of buttermilk and an hour-long body massage. The CM, therefore, keeps his cow tethered outside his Lucknow residence, while a masseur is kept on call every morning.

But what happens when Yadav travels to New Delhi for a couple of days, or more? How does Mulayam Singh manage without his buttermilk and massage?

Simple. He doesn't. After the day's work is over, the chief minister goes back to Lucknow in the state government plane. And flies back everyday after his early morning rituals are over.

The cost: Rs 27,000 every trip.

BAROMETER

All those who deserted the Raja

■ Sanjay Singh: Everyone who watched the evening news on TV wondered why Kamal Morarka suddenly looked so different. Only it wasn't Morarka sitting beside Chandra Shekhar at his daily press conference. It was Dr Sanjay Singh, protege and close relative of the Raja, who had switched loyalties at that late hour.

Not too late, though. For, he may yet manage to resurrect his flagging political fortunes with this realignment.

■ Subodh Kant Sahay: Was wooed out of the Shekhar camp by the wily V.P. Singh with a ministerial bait. The Raja even made Sahay de facto home minister of India, reducing the Mufti to a veritable cipher. But that wasn't enough to buy Sahay's loyalty; not for all time, anyway.

For, no sooner did VP begin to look like a loser than Sahay went right back into Shekhar's waiting arms.

■ Raj Mangal Pandey: Became a close associate of the Raja's during his days as UP chief minister. Some differences developed between the two men on principles when VP took over as Rajiv's finance minister. But that didn't prevent Pandey from walking out of the Congress behind Singh to join the Janata Dal.

Mandal and mandir later, Pandey began to have his doubts about the Raja. And after hectoring the unfortunate VP at a tea party, went over to the dissidents.

■ Bhakta Charan Das: Like Subodh Kant, began as a close associate of Chandra Shekhar's. But went over to the other side once he was promised a ministerial berth. As deputy minister in-charge of sports, Das became a close confidant of the Raja. But only as long as VP was in control.

As the Raja's future began to seem uncertain, however. Das was the first minister to put in his resignation.

Gallows humour, anyone?

The cheeriness most National Front ministers adopted on their last day in office, seemed, to most observers, to smack of false bravado. With a touch of gallows humour, to further enliven the sombre atmosphere.

As the Raja went through the routine of thanking the bureaucracy and other officials for all the help they had rendered him during his stint in government, George Fernandes chipped in with his two-bit worth. The only thing he would look back at in regret, he told the assembled gathering, was that he had failed to chop off Vinod Pande's chotti.

While all by-standers—including the Raja—tittered, the Cabinet secretary tried bravely to go along with the joke.

But despite his best efforts, didn't manage anything more than a weak smile.

Uncertain times

The cover story (Running out of tricks, 4—10 November) is an excellent analysis of the prevailing situation in the country. Ever since India gained Independence, the country has never had to undergo such a period of crisis. The problems have been exacerbated by the National Front government at the Centre.

As soon as the BJP withdrew support for V.P Singh, it was his moral duty to submit his resignation to the President. This was not the case.

It is high time the new government took steps to solve the problems confronting the nation.

Kali Charan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ V.P. Singh, the artful dodger of Indian politics, has finally run out of tricks. The Raja, who came to power with the promise of eradicating corruption and everything that was wrong in politics could not hold out any longer when Advani was arrested and the BJP withdrew support. VP, who seemed to be an expert at managing contradictions, had to bow out, rather disgracefully. For, as the saying goes, one cannot go on fooling all the people for all the time.

Amitava Sen, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ It seems that at last the wolf has been exposed and the cat is out of the bag. For, did not V.P. Singh know that the BJP was not secular when Advani has been declaring for the last few months that he would have a rath yatra? Did he not know that the Bofors issue which brought him to power had no substance in it?

A period of 11 months is enough to do something productive but it was not so for the National Front government. Hence its collapse. Let us hope that the next government will be more sensible in tackling sensitive issues. The country needs progress. Therefore, in all fairness, all those who supported V.P. Singh in his motion of confidence should be thrown out, as their only concern was to cling on to power at any cost. It is good that the V.P. Singh chapter is finally over.

U.S. Iyer, Bangalore (Karnataka)

■ The cover story was timely and forthright. The National Front government under V.P. Singh was full of uncertainties since its inception. As Prime Minister, V.P. Singh failed to solve the burning problems of the country. Moreover, he divided the nation along caste lines by implementing the Mandal Commission Report.

Therefore, with the collapse of the VP regime, one hopes that things will take a turn for the better.

Dipon Roy, Barrackpore (West Bengal)

V.P. Singh: leaving in disgrace

Dreams and despair

The article on V.P. Singh (The Hollow Man, 21—27 October) was inspiring. The close-up of this political personality reminds one of Shakespeare's view: if the hour reveals the man, it also remorselessly exposes the washout. India's development has taken a backseat after the advent of V.P. Singh. He has been accused of being bankrupt of ideas. The troubled situations in Assam and Punjab still exist. There are shortcomings in economic and foreign policy, yet he was not ready to step down.

Sanjay Kumar, Purnea (Bihar)

Postponing the polls

The outburst of Simranjeet Singh Mann regarding the extension of President's Rule in Punjab is surprising (Losing ground, 21—27 October).

Simranjeet Singh Mann: advocating elections

The previous National Front government had taken a timely step in the right direction considering the deterioration of the situation in Punjab. The allegation that the elections have been unnecessarily deferred in the state is totally unjustified. It is even more mortifying to note that neither Mann nor Badal has condemned the killings of innocents in Punjab by the terrorists. Mere elections is not the answer to the problems confronting the state: the government should strengthen security measures all over the state in order to safeguard the life and property of the people, which is the priority at the moment.

B. Nithyananda Rao, Tezpur (Assam)

■ The extension of President's Rule in Punjab betrays a lackadaisical attitude towards the people of Punjab. However, the calling off of Assembly elections cannot be faulted as the political climate is hardly conducive for holding polls.

Plans formulated by the government should be implemented instead of letting politicians gain mileage out of what is a national tragedy.

P. Sivaram Prasad, Kurnool (Andhra Pradesh)

Welsh exposure

In his column Khushwant Singh has said that the Scottish, Welsh and Irish languages have now become relics of the past (Scottish exposure, 21--27 October). That may be true for the other languages mentioned in the article but is certainly not true as far as Welsh is concerned. Welsh is still spoken in Wales and in the last 40 years or so the British educational policy has actively tried to promote the language. It is compulsory in all junior schools in Wales. The festival of Chairing the bard is held every alternate year at Bangor and Cardiff where Welsh poets are honoured. And, what's most heartening is that most Welsh people are bilingual.

Incidentally, Welsh patriotism is still very much alive. They have not forgotten that they are a conquered race. They are not Anglo-Saxons. The word Wealas (Welsh) means strangers or foreigners.

B.Ranganathan, Nachuni (Orissa)

A dancing wonder

Madhuri Dixit is truly a phenomenon (Ek, do, queen, 7—13 October). She has danced her way into the hearts of many.

Madhuri Dixit: a sensation

L.K. Advani addressing a BJP rally: breathing fire

The reason behind Madhuri's success seems to be her traditional good looks coupled with her vivacity and charm. She is like a whiff of fresh air, with the right blend of beauty, verve and histrionic abilities. And, she is too gorgeous and talented to be drawn into the numbers game with lesser mortals.

B. Venkat Ramaiah, Washington D.C. (USA)

Caste consciousness

My sincere gratitude to the writer for revealing my backward status (Checklist, 14--20 October). I was always under the illusion that just because my caste had produced two nobel laureates, one President, and scores of bureaucrats over the years, I belonged to a forward caste.

Now as a result of the Mandal report I might be forced to adopt my caste name two generations after it was dropped. I will have to rush and get a domicile certificate from my state (Andhra Pradesh). I will have to don my sacred thread and speak with a strange accent lest people think I am a fake OBC. What luck!

Rudra S.Aiyar, New Delhi

Danger signals

The write-up (BJP vs Rest of India, 28 October--3 November) points out that in this rhetorical battle, there will be two casualties: the Mandal report and V.P. Singh. It is unfortunate that the actions of the BJP have posed a threat to peace and communal harmony. What the country needs at present is a healing touch.

There should be cooperation and harmony amongst all Indians. Only then will the country prosper and meet its potential.

A. Jacob Sahayam, Thiruvananthapuram (Kerala)

Clarification

The story (Fight back, 4—10 November) contains certain discrepancies regarding the alleged consumer dispute pending before the Karnataka State Consumer Dispute Redressal Commission in Bangalore.

We would like to state that the complainant, R. Ramachandra, neither consulted his doctor, nor did any doctor certify that the chemical compound used in the PVC chappal was the cause of the white patches.

Upon receipt of his complaint in February 1987, it was Bata that arranged for a medical examination of Mr Ramachandra by a skin specialist in Bangalore, at Bata's cost.

Prima facie, the doctor diagnosed the complaint as 'vitiligo', commonly known as leucoderma, the cause of which is not normally PVC.

Mr Ramachandra was suitably advised in 1987 and was apparently satisfied. He has, however, chosen to file the complaint now for reasons best known to him.

Please note that since the complaint is sub judice before the Karnataka State Forum, we refrain from making any further comments.

Anita D. Gupta, senior executive, corporate affairs, Bata, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Calcutta survives

The book extract (The boxwallah's tales, 14--20 October) made for some engrossing reading. Calcutta is a city filled with sorrow. But in spite of this, there always exists a faint glimmer of hope. The Marxist chief minister celebrates the city's tercentenary by riding on a liveried tram, a typical symbol of colonialism. The Opposition lays siege to Writers', yet another symbol of Calcutta's colonial past.

Amidst the bustle, filth and squalor, Calcutta still survives. You can almost feel the anguish in the average Calcuttan and hear Dylan Thomas say," Time held me green and dying—though I sang in my chains like the sea."

Sense and nonsense about the Rajiv-Shekhar arrangement

One cannot be certain whether our recently-installed Prime Minister shares Henry Kissinger's conviction that power is the ultimate aphrodisiac (streets ahead of money and powdered rhinoceros horn), but presumably he would testify to its restorative qualities. Ever since he assumed office, Mr Chandra Shekhar is a changed man: confident, calm, relaxed, statesman-like. In short, he gives all the appearance of a chief executive who, at the very least, does not expect to be disturbed for four years.

A couple of days after he was sworn in, the PM took a day off work to seek the blessings of a former Prime Minister in Bombay who has had no say in national or Opposition politics for over a decade. Later, he visited his old haunt, Ritz Hotel, for tea and chit-chat with the staff before going on to Mani Bhavan for another sentimental journey. These can hardly be described as pressing engagements for the leader of a 58-member government struggling to retain control over his dwindling flock. However, such is Chandra Shekhar's sense of destiny that he does not seem greatly intimidated at the prospect of taking on a thankless and impossible job.

Doubtless, we are watching a 'performance' geared to raising party morale, but does it have any basis? Is the fulfilment of a life-long ambition an end in itself? Does Chandra Shekhar recognise that he is doomed from the very start and is he merely happy to enjoy whatever grace period the big white chief living in Janpath is prepared to grant him? Is being Prime Minister for 90 days better than not being Prime Minister at all?

Conversations with Janata Dal(S) MPs and Old Turk bhakts reveal that a game-plan for survival and consolidation does indeed exist, and it is this plan which is the source of the considerable optimism pervading the Chandra Shekhar camp these days. The first question, of course, is how much time has the new government got? Mr Gandhi is telling all and sundry with a straight face that he believes no fresh elections will be necessary before 1994. Alas, even by the current standards of double-speak poluting our polity, that is a clear lie. So, when does Rajiv do the dirty?

Estimates vary. Chandra Shekhar's men insist they have two years. That is the time Mr Gandhi needs to put the Congress house in order, have organisational elections, weed out a chief minister or two, gear up the party so that it is in some shape to fight a general election. For independent observers, this assessment is a make-believe. Whatever Rajiv Gandhi's blueprint for party reinvigoration, the pace of activity in the Congress will almost certainly be accelerated and there is no reason why Rajiv and his men should not be ready in six months to ditch the man they are so insistently pushing on to centre-stage currently. Assuming for the sake of argument that the new government is provided oxygen to last till late 1992, what is it going to do to stay out of mischief?

A great deal, it seems. Chandra Shekhar is convinced that presently he will demolish the Janata Dal and win over nearly all the 80-odd MPs still swearing allegiance to V.P. Singh. This process of weaning need not be dramatic, instead it will be slow and steady. Ajit Singh, naturally, is the crucial target. Happily, his loyalties are notoriously fickle and the expectation is that he should be in the Old Turk's pocket by early next year. Biju Patnaik may switch over earlier as will Laloo Prasad Yadav. The rest should stampede on the well-tested herd mentality principle.

Having gobbled up V.P. Singh, Chandra Shekhar will turn his attention to Rajiv Gandhi. Breaking the Congress, it is acknowledged, will be much tougher, but the Prime Minister's genius for intrigue and manipulation leaves even his own supporters in awe. "If Rajiv Gandhi thinks he can twist us around his little finger, he is Does Chandra Shekhar recognise that he is doomed from the very start and is he merely happy to enjoy the grace period that Rajiv Gandhi is prepared to grant him? Is being PM for 90 days better than not being PM at all?

sadly mistaken. He is a bachcha compared to Chandra Shekharji," said one beaming stalwart. It seems the MP from Ballia has many old and reliable friends in the party, friends with whom he has already established lines of communication. And most of the signals emerging from the other side are positive. Sharad Pawar, Chenna Reddy, Narasimha Rao, N D. Tewari, Buta Singh, Veerendra Patil, K.C. Pant, Madhavsinh Solanki, Jagannath Mishra, Sitaram Kesri are among the friends mentioned. The received wisdom in the party, then, is that a realignment of centrist Congress and non-Congress forces under the banner of Chandra Shekhar is on the cards in the not too distant future.

Breaking up the Congress and the Janata Dal are not going to be Chandra Shekhar's sole preoccupations. Simultaneously, he will perform at least one miracle, thereby demonstrating to the nation that he has other talents besides organisation wrecking. The Prime Minister's followers are unable to identify which precise miracle is in store for us, but it will be one of the three-- Kashmir or Punjab or Ram Janmabhoomi (Assam does not count as a miracle). The feeling is that if he can get a settlement in any of the three crises, he will to a large extent have neutralised the hostility he evokes in the urban intelligentsia and middle class. Interestingly, Mandal is not mentioned since a formula which involves calculated postponement has already been cleared with the Congress. While paying vigorous lip-service to quotas for backwards, a delaying mechanism (besides the Supreme Court) will be introduced to which all parties, with the possible exception of the Janata Dal, will give approval.

In the aforementioned crises, careful and elaborate emphasis is laid on the fact that Chandra Shekhar, unlike his predecessor, begins with one priceless asset: excellent personal relations with almost all the players in the disputes. Farooq Abdullah is his chum, so is Prakash Singh Badal, and don't forget, one is reminded, the Prime Minister was the only political leader of any stature to condemn Operation Bluestar outright. Syed Shahabuddin is his old buddy, while L.K. Advani and Atal Behari Vajpayee eat out of his hand. Witness his superhuman feat at the National Integration Council sub-committee meet in Delhi where he got Advani and Vajpayee to initial a resolution recommending acceptance of the judicial verdict in the Ram Janmabhoomi/ Babri Masjid dispute.

In Chandra Shekhar's process of winning over the 80-odd Janata Dal MPs, Ajit Singh is the crucial target. His loyalties are notoriously fickle and the expectation is that he should be in the Old Turk's pocket by early next year. Biju Patnaik may switch over earlier as will Laloo Yadav. The rest should stampede on the herd mentality principle

Guess what was the first thing Chandra Shekhar did after being sworn in? He rushed off to the house of Vijayaraje Scindia where, by prior arrangement, Ashok Singhal was ready and waiting. It seems a heart-to-heart talk ensued after which Mrs Scindia expressed astonished delight at the new incumbent's eagerness to solve the problem without scoring electoral points. And consider this crafty initiative. The PM heard that Bhairon Singh Shekhawat's mother had died in Jaipur. He immediately offered L.K. Advani a plane lift and used the flight time to assure the BJP leader that no vendetta would be conducted against his party or the VHP. Such small gestures apparently are the stuff personal diplomacy is made of, and they make enormous difference in arriving solutions to seemingly intractable problems. Politics, essentially, is about the human touch, and Chandra Shekhar, we are assured, has it in plenty.

I apologise if I seem sceptical and mocking. Doubtless, Chandra Shekhar's relationships assiduously developed over the years are significant. His personal rapport with Farooq, Advani and Badal is probably genuine. The question, however, cannot be avoided: will it make any difference? Dr Abdullah is so marginalised in Jammu and Kashmir and so hated by the Muslim population in the state that any special relationship with him could actually become an impediment to a solution. The same, to a lesser degree, is true of Badal. Furtive visits to Mrs Scindia's residence notwithstanding, will the Prime Minister be able to persuade Messrs Singhal and Katiyar to drop the relocation demand? I think it is both naive and simplistic on the part of Chandra Shekhar and his followers to assume that problems such as Punjab and Kashmir are amenable to solutions based on individual goodwill.

Even more inexplicable is Chandra Shekhar's faith in the word of Rajiv Gandhi. If by any extraordinary confluence of events, the Prime Minister starts to function with some measure of authority, if he seems to be on the verge of pulling off a 'victory' in Kashmir or Ayodhya, Mr Gandhi will swiftly find an excuse to withdraw support. The last thing the Congress is going to allow is a Chandra Shekhar success in any area of governance. He is a stop-gap, lame-duck premier and that is exactly the way Rajiv wants him. Similarly, if the Janata Dal(S) indulges in any overt wooing of Congress MPs and the response seems favourable, the party president will be wholly justified in terminating any existing arrangement of support in the Lok Sabha. Never in the political history of the world has such a small tail tried to wag such a big dog.

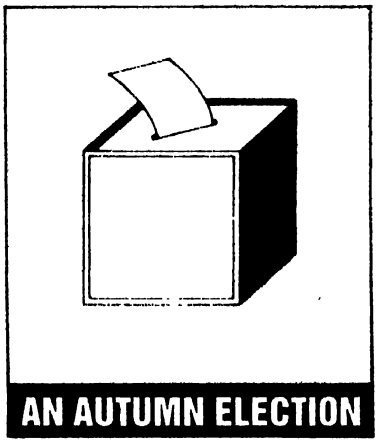
In one of his more successful films, Clint Eastwood mutters in disgust: "Why do I have to carry the shit end of the stick?" It is a question Mr Chandra Shekhar could well ask himself. •

THE OPTIONS

What next for the Janata Dal(S)-Congress(I) relationship?

There is an unwritten rule of Indian politics that the day a new government takes office, its supporters lose the ability to think clearly. Thus, in 1984, when the young and inexperienced Rajiv Gandhi was sworn in, his admirers predicted a Golden Age of micro-processed progress and claimed that he would rule forever. Last year, when V.P. Singh got the job, logic dictated that a minority government formed by a faction-ridden party, supported by two entirely different entities was, at best, engaged in a holding operation. The Raja's men thought otherwise, spoke of a full five-year term and predicted that V.P. Singh's popularity would force Rajiv onto an Alitalia plane bound for Torino.

Much the same sort of thing is happening to Chandra Shekhar's supporters. To hear them talk is to get the impression that their leader is here to stay. Some predict a full term. Others, who are even more ambitious, proclaim that he will boot out Rajiv and take over the Congress party! And even those with relatively modest aspirations talk of nothing less than three years followed by a merger with the Congress(I).



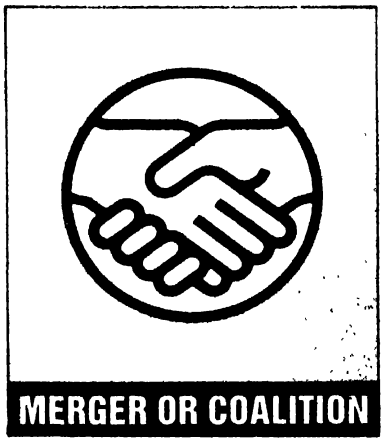
None of this makes much sense. Nevertheless, here's a guide to the scenarios envisaged by the fat cats of New Delhi.

TAKEOVER

Goodbye Rajiv! Hello Shekhar!

Late at night, after they've finished shouting, "Desh ka neta kaisa ho, Chandra Shekhar jaisa ho", this is the

THE SCENARIOS: WHAT COULD HAPPEN



AN AUTUMN ELECTION

Still the most likely scenario. The Congress backs Shekhar till the autumn-winter of 1991 and then goes for an election by mutual consent with electoral adjustments.

FOUR MORE YEARS

The Congress backs Shekhar till the next election is due: the winter of 1994. This scenario is offered only by the most credulous Chandra Shekhar groupies.

MERGER OR COALITION

The Congress decides to join the government in a year's time. Either it will be part of a coalition with the Janata Dal or the two parties will merge.

JAGDISH YADAV

scenario that keeps the Prime Minister's supporters dreaming into their pillows. It is their best case situation.

Briefly put, it runs along the following lines. Shekhar will be a great success as Prime Minister, will solve the fuel crisis, get the economy back on the rails and settle the Ayodhya dispute. At that stage, the Congress party, which has tired of Rajiv Gandhi's capricious and immature leadership, will suddenly realise that the Prime Minister is a terrific leader, fling bricks through the windows at 10 Janpath and run to Race Course Road (or South Avenue Lane) begging to either join the Janata Dal(S) or to be allowed the honour of having Shekhar as its leader. Rajiv will retain a few loyalists of course (P. Chidambaram, Mani Shankar Aiyar and V. George perhaps), but the bulk of the party will opt for Shekhar.

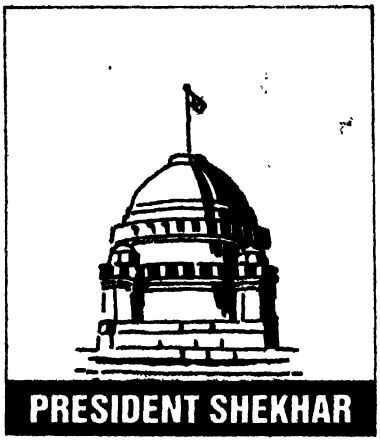
The only reason this absurd scenario is worth taking seriously is because so many people appear to subscribe to it. And now, opponents of a Shekhar-Rajiv alliance within the Congress party are also muttering darkly that Rajiv has signed his own death warrant.

In fact, there is simply no evidence to suggest that Shekhar will be a terribly successful Prime Minister. Most of the problems that confront him admit of no easy solution and besides, he has neither the experience nor the broad-based support required to pull off a dramatic coup.

Secondly, have Congress MPs tired of Rajiv's leadership? If they had, then they would have broken ranks and joined V.P. Singh last December when Rajiv's popularity was at its lowest ebb and Bofors was still a live issue. Nobody disputes that Rajiv can be capricious. But equally, Congressmen are gluttons for punishment. Thirdly, is Shekhar a bigger vote-catcher than Rajiv? From all accounts, he lacks a mass following in the Rajiv league. And moreover, he is a liability in the south—the area from from where most Congress MPs were elected.

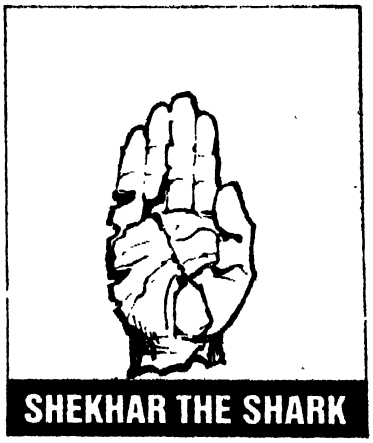
STAYING ON

Another four years together



This is only slightly less ridiculous than the takeover scenario. Its key assumptions are one, that Rajiv is reconciled to not returning to power till the next general election is properly due (1994) and two, that Congress MPs don't want power either. So the present state of affairs will endure. Perhaps more Janata Dal members will join Chandra Shekhar's faction, bringing its strength closer to a hundred, but the Congress will be happy to support the government from outside.

And why would the Congress want to keep Shekhar in office? Well, because it could not command a majority on its own. (True.) And if an election were held, it might lose seats to the BJP. So as it can't seize power and does not want to face an election, it will keep this government going.



PARTING OF WAYS

The Shekhar-Congress match comes unstuck after a few months. Both sides call each other names and an election is called.

PRESIDENT SHEKHAR

Rajiv waits till 1992, when a presidential election is due, before taking over as Prime Minister. Shekhar becomes President and the Congress joins the government.

SHEKHAR THE SHARK

A scare scenario. Shekhar proves to be so shrewd that he breaks the Congress as he broke the Dal and does to Rajiv what he did to V.P. Singh.

ALOKE MITRA

Rajiv Gandhi: how long before he calls the next elections?

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

L.K. Advani: waiting to make his move

The argument makes some sense over a six to eight month time-frame. But why on earth would Rajiv wait for four years before wanting an election? The BJP's popularity won't endure that long.

MERGER

Or a coalition will do

A slightly more credible scenario. This assumes that nobody in the Congress or the JD(S) wants elections. After all, they already have a majority together. So what would they gain by going to the people again?

At the same time, the present state of affairs in which the government is formed by a group of 60 MPs cannot possibly endure. So the JD(S) merges with the Congress and the two form the government together.

Or, if Chandra Shekhar is keen on preserving the identity of his Janata Dal, then the two parties enter into a coalition at the Centre and the Congress joins the government.

This scenario has a certain superficial plausibility, but there are too many practical problems:

- What would happen to Shekhar's Cabinet? If the Congress joins the government, then its more experienced members will have to take over the important ministries. Would Shekhar's existing ministers agree then to accept demotions? This seems improbable.
- At present, the JD(S) Parliamentary Party is a north Indian party, while the Congress Parliamentary Party is a south Indian party.

If the two merged, then the parliamentary party that would result would be hopelessly tilted. The Congress' north Indian leaders would be frozen out and their interests ignored.

- Who would be Prime Minister? Would Shekhar agree to step down and become Rajiv's deputy?

PRESIDENT SHEKHAR

A kick upstairs

Basically the same scenario as above, but with a new solution. The two parties wait till the summer of 1992 before entering into a merger/coalition. That is when President R. Venkataraman steps down. So, the Congress and the JD(S) put Chandra Shekhar forward as their candidate for the presidency.

As soon as Shekhar becomes President, Rajiv takes over as Prime Minister and the Congress enters the government.

This scenario solves the problem of what happens to Shekhar in the event of the merger, but does not get around the other difficulties.

GOODBYE FOREVER

A parting of ways

This scenario is one that both the JD(S) and the Congress insist will never come to pass, but over at V.P. Singh's version of the Janata Dal, it is regarded as a near certainty.

There are two scripts. The first casts Rajiv Gandhi as the villain who does to Shekhar what his mother did to Charan Singh. He waits a couple of months until he is sure that he has destroyed the Janata Dal—broken the central government, brought down the Bihar ministry and turned the Orissa and Gujarat chief ministers into his puppets.

Then, he pulls the plug on Shekhar and forces an election. At that stage, both Janata Dals will be in disarray and will not be able to organise themselves in time for the polls. Plus, there will be four-cornered fights in the Hindi belt (the two JDs, the BJP and the Congress), which will favour Rajiv and assist in his return to power.

The second script casts Shekhar as the villain. In this version, he is a treacherous man who is incapable of carrying anyone along with him and lacks the ability to run the government. After he has led India from chaos to anarchy and alienated the Congress(I), Rajiv will give up on him. And an election will result.

Both scripts are too lurid. Rajiv can't pull the plug on Shekhar without a valid reason. If he does, he will lose support in the country. Secondly, neither man is quite the villain these scripts make out.

But it is entirely possible that Shekhar and the Congress will not get on. Or that he will make such a mess of things that the Congress will no longer wish to be associated with him.

An election will then follow.

AUTUMN ELECTION

The likely scenario

Why has the Congress agreed to support Shekhar? Only the very naive believe that this is because Rajiv admires the new Prime Minister's sagacity or regards him as the best man for the job.

The Congress had a one-point programme: get rid of V.P. Singh. Partly, this was prompted by personal feelings -his betrayal of Rajiv. Partly, it had to do with the national interest--the Congress genuinely felt that he was leading the country to disaster. And partly, it was because of realpolitik--it made sense to finish off India's shrewdest politician.

Once it was clear that V.P. Singh would go, Rajiv had two options: elections or a new regime.

Of the two, elections were the least attractive. The Congress organisation is not ready. Rajiv's popularity is returning, but is far from its 1985 peak. Any poll held now would focus on the twin issues of Mandal and the masjid—and the Congress is at a disadvantage on both.

But if there was to be a new Prime Minister, then why not Rajiv? Again, there were reasons. At his age, Gandhi can afford to wait. Moreover, he has gained some mileage by refusing to take office without a mandate. Also, he has no solutions to the problems currently facing India.

So, it made sense to put Shekhar in the chair.

But by the autumn, the situation will have changed. Shekhar has no choice but to take unpleasant decisions on Mandal, Babri Masjid and the economy. Whatever he does, he will offend somebody.

By November 1991, the Prime Minister will have taken the flak, both Mandal and the masjid will have receded, the Congress will be better organised and Rajiv's popularity will have grown further (assuming current trends continue).

At that stage, if Rajiv asks Shekhar to call an election and enters into seat adjustments with the JD(S), he will probably get an overall majority and be comfortable for the next five years.

JAGDISH YADAV

Chandra Shekhar with V.P. Singh: will he do to Rajiv what he did to VP?

Alternatively, he can wait till the spring of 1992 before getting Shekhar to go to the country. Once the Congress returns to power, Rajiv will be Prime Minister again and that summer, Shekhar can become President.

This is still the most likely scenario: a year or so in office, followed by elections. All that has to be worked out is the timing of the election. Logic suggests that Rajiv will wait till after the monsoons and the festive season. And if things are going well, till the beginning of the following year.

But he has no reason to wait much longer. •

Shekhar and the media

No, they are not going to love the new Prime Minister

Prime minister Chandra Shekhar can never be a media favourite the way Rajiv Gandhi or V.P. Singh was. But he is not the type to worry over this unduly. Most newspapers also gave us some titbits about his wife, Dijya Devi, who had so far been ignored by the media.

She seems to be the traditional Hindu wife, somewhat on the lines of the wife of our first President, Rajendra Prasad. Orthodox, timid and not much educated, she is described as religious, regular with her pujas. She does not even remember when she got married to Chandra Shekhar.

In this context, what surprised me was the vicious news item in the Bombay-based The Independent, by one of its Delhi correspondent, Rashme Sehgal. On a voyage of discovery, Ms Sehgal crows about "allegations about Chandra Shekhar being a womaniser and, his mistress is stated to be an upcoming film maker who has bagged a contract to make Doordarshan documentaries". As if this were not enough, the report goes on to mention that Chandra Shekhar's wife is a "simple village woman who has a hunchback. For many years she was forced to live in the ancestral home until she forced herself into the South Avenue bungalow and refused to budge".

Why do sick minds ignore certain basic decencies even in journalism? And this in a paper with a four-figure circulation despite all kinds of intellectual pretensions. Twisted minds are worse than hunchbacks!

The left in India has always been a kind of joke, unable to adjust itself to the changing patterns in the world. All these days, I've been on the lookout for an intelligent analysis on the left support to the V.P. Singh's National Front.

Another Historic Mistake, an enlightened editorial which appeared in The Telegraph provides some interesting answers. In 1942, the Indian communists were not on the side of the nationalist forces. Soon after Independence, they mounted a violent campaign in Telengana, Andhra Pradesh. They ignored JP's famous declaration, "If RSS is fascist, I am a fascist."

In fact, the left's only consistency is its rigid anti-Congressism, right from the 1920s when it pledged to build an 'anti-imperialist front on the ruins of the Congress'. The editorial has a point that the 1989 Lok Sabha poll, exposed the hypocrisy even more. The communists' fight against the BJP was a sham; the real enemy was still the Congress.

This obstinate anti-Congressism has a point. It suits the left in Bengal and Kerala where the straight fight is between the communists and the Congress. There is another pertinent reason why the left would rather have a weak, vacillating government, like the one headed by V.P. Singh, at the Centre. Such a government, in its eagerness to remain in power, with the support of the left, would turn a blind eye to the happenings in the left-ruled states. Take West Bengal as an example during the tenure of the NF government. Not a murmur was heard in Delhi on the deteriorating law and order situation, at the distressing attacks on women, at the rigged elections to the Calcutta Corporation and the general air of violence during the frequent bandhs. As the state lurched from crisis to crisis, all that mattered to V.P. Singh was the support lent to him by Jyoti Basu from whichever part of the world he happened to be at the time of every fresh crisis.

A Congress government at the Centre would certainly react differently. Naturally, the left has thrown its lot with the Janata Dal, declaring V.P. Singh as the symbol of secularism, a man of principles and so on. It is a pity that the national media has not paid much attention to this intriguing alliance.

Cricket's cry-babies

The biggest cry-babies of recent times in sports are Martin Crowe's New Zealand cricketers, after their thrashing at the hands of Pakistan. And do you know why Pakistan won? Their players disfigured the balls all the time and the umpires would not intervene! Such an allegation was levelled when Pakistan did well in England in 1982 and was found to be baseless.

A report in The Independent mentions that Chandra Shekhar's wife, Dijya Devi, is a "simple village woman who has a hunchback". Why do sick minds ignore basic decencies?

After all, Pakistan are the acknowledged number two team in the world and New Zealand was just a club side. And yet, eagerly some of the Indian journalists, who obviously cannot stomach Pakistan doing well, turn accusers! Sunder Rajan in The Times of India, through some divine insight, finds substance in the Kiwis's charge. He quotes Madan Lal and Kapil Dev who expressed puzzlement at the Pak pace bowlers' ability to swing the ball for long periods. Bizarre theories are put forward. Caps of soft drink bottles and strong fingers are supposed to have been used to disfigure the ball. Imagine gentleman-cricketer Mudassar Nazar (he is supposed to have strong fingers) pressing the ball out of shape!

Some of our cricketers and cricket writers do not take kindly to Pakistan's pre-eminence in the world of cricket. So whenever Pakistan wins it is always because of local umpires or now 'disfigured balls'.

It is only a 'disfigured' imagination which can question such achievements. And do we want Bal Thackerays on the sports pages?

Gush-gush, gloat-gloat

If this column has not commented on Mani Shankar Aiyar's I Told You So (Sunday November 4-10), it's only because everytime I read this 'expose', I burst out laughing and am rendered incapable of work. I envy Mr Aiyar's clipping system or does he have a prodigious memory? I Told You So, is a devastating expose on the mysterious way our journalists work. There must have been quite a few red faces among the tribe after reading the piece.

Tavleen (Gush-Gush) Singh's retort in Indian Express is rather pathetic and is a poor cover-up on the total turnaround on the golden age of VP. That Mani Shankar Aiyar comes from Doon School and 'crows' in his latest column are irrelevant. He crows because there is so much to crow about. Calling people names like crooks and sycophants might help to let off some steam, but make no mistake, the 'weighty and gush-gush journalists' have a lot to explain. Is this how they have understood power politics despite their 'proximity' to power brokers and so-called 'enlightened judgement'?

As West Bengal lurched from crisis to crisis, all that mattered to V.P. Singh was the support lent to him by Jyoti Basu. It's a pity that the national media has not paid much attention to this intriguing alliance

Watch that caption

Caption writing is an art which the computers cannot teach journalists. Particularly for human-interest photographs. It's regrettable how careless our sub-editors are when writing captions for photographs. The photograph of a child with an empty plate in front of it carried the following caption in The Independent. "For this little child, it is a day like any other with its mandatory spadework for food, which means begging on the streets of south Bombay, oblivious to the celebrations of Children's Day all over the country to commemorate Jawaharlal Nehru's birthday." Gosh, what pomposity!

That Mani Shankar Aiyar comes from Doon School and 'crows' in his latest column are irrelevant. He crows because there is so much to crow about

And then there are captions which are plain wrong. The Hindustan Times' front-page photograph of Chandra Shekhar and L.K. Advani was captioned, "BJP President L.K. Advani called on Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar in New Delhi on Sunday." The accompanying news report, however, stated that the PM had called on L.K. Advani on that day •

Leaving London

It was a memorable stint for Kuldip Nayar at the India House

The main door of the Indian High Commission in London used to be tightly shut till six months back. Visitors had to convince suspicious securitymen that they were not carrying guns or ammunition and had no terrorist intentions. It took a journalist to open those doors and it will be one of the greatest legacies that Kuldip Nayar will leave behind him when he takes leave of the Indian mission.

RAJESH KUMAR

■ Nayar's 200 days as high commissioner to Britain saw not just a complete change in style at India House, it also brought the High Commission closer to the expatriate Indian community ■

Nayar's 200 days as high commissioner to Britain saw not just a complete change in style at India House, it also brought the High Commission closer to the expatriate Indian community. Small wonder then, that an Indian doctor in Harrow, who had never even met Kuldip Nayar, said she would be sorry to see him go. She had never felt the need to comment when other high commissioners had left.

"The one thing I will miss is the affection I have got here," Nayar told SUNDAY. "I have never felt so much warmth before." Nayar will return to India by the end of November and go straight back to his first love: journalism. "I will resume writing my columns and will also be working on a book based on my experiences here," he said.

The book is to be called India House and promises to be full of the most exciting details that never miss the Nayar eye. There is also to be a substantial section on the behind-the-scene negotiations that took place over the Gulf conflict.

So how did a confirmed anti-establishment journalist cope with being a representative of the government?

"Frankly, there were times when I wanted to say exactly what I felt, but then I stopped just short of it," said Nayar.

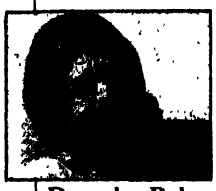
The Sabyasachi Mukharji case has been an eye-opener for Nayar. "I felt a public servant can be pilloried in Parliament without any basis. They can build up a campaign of falsehood against him and he can do nothing in his defence. And by the time the truth catches up, it is too late."

Nayar himself managed to do a few things that would shake the system at India House. His open door policy not only made him one of the most popular high commissioners in Britain, it also had its solid gains as well. The dramatic reduction in visa fees from £23 (short term) and £69 (multi-entry) to a flat rate of six pounds won him the hearts of a million non resident Indians who go back home every year either on business or to visit relatives. Passports were also made valid for ten years. The ominously long and thoroughly out-dated black-list of potential terrorists was immediately reduced by Nayar, and visas more freely given.

The high commissioner himself visited as many as 60 gurdwaras all over Britain and talked directly to Sikh leaders. "I found that apart from a fringe element which is militant and separatist, the majority of Sikhs are very attached to India and care for the integrity of the country. When I was visiting Leicester, the Sikh community raised £15,000 within hours for the relief of cyclone victims of Andhra Pradesh. I think it's a pointer to their feelings for India."

Apart from political achievements, Nayar will also make a singularly welcome contribution to the Indian archives because he plans to microfilm and transfer a large core of the records kept in the India House library here to India. The documents—which run into volumes about ten miles long—will be kept in the Teen Murti library.

Among his unfinished works will be the India Foundation which Nayar is launching in Britain, which will have members from both the Indian and British community. The foundation will have 11 trustees of which six will be elected. Membership rates being fixed at £50 a year, it will raise funds for the running of the India Cultural Centre at Mayfair, which should be opened by the year-end.



Nayar also plans to get 250 children from India every two months to live with Indian families in Britain and learn about British industry, banking and other sectors.

Hopefully, the projects will not disappear into dusty government files the moment Nayar leaves the mission. For the high commissioner himself, it's been a hectic 200 days, and he can have the satisfaction of knowing that he's managed to do the things he promised. About his short stint as India's envoy to Britain, he has no regrets: "If I compare what I would have done in these 200 days had I been in Delhi writing my column, and what I learnt here, I feel I'd still prefer this experience." ●

KHUSHWANT SINGH

Hunting the guru

In a recently published biography of Rajiv Gandhi, the author writes that Rajiv was persuaded by N.D. Tiwari to seek the blessings of Deoraha Baba three days before the foundation-stone of the Hindu temple was to be laid in Ayodhya. We are not told what transpired at the meeting but, undoubtedly, Rajiv received the Baba's blessings by having his forehead touched by the big toe of the holy man perched on a tree. However, we do know that Rajiv made no move to forbid the foundation-stone laying ceremony. The author goes on to state that home minister Buta Singh had suggested that Rajiv himself start the process of building the temple, a suggestion that Rajiv very wisely turned down.

We know that apart from N.D Tiwari, Balram Jakhar and Buta Singh were also devotees of the tree-top Baba: their photographs showing them bowing reverently to have their heads touched by the Baba's foot were published in many papers. It is significant that despite the blessings all three men lost at the polls that followed and Rajiv Gandhi had to step down from his prime ministership.

This kind of public display of reverence for holy men is a post-Pandit Nehru phenomenon. As long as he was alive, even his daughter Indira Gandhi did not dare to go paying homage to sadhus or praying in temples. She occasionally called on Anandmayee Ma but always explained away her visits as something she did to keep up the friendship that had existed between her mother and Anandmayee. But no sooner she became Prime Minister, sadhus, swamis, brahmacharis, tantrics, astrologers and their likes began to visit her residence. Havans and other kind of religious rites began to be performed regularly. It was evident that she felt insecure and sought assurance from these men and performed whatever rites they prescribed. At the same time, she felt that it would reduce her image as a forward-looking woman and stoutly denied having had anything to do with such people or carrying out their prescriptions. I had hoped that Rajiv Gandhi would not succumb to pressure from his superstition-ridden advisers, and like his grandfather, have nothing to do with these archaic practices. They don't fit a man who promises to lead us into the 21st century.

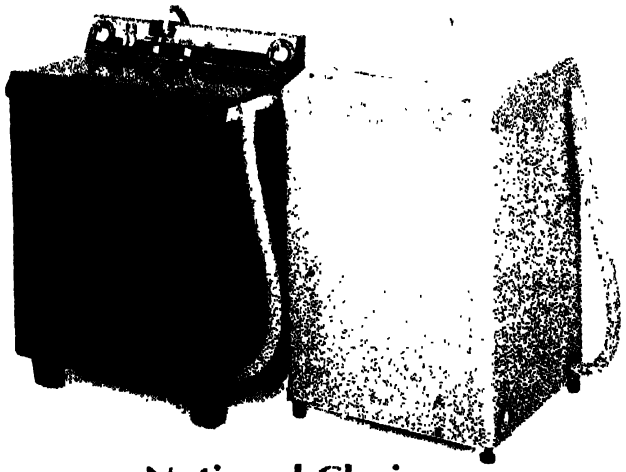
It continues to amaze me how men and women, otherwise with high intelligence quotients (eg, Nani Palkhivala, a disciple of Sahi Baba)continue to indulge in sadhu worship and believing in astrology. However futile the blessings they receive and however wrong the predictions made prove to be, nothing seems to shake their faith in the irrational.

I have had long associations with holy men,some of whom became quite friendly with me. Amongst those whose affection I enjoyed were Swami Muktananda of Ganeshpuri (guru of Nargis Dutt) and Shri Dattabal of Sholapur, who spent a long evening with me drinking my Scotch. I had great respect for Acharya Rajneesh as a scholar and read whatever I can of his writings. I continue to enjoy the affection of Dadaji and make it a point to call on him whenever he is in Delhi. However, none of this has shaken my agnosticism. My chief interest in them is to find out what their disciples get from them that eludes me.

I had great respect for Acharya Rajneesh as a scholar and read whatever I can of his writings. However, none of this has shaken my agnosticism. My chief interest in people like Rajneesh is to find out what the disciples get from them that eludes me

I have come to the conclusion that gurus and godmen are meant for people who are unsure of themselves, troubled in mind and faced with problems which they are unable to solve by their own efforts. I put all this down in my compilation Gurus, Godmen and Good People (Orient Longman). In this book, I had followers of Sahi Baba, Rajneesh, Anandmayee Ma, the Nirankari and the Radha Soami Gurus. Mahesh Yogi, Neelkantha Tathgata, Dattabal, Balyogeshwar, Prabhupada and Muktananda write of what their gurus meant to them. I added a chapter on Mother Teresa I had written for the New York Times.

Why gurus flourish in India more than in any other country has been explained by Peter Brent in his classic study of the subject Godmen of India (Penguin). He writes: "In the west we are free to work for the approval of those we love and respect. Not so in India...for Indians of the middle class, there are only two directions they can go to prove that they can love, and be loved. One is towards homosexuality, the other towards the guru—the two not being mutually exclusive."



According to Brent, Indians cultivate intimate relations with gurus because there are traditional inhibitions against mingling of sexes and the tyranny of fathers. The young Indian male may not indulge in love "or even look at girls of his own class, but can form the most passionate friendship and express it with caresses with his guru". Furthermore, the guru-disciple relationship "is in some ways an ideal version of that which should exist between father and son but does not". The guru, though the father figure, is the rescuer from the real father's dominance. "He is the father who has been chosen; in this way, the disciple remains free in his bondage, bound in his freedom." ●

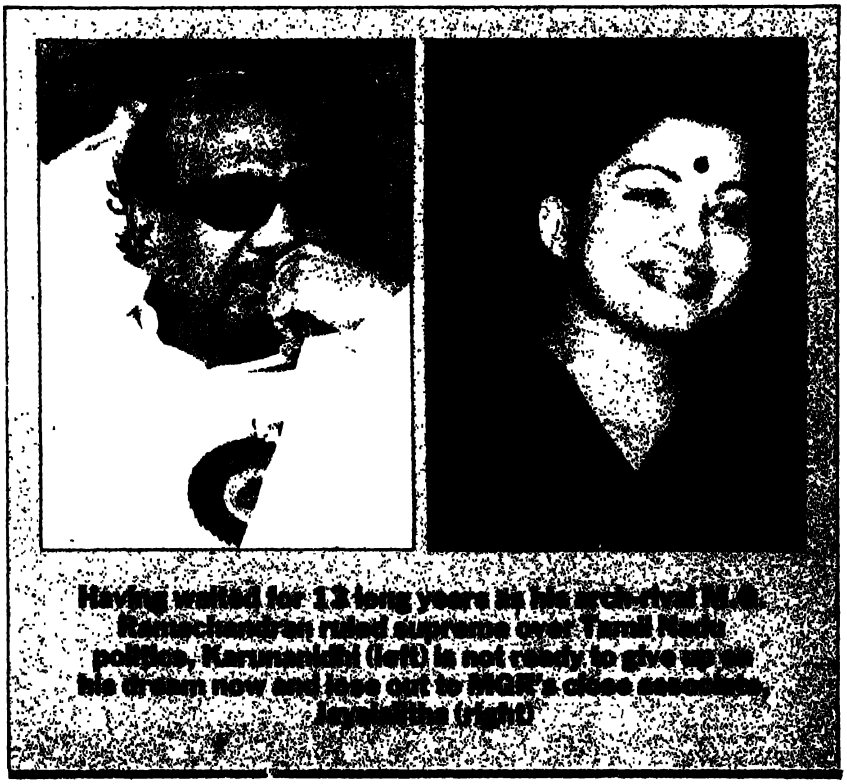
Rumbles of a tumble



The changes at the Centre might spell trouble for Karunanidhi

It seems that the fall of V.P. Singh has sent panic waves through Karunanidhi. In the absence of the National Front regime's protective arm, the Tamil Nadu government might be on shaky grounds. And the thought of losing out to arch-rival Jayalalitha, much stronger now with the Congress(I)'s support, must be keeping the DMK chief minister awake at night.

As it is the DMK is quite unhappily placed at the moment with no member in the Lok Sabha. The only Rajya Sabha member it had, Karunanidhi's nephew, Murasoli Maran, also bowed out along with the defeated Raja. As the new Congress-backed government is sure to support the AIADMK, the DMK president is scared of being dismissed in spite of his whopping majority in the state Assembly. And the benevolent company of Congress president Rajiv Gandhi is very likely to benefit AIADMK chief Jayalalitha.

The DMK leader had gone the whole hog trying to project V.P. Singh as the saviour of the backward people. His enthusiasm intensified as the Mandal Commission gathered flak from the northern part of the country. Karunanidhi organised a massive DMK rally in Madras and used the occasion to felicitate V.P. Singh on the "bold" decision to implement the Mandal report. Within a week he followed this up with the National Integration Council meeting. Unfortunately for Karunanidhi, all this did nothing to secure his position on his state gaddi. "The fall of the V.P. Singh government is a great loss for the backward classes and other depressed people in the country," said a solemn Karunanidhi, quite visibly depressed himself.

But there are no good reasons for the DMK chief to suddenly lose ground and become so utterly vulnerable as he appears at the moment. His only concern is that the AIADMK-Congress alliance may create law and order problems and blow it out of proportion to catch the eye of the Centre. This might seriously harm the DMK's image and if there is a mid-term poll in the near future, the party might suffer a humiliating defeat. And having waited for 13 long years as his arch-rival M.G. Ramachandran ruled supreme over Tamil Nadu politics, Karunanidhi is not ready to give up on his dream now and lose out to MGR's close associate, Jayalalitha.

Having waited for 13 long years as his arch-rival M.G. Ramachandran ruled supreme over Tamil Nadu politics, Karunanidhi (left) is not ready to give up on his dream now and lose out to MGR's close associate, Jayalalitha (right)

There are already some embarrassing issues that his opponents bring up from time to time. One is his alleged support to the LTTE and his helping the guerrillas in their unlawful activities like gun-running from Tamil Nadu soil. This charge was brought up by Rajiv Gandhi in the confidence debate in the Lok Sabha on 7 November. A livid Karunanidhi immediately denied the charges and commented that Rajiv was defiling his grandfather's name by such falsehoods. "Also," added the DMK CM, "Ms Jayalalitha had only recently spoken in support of the LTTE, from a public platform shared by Rajiv Gandhi himself, in Madras."

And Jayalalitha herself is pinning her hopes on the new government, although her decision to support the Chandra Shekhar regime from the outside disappointed some of her senior followers. The most heart-broken were probably the 11 AIADMK members in the Lok Sabha, who probably hoped to get berths in the new Cabinet. There were rumours that the new ministry would have at least two AIADMK ministers. The late MGR had two AIADMK representatives in the short-lived Charan Singh ministry and it seemed only natural that his political heir, Jayalalitha, would do the same. Whether the Chandra Shekhar ministry would last as long as the Charan Singh one was, of course, a different issue.

With the stakes thus distributed, and the political scenario suggesting polls early next year, the rival political camps in Tamil Nadu are gearing up for a confrontation. And this time the 21-month-old DMK government might not emerge the winner. •

The fall of the Raja

Why V.P. Singh had to go

Any dispassionate observer of the Indian political scene cannot but view the departure of the National Front government with mixed feelings. The mandate of the last election was undoutedly for a clean government but it was also a mandate for three anti-Congress political entities to solve the burning problems which a new government would inherit. In retrospect, Mr V.P. Singh fulfilled the first part of his mandate, inasmuch as, he undoubtedly provided a conspicuously clean administration. The best that can be said, however, for Mr. V.P. Singh's efforts to fulfil the second part of his mandate was that they were wellintentioned failures. The nation must surely lament the squandering of an opportunity proferred by it to one of the few politicians with unimpeachable credentials of personal integrity.

There is much to be said in favour of V.P. Singh's government. The single most welcome feature of his administration was the restoration of a tradition of respect for the institutional process of the nation.

While V.P. Singh can claim credit for providing a clean administration, he cannot escape blame for not affording an efficient one. The root causes of such inefficiency were undoubtedly a pre-electoral lack of self-confidence in taking on the powerful Congress system on his own, and a consequent reliance upon the organisation and resources of a number of faction leaders, at least some of whom nursed a burning ambition to occupy the Prime Minister's chair.

The logic and imperatives of a minority government supported by two diametrically opposed parties in Parliament was the direct cause of such inefficiency. The very nature of his government necessitated a consensual approach, "managing contradictions" to use his own words became the keynote of his government. The practical manifestations of such an inherently absurd approach towards government is there for all to see. On every vital issue, his government adopted at least two patently inconsistent policies. While the Raja waxed eloquent on a healing touch and elections in Punjab, he was compelled by the BJP and hardliners within his own party to wane in Parliament through constitutional amendments which repeatedly postponed elections in Punjab. In Kashmir, we had the incongruous picture of Jagmohan's iron-fist being offset by George Fernandes' velvet glove. And on Bofors and corporate crime, the Raja's real predelictions—revealed in his actions as finance minister in 1985—were diluted by both factional leaders within his party, as well as, some leaders of the supporting parties who sought to camouflage their insensitivity to corruption and crime by advocating a "no vendetta" approach. The resultant picture was a vacillating and inconsistent Prime Minister, incoherent government policies, and a conspicuous drift in politics generally.

The implementation of the Mandal Commission Report must necessarily be viewed as the definitive policy initiative of the Raja's regime. There is nothing sinister either in the recommendations of the report or in the timing of its implementation.

The arguments on the Raja's timing and haste in implementing Mandal are quite misleading. By August 1990, it had become quite clear to the Raja that the minority government he was heading could not survive. The BJP, along with the VHP, had declared its intention to construct a temple by 30 October even if it meant the demolition of a mosque. Unless one of the two sides resiled from their aims, the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid issue admitted of no solution. Indeed, all the political parties which criticised the Raja for his failure to solve the issue, were themselves bereft of any solutions. In addition, the expulsion of Devi Lal from the Cabinet on the grounds of Meham, a forged letter and public statements that undermined

SUBHAJIT PAL

The root causes of the V.P. Singh administration's inefficiency were a pre-electoral lack of self-confidence in taking on the powerful Congress system on its own and the consequent reliance upon a number of faction leaders collective Cabinet responsibility, had rendered the Jat leader an irreconcilable dissident who had already begun to make a common cause with that other perennial dissident Chandra Shekhar, in an attempt to split the party. In hind-sight, the fall of Raja's government was inevitable if not from its outset then at least from August 1990. Any new combination would necessarily have to depend on Congress support. If in August 1990, therefore, the Raja had indeed perceived that there could be no anti-Congress government after the inevitable fall by 30 October of his own government, then the implementation of the Mandal report on 13 August is unobjectionable. The Raja had made a commitment to the backward castes on the Mandal report in the Dal's manifesto, and he was entitled to implement it before his fall. The Mandal report was not the cause of the Raja's downfall. That downfall was inevitable in August 1990 and Mandal was merely its effect.

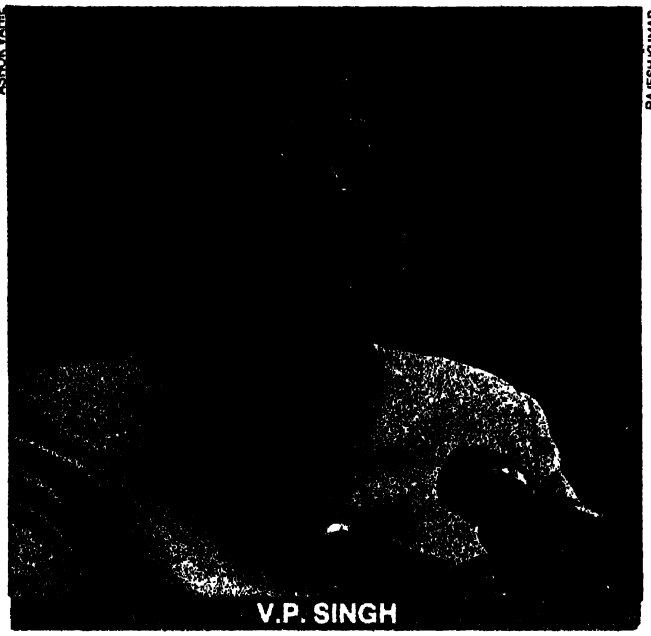
On merits, the report must be considered unimpeachable as no political party has dared to oppose it. Even those who have not read the report must assume, therefore, that the report enhanced social justice and ought to be implemented. The hostile criticism which the Raja has been subjected to from all his political opponents is thus the outcome of political malice, envy or frustration.

It would be unfair to the BJP to label them as wreckers of an incumbent government or to compare them with those responsible for the fall of Janata Party in 1979. The BJP obviously sensed the imminent split in the Janata Dal, perceived the Raja's consequent steps to create a political base which afforded him an electoral majority independent of support from any other factional leader, and rightly concluded that a mid-term poll was in the offing. It accordingly distanced itself from the government at the earliest opportunity. It would have done better service to both the nation and itself, however, if it had resigned from the government on the basis of a less divisive issue and at a time when vital investigations were finally concluded.

The compunctions of Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal are also crystal clear. Being mere faction leaders, they could never aspire to be Prime Minister on their own strength or in their own right. Their chances of becoming Prime Minister were always dependent on attaining supremacy of their faction over all other factions within a party structure. So long as the Raja presided over a party consisting of several factional leaders, their endeavours were thus concentrated on securing the support of a majority of factions within the party. Under the Raja's new dispensation, their is no room for factional leaders. Of all politicians, factional leaders are necessarily the greatest political opportunists. The foundation of their quest for power is opportunity. The political vacuum created by the fall of Raja's minority government afforded the last and only opportunity for factional leaders to come to power. Chandra Shekhar was hardly likely to spurn such an opportunity.

The circumstances surrounding the opportunity afforded to Chandra Shekhar, however, are hardly propitious. The dissident Janata Dal—Congress combine is conceived not only in political opportunism but political immorality. It has no ideological cohesion; indeed, there are glaring contradictions. It is contrary to the national mandate of 1989. The unifying principle of the dissident group that will constitute the government is to have one last bite of the power apple, but not all of them will get a bite of the apple, and several will not get the choicest bite. There are no values or principles so that the aphrodisiac of power can be enjoyed vicariously, and there is no administrative experience, so that, the power wielded by some can be appreciated by all. Chandra Shekhar comes to office with the unique distinction of never having held any ministerical post before. Among likely Cabinet candidates, there is only one person with any worthwhile Cabinet experience in the past in the form of Ashoke Sen who has had three undistinguished tenures as law minister. After him, the most experienced member is Devi Lal who has been the deputy prime minister and agriculture minister.



It does not require great political clairvoyance to predict a mid-term poll within the next three months. That election will effectively disclose the heart of this nation and decide its destiny for several years to come. The issue will undoubtedly be national unity and national integration. The nation will have to decide whether those goals are best achieved by Mr V.P. Singh's platform of social justice, the BJP's appeal to revive a glorious Hindu past, or the Congress's claim that it alone can provide stability because it has been around for a long time. ●

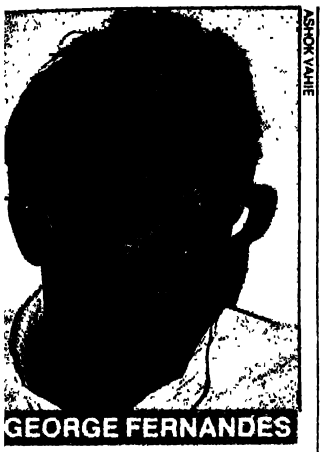
Life without power

What do V.P. Singh's ministers feel about their leader now and what are their future plans?

The greater the expectations, the bigger the disappointment. When V.P. Singh stormed to power last December, he was hailed as the messiah of value-based politics, the Raja who could do no wrong. And, since the issues that V.P Singh and his Janata Dal colleagues had harped on all along the election campaign were the corruption and the inefficiency of the Rajiv raj, it was naturally expected that once in the saddle, they would put an end to all that was wrong with Indian politics. But during his 11-month rule, the Raja did nothing to live up to his image of an efficient and honest administrator. And though V.P. Singh did manage to keep himself out of major controversies, his ministers were not that lucky. Thus, if Veer Bahadur Singh sent his state aircraft back from Delhi to Lucknow to fetch his pyjamas during Rajiv Gandhi's tenure, Maneka Gandhi was accused of misusing her ministry's plane to visit her son's school in Andhra Pradesh.

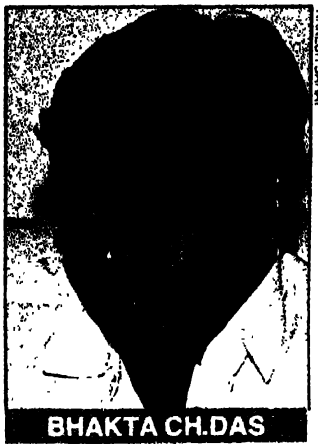


What kind of a legacy did the V.P. Singh regime leave behind? Were the Janata Dal ministers any different from their predecessors? Were their styles of functioning any better than Rajiv Gandhi's discredited lot? And, what do the ministers feel about their leader?

V.P. Singh's team can be broadly divided into two categories. One comprised young and junior ministers, such as Subodh Kant Sahay and Bhakta Charan Das, both of whom were close to Chandra Shekhar but were weaned away by the Raja with ministerial berths. In the second category were veteran Dal leaders like Arun Nehru, Arif Mohammad Khan, I.K. Gujral and George Fernandes, some of whom were unhappy with the way Singh was running the show, but never came out against him in public.

Understandably, it is the junior lot who first raised the banner of revolt against V.P. Singh. Bhakta Charan Das was the first of the Raja's team to defect to the Chandra Shekhar camp when it became amply clear that the Raja would have to go. But why did he desert his leader in his hour of crisis? Wasn't it sheer opportunism and a desire for power? Das explains: "We differed on issues. For instance, while I admit there was unanimity among the senior ministers on tackling the Ayodhya issue, many of us, the younger lot, felt that V.P. Singh had taken the wrong line with the BJP. Moreover, we felt that once the BJP had withdrawn support, V.P. Singh should have resigned immediately."

The senior hands in V.P. Singh's Cabinet, however, are not that forthright. Though many of them like Das were dead against the Raja, they have chosen not to speak out. Arun Nehru, for one, is keeping his cards close to his chest. Despite strong rumours that Nehru will join his cousin Rajiv Gandhi, the former commerce minister has done nothing to confirm such a belief. He also refuses to say anything about his future plans



Arif Mohammad Khan, the former energy and civil aviation minister, too, is extremely guarded while commenting on the performance of V.P. Singh's government. "All I can say is that I did my job the best I could and if there were any shortcomings, they were entirely of my own making. I would not like to put the blame on anybody else," says Khan.

Arif Mohammad, nevertheless, feels that infighting within the Janata Dal seriously hampered the functioning of the government. 'There were periods of inaction," he agrees, but adds hastily, "however, I don't think that one week's absence of a minister turned things upside down." What about his future plans? "Now that we will be sitting in the Opposition, we will use the forum of Parliament to carry on the debate begun by V.P. Singh. It is not necessary to launch a political movement every time because the people can see for themselves who are playing games with them," he says.

There are others, however, who are in favour of reaching out to the people. They are all solidly behind V.P. Singh and feel that the Raja did an excellent job during his short tenure. Says I.K. Gujral, the polished foreign minister in the last Cabinet: "One of the important things V.P. Singh did was to restore the importance of the Cabinet. Under Rajiv Gandhi, the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) used to run the country. This is achievement enough." Former railways minister George Fernandes chips in: "V.P. Singh was criticised for having a penchant for setting up committees. But it is through these committees that work could be done. There's no point in having ministers tackling all the problems."

P. Upendra, who often got into trouble while handling the information and broadcasting ministry, is also full of praise for the Raja. One outstanding feature, according to him, of the last government was its commitment to honour the election manifesto. "For the first time," says Upendra, "the manifesto became the Bible of the government. The manifesto was there in all Cabinet meetings and many of the promises made to the people—like granting autonomy to the electronic media and the uplift of the backward classes- were kept."

According to Upendra, many other promises made before the elections would have been honoured had the government lasted. According to him, as many as 50 Bills were pending in Parliament when V.P. Singh lost the confidence of the House "Our plan," says Upendra, "was to finish all legislative processes by December this year and start implementing our election promises from the second year onwards."

When Madhu Dandavate was sworn in as finance minister of the V.P. Singh Cabinet, he had a daunting task before him. The economy was in a shambles and midway through his term, the Gulf crisis struck a crippling blow. But despite the criticism that he plunged the country deeper into the red, Dandavate has no regrets. The revival of the National Development Council (NDC) as an institution, he thinks, was one of the most creditable achievements of the V.P. Singh regime. "The NDC is an important arm of the government but was ignored for decades. Its revival has led to the strengthening of Centre-state relations. And even the then Opposition leaders have admitted this," claims Dandavate.

Most of the Raja's camp followers feel that the National Front government's most important achievement was to restore the importance of the Cabinet. Explains George Fernandes, "From my experiences in the 1977 Cabinet, I can say that there was more interaction during our tenure Secretaries of the various departments were regularly called in for consultations." But the Raja's detractors feel otherwise: they claim that while V.P. Singh did consult many people, all major decisions were taken by him alone. They cite the instance of the unilateral and sudden implementation of the Mandal Commission recommendations.

Will V.P. Singh be remembered as a failure? "Certainly not," says Fernandes, adding, "During the election campaign I had pointed out that even if we came to power, the government will have a difficult time because the country was facing problems on several fronts. V.P. Singh did his best in the short period that he was in power." Perhaps, but the Raja certainly cannot demand credit for revolutionising the Indian political system—something which he had promised to do in the summer of 1989. •

THE NEW TEAM

But will Chandra Shekhar's government be able to deliver the goods?

RAJESH KUMAR

It was a bad beginning for a Prime Minister who already had severe image problems. The first thing Chandra Shekhar did on assuming office was tell anyone who would listen that the country was passing through its worst crisis ever. Strangely, the Prime Minister did not follow the rhetoric with action. For 11 days after he was sworn in, the governance of India remained in a state of limbo. It took the veteran Janata Dal strongman that long to even constitute a Cabinet to cope with the problems he kept talking about.

On Wednesday, 21 November, just hours before the Prime Minister flew off to the Maldives to attend the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) summit, he finally unveiled his ministry. As nonentity followed nonentity on to the podium, the only question that remained was: why did it take 11 days to appoint this crowd?

To be fair, Shekhar had his problems.

First, the Janata Dal(S) comprised only 60-odd MPs, most of whom had little or no previous administrative experience—even the Prime Minister himself had never held a ministerial post before. Most of the members were from the Hindi belt states of Uttar Pradesh and Bihar, with some representation to Haryana (courtesy Devi Lal) Rajasthan and Gujarat. The south was conspicuous by its absence as was the Muslim community. If Shekhar chose from the scarce resources at his disposal, he was bound to end up with a less than balanced ministry.

Then there was the problem of the Tau. Devi Lal insisted that some of the major portfolios go to his supporters, with his son Ranjit Singh being accommodated in the Cabinet. Dhankhar, too, should get a prize post, maintained the Chaudhary, while he would be content with agriculture. Faced with these demands, Shekhar fell back on his old ally, Lal's eldest son Om Prakash Chautala, to get the deputy prime minister to scale down his demands.

Political gossip had it that the Congress(I) was meddling in the process of ministry formation as well, asking that people such as Maneka Gandhi and Sanjay Singh be kept out. Rajiv Gandhi was quick to scotch such rumours, but the talk persisted, with Shekhar hard put to defend his credibility as an independent head of government.

Even so, there were few surprises in the list he finally announced. Shekhar found berths for his devoted followers, accommodated many of those who had preferred him to V P. Singh and allocated portfolios to Devi Lal's no less devoted followers—though some like Jagdeep Dhankhar chose to stay away rather than accept the Prime Minister's terms.

The swearing-in ceremony—held in the Ashoka Hall this time—was marred by unruly scenes such as had occurred when Shekhar and his deputy were being administered the oath of office, compounding the government's image problems still further. While Devi Lal turned up despite the failure to accommodate all his followers, his supporters weren't quite so obliging. Chand Ram and Jagdeep Dhankhar stayed away to lodge their protest

The coterie

The men the new Prime Minister relies on

Rajiv Gandhi, V.P. Singh and Chandra Shekhar may have widely varying styles of functioning, but there's one thing they have in common: reliance on a coterie of trusted advisers, most of whom are entirely dissimilar except in their overriding loyalty to their leader. Rajiv had M.L. Fotedar, R.K. Dhawan, Satish Sharma and Buta Singh; the Raja depended on Vinod Pande, Bhure Lal, Som Pal and Sita Devi; and now Shekhar relies on such supporters as Yashwant Sinha, Kamal Morarka, Harmohan Dhawan, C.V. Gautam and others. A quick look at Shekhar's inner circle:

YASHWANT SINHA

A former Indian Administrative Service (IAS) officer, Sinha was in the forefront of the anti-VP campaign launched by the Shekhar camp. His jobs ranged from persuading MPs to change sides to taking the Raja head-on in party meetings. Perhaps, the most experienced administrator the Dal(S) can boast of, Sinha enjoys the complete trust of the Prime Minister and can be safely expected to dabble in matters which don't directly concern his ministry.

KAMAL MORARKA

An associate of Chandra Shekhar's since 1967, Morarka is, perhaps, the Prime Minister's most trusted aide, though he has preferred to stay in the background over the last fortnight or so. But while the battle for the prime ministership was still on, the young Bombay industrialist was a regular at Shekhar's 3 South Avenue Lane residence, holding meetings with other members of the coterie to chalk out strategy. His biggest strength is his ability to shoot his mouth off and tell his leader the truths no one else will.

HARMOHAN DHAWAN

The general impression that Dhawan is a late entrant to the Shekhar camp is not really true. Even when he was only dabbling in Chandigarh politics, the MP was a devoted follower of the new Prime Minister. As general secretary of the Janata Dal, he repeatedly challenged the authority of V.P. Singh, even having heated exchanges with him during the course of a parliamentary party meeting. In the run-up to the change of government, Dhawan was one of the principal strategists of the Shekhar camp.

DIGVIJAY SINGH

Despite being closely related to the Raja, Singh has always been a camp follower of Chandra Shekhar's. Beginning as a student leader at the Jawaharlal Nehru University, Digvijay, alias Dada, graduated to become a Rajya Sabha MP from Bihar. Though not in the same league as Yashwant Sinha and Kamal Morarka, Singh manages to pull his weight.

JAYANT MALHOUTRA

Former treasurer of the Janata Party, Malhoutra camped out at the Ashoka Hotel all through the Janata Dal crisis, hanging on until the Raja's government fell. His presence at South Avenue Lane went down ill with some members of Shekhar's coterie, but Malhoutra gamely hung around. Shekhar, apparently, owes him one because he helped him in his battle with against the new dispensation.

While Chand Ram's name didn't occur in the list—he had already turned down the portfolio offered to him—a seat was kept reserved for Dhankhar, who failed to put in an appearance. The Chaudhary's principal side kick saw no reason why he should agree to become a minister of state when such people as Maneka Gandhi and Sanjay Singh were being given independent charges.

While speculation raged about Jagdeep Dhankhar's absence, pandemonium broke out outside Ashoka Hall. Ten minutes before nine am, after all the VIPs had entered, the securitymen shut the gates, refusing to allow newsmen in. The journalists who hadn't been informed that they should come an hour in advance were incensed When the guards refused to relent, some of the mediamen tried to force their way inside. They were lathicharged and, in the stampede that followed, many were injured while some lost their valuables.

Nor did the securitymen permit ministers to enter. Yashwant Sinha was stopped at the gates and realising what was going on, he refused to go in unless the press was allowed in too. After heated exchanges, Sinha managed to get the journos inside, but by that time, the oath-taking ceremony was already under way.

Some of the mediamen began shouting "Shame, shame" to protest their treatment at the hands of the security guards. V.C. Shukla, Subramaniam Swamy and a few other ministers took the oath of office and secrecy amidst loud slogan-shouting. The guards finally succeeded in evicting the newsmen, who immediately afterwards demanded a judicial enquiry into the incident.

More than an hour elapsed before all the ministers had taken their oaths of office and secrecy. The tedium was partially relieved when Subramaniam Swamy decided to speak in Hindi, manfully struggling with the highly-Sanskritised language he was required to enunciate. And when one minister forgot to wear his spectacles before the event, fumbling with them before the microphone, while President Venkataraman waited patiently.

Maneka Gandhi and Kamal Morarka were among the few who took the oath in English, which couldn't have gone down too well with UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav, stationed on one of the first-row seats, fresh from his triumph in the Uttar Pradesh Assembly.

The line-up of ministers contained only one name from the Lal camp: Green Brigade chief Jai Prakash, appointed a lowly deputy minister. All the prize jobs went to Shekhar's own people, though Lal's lack of aggro seemed to suggest that he'd get his pound of flesh in the next ministerial expansion.

As was expected, the Prime Minister kept such key portfolios as defence, home, industry, information and broadcasting with him. But, to be fair, he had little choice in the matter, what with the paucity of talent and experience in his assorted followers. The only person who qualified for a major ministry was Yashwant Sinha, a former Indian Administrative Service (IAS) officer. And once he'd been taken care of, there was no one who could be allocated home or defence. Nevertheless, Shekhar did manage to dredge up 13 Cabinet ministers—excluding his deputy Devi Lal, who got agriculture and tourism—from among what many regarded as his rag-tag and bobtail outfit. None of them was a major player on the political scene, but unlike some of the state and deputy ministers, they weren't absolute nonentities either. For example:

V.C. Shukla: After functioning as an important leader of the Congress for nearly 30 years (he was information and broadcasting minister during the

NI—N RAI

CHAUTALA WITH SHEKHAR: he got the Tau to scale down his demands

R.K. Hegde. But true-blue coterie members don't regard him as one of their own.

SUBRAMANIAM SWAMY

Like Malhoutra, he makes himself out to be a regular. And his propensity to hang around with the Prime Minister, thrusting himself into every picture frame, has led to jokes about his being the Jagdeep Dhankhar of the Chandra Shekhar camp. But to be fair to Swamy, he did do a fair amout of leg-work for Shekhar, functioning as the Congress-Chandra Shekhar go-between.

On the non-political front, C.V. Gautam, private secretary to Chandra Shekhar for over 20 years, comes first. Virtually a member of the family, Gautam has always been used for sensitive political assignments and is likely to play a key role.

H.N. Sharma, additional private secretary, will get a slightly less important role in the new dispensation, while Gopi Manchanda, an old student leader and close associate of Shekhar's for the last ten years, may be appointed officer on special duty in the PMO. S.K. Goel, another old friend, who'd prepared Shekhar's statement on the industrial policy for him, could well continue to function as economic adviser.

Emergency) Shukla left the party along with V P Singh in 1987 But the Raja failed to accommodate him in his Cabinet and soon, Shukla switched allegiance to prime dissident, Shekhar He has now been awarded the external affairs ministry, but is, apparently, unhappy with the allocation.

Yashwant Sinha: He could have become a minister of state in the Raja's Cabinet but chose to turn down the offer Partly because of his loyalty to his leader, Chandra Shekhar, and partly because he thought it offensive to be clubbed with the likes of Maneka Gandhi The least he deserved was a Cabinet berth, said Sinha. He's achieved that now, having been appointed the finance minister. And with his proven administrative skill, he should be a success at the job.

Subramaniam Swamy: Remained on the fringes of national politics, keeping himself in the news with his campaigns against such people as R.K Hegde Over the last two years, the Janata Party leader developed a relationship with Rajiv Gandhi, which became useful once the Janata Dal dissidents found themselves in a position to form an alternative government. Ideally, Swamy would have liked to be either finance or external affairs minister. But, for fear of arousing disaffection in the ranks most Shekhar loyalists regard Swamy as an upstart—he was given the relatively low-profile commerce and law ministries.

Raj Mangal Pandey: Despite his earlier closeness to V P. Singh (he'd followed the Raja out of the Congress), Pandey joined the dissident camp after the Dal's policies on Mandal and the mandir had disillusioned him totally. He spearheaded the campaign against the Raja's government, using his considerable moral authority to wean people away from VP. Pandey has had previous administrative experience—he was a minister in the UP government —and could prove a competent human resource development minister.

Ashoke Sen: After a spell out in the cold, Ashoke Sen, that wily lawyer from West Bengal, makes a reappearance in the Cabinet. Not as law minister this time; he will take over at the steel and mines ministry. His inclusion had been almost certain once he took the lead in persuading the President to invite Shekhar to form the government

Who calls the shots?

Chandra Shekhar or Rajiv Gandhi?

If political gossip in Delhi was anything to go by, the Congress was calling the shots as far as the formation of the Chandra Shekhar government was concerned. Rajiv Gandhi, the story went, had made it clear that he would not tolerate the inclusion of Maneka Gandhi, A.K. Sen and Sanjay Singh in the ministry, and Shekhar had little choice but to obey his dictates.

The Congress president, however, was quick to dispel such rumours. Talking to newsmen at Delhi airport, while the Prime Minister hovered nervously in the background, he made it clear that he hadn't the slightest interest in the constitution of the council of ministers. As far as the Congress was concerned, it was Shekhar's baby.

But the impact of the performance was somewhat spoilt by a hushed ten-minute conversation the two leaders had at the airport, after which the PM was seen trying to persuade Rajiv to ride back with him. Gandhi refused, leading to much speculation about the nature with his reputation as the Great Defector, Rao Birendra Singh crossed over to the Chandra Shekhar camp, after falling out with the Raja. A backward leader (Yadav) from Haryana, he will be the new food and civil supplies minister and, no doubt, function as Shekhar's answer to the Sharad Yadavs of the world, as far as caste politics go.

Janeshwar Mishra: Functioned as a minister of state in the Morarji Desai, Charan Singh and V.P. Singh governments. But has now been elevated to Cabinet rank, assuming charge of the railways ministry.

Hukum Deo Narayan Yadav: Despite his backward caste-based support, Yadav did not side with the Raja on the Mandal Report. His loyalty has now been rewarded with the grant of the textiles and food processing ministries.

VIJENDER TYAGI

MANEKA GANDHI AND SANJAY SINGH: both found berths in the ministry, despite strong rumours to the contrary

Manubhai Kotadia: The minister of state for water resources in the V.P. Singh government, Kotadia has been elevated to Cabinet rank, with the same portfolio.

Daulat Ram Saran: A former associate of Chaudhary Charan Singh's, Saran has joined the Union Cabinet for the first time and will function as the urban development minister.

Satya Prakash Malaviya: Formerly in the Ajit Singh camp, Malaviya has now been given charge of the petroleum ministry.

Kalyan Singh Kalvi: Best known for his support of the practice of sati, Kalvi, an MP from Rajasthan, will succeed Arif Mohammad Khan at the energy ministry.

Shakil-ur-Rehman: He first crossed over to the Shekhar camp, only to go scurrying back to Bommai. But finally plumped for the former and was promptly appointed health and family planning minister.

Despite strong rumours to the effect that Maneka Gandhi and Sanjay Singh would be kept out, in deference to Congress(I) sentiment, both were appointed ministers of state with independent charge of the environment and communications ministries, respectively. Harmohan Dhawan, devoted camp-follower of Chandra Shekhar, got the same deal, with the civil aviation portfolio. Subodh Kant Sahay, minister of state for home and information and broadcasting, didn't get independent charge. But with the Prime Minister holding charge of these departments, he is bound to have a relatively free run.

Far more significant, however, was the appointment of Kamal Morarka as minister of state attached to the Prime Minister's Office (PMO). Morarka, a long-time associate of Chandra Shekhar's, was apparently loath to accept a ministerial post, but relented at the last moment. His job, involving as it does close proximity to the Prime Minister, is bound to be an influential one, most of his predecessors rapidly developed into centres of extra-constitutional authority. While Morarka may well stop short of that, he will be one of the persons to watch.

The chief ministers who had supported Shekhar's bid for the prime ministership were repaid with berths for their 'men'. Janeshwar Mishra, Sarwar Hussain and Sanjay Singh were inducted for Mulayam Singh Yadav's benefit. (According to Singh, it was Yadav who got him appointed to the Rajya Sabha, not the Raja.) Manubhai Kotadia, Shantilal Patel, Jayantilal Shah and Hasav Raj Patel got in because of Gujarat CM Chimanbhai Patel, while Bhagey Goverdhan was among Orissa chief minister Biju Patnaik's supporters to join the ministry.

In the end, it was Chaudhary Devi Lal who was the worst loser. The only Haryana heavyweight who got in was Jai Prakash, and he owes allegiance to Om Prakash Chautala, rather than to the Tau. Both Ranjit Singh and Chand Ram were left out, while Jagdeep Dhankhar was fobbed off with a minister of state's post—which he refused. But the fact that a number of ministries—industry, home, information and broadcasting—lay vacant, of the hurried confabulations. The general consensus seemed to be that they revolved around Cabinet formation.

This time, at least, the gossip was unfounded. The Congress, keen to distance itself from the Janata Dal(S) government now that the vote of confidence was over, had no intentions of getting embroiled in the thankless job of allocating portfolios. And Rajiv told Shekhar quite categorically that he could appoint anyone he desired.

But where did these rumours start? One version had it that the Janata Dal(S) itself put out such stories in the hope that if any disaffection resulted from the ministry formation, the blame could be shifted to Gandhi and the Congress. But Rajiv saw through the ploy, so nothing came of it.

According to some, however, the rumours originated with the Janata Dal (Bommai), which wanted to discredit the present government by insinuating that Rajiv Gandhi was actually running the entire show by remote control. If that was true, countered Shekhar's supporters, then the task of ministry formation wouldn't have taken so long. The confusion and utter lack of coordination betrayed during the exercise proved that no fiat had been issued by the Congress president.

And that, for the time being at least, was accepted as the most credible version.

held out hope for the Chaudhary's camp.

The week before the swearing-in took place, action centred around Chandra Shekhar's Bhondsi farmhouse. The Prime Minister would drive off every morning, accompanied by such close associates as Yashwant Sinha and Harmohan Dhawan, to draw up a comprehensive list of prospective ministers. Such significant leaders as Devi Lal, Om Prakash Chautala, Mulayam Singh Yadav and Chimanbhai Patel would be called for consultations. But to little avail; despite the best efforts of the PM, a compromise seemed near-impossible to arrive at.

While Shekhar procrastinated, the press went quite wild trying to guess the real cause of the delay. And the Prime Minister didn't improve matters by making statements like, "We can't have the swearing-in on Saturday. It is amavasya."

For the record, Shekhar maintained that the delay was because of the confidence vote on Mulayam Singh Yadav's government. Until that matter was decided, said the Prime Minister, he could not announce his ministry. There was some truth to this. Such ministerial aspirants as Janeshwar Mishra, S.P. Malaviya and Sanjay Singh were camping in Lucknow to ensure the victory of the UP chief minister, and the list wouldn't be complete without them.

But that wasn't the complete story. For, what had tied Shekhar's hands were the demands of his party leaders. Every one of them knew just what he wanted and was not willing to settle for less. Devi Lal insisted that industry, commerce and petroleum go to his camp-followers. Raj Mangal Pandey desired either industry or commerce; while Subramaniam Swamy had set his heart on finance. V.C. Shukla demanded energy, Janeshwar Mishra asked for petroleum and only steel and mines could satisfy Rao Birendra Singh. To complicate matters further, both Sanjay Singh and Jagdeep Dhankhar wanted civil aviation, though the latter was willing to settle for the high-profile information and

Behind the delay

Why it took Shekhar all of 11 days to decide on his team

The Janata Dal(S) had its excuse ready. The Prime Minister couldn't announce the ministry until Mulayam Singh Yadav had won his vote of confidence, for until then, all MPs from Uttar Pradesh would be preoccupied.

But, unfortunately for Chandra Shekhar, nobody was buying that. It was patently obvious that the initial delay, at least, had been caused by the Dal(S)'s disinclination to allocate portfolios before the House convened on 16 November. Shekhar hoped that more MPs would ditch Bommai and Co. and cross over to him. He would, thus, have far more to choose from when it came to deciding who got what. And, with luck, his ministry wouldn't look quite so lopsided or light-weight.

With this plan in mind, Shekhar even approached such leaders as Farooq Abdullah (National Conference), Prakash Singh Badal (Akali Dal) and Syed Shahabuddin. But none of them evinced the slightest interest, and the Prime Minister had to give up on that one.

At this point, Devi Lal entered broadcasting ministry.

While there wasn't any truth to the rumour that Maneka, Sanjay Singh, V.C. Shukla and Ashoke Sen would be kept out by the Congress, the opposition to Subodh Kant Sahay was only too real. Associates of Shekhar argued that Sahay should be kept out because he'd deserted his leader for the Raja less than a year ago. But the Prime Minister, with few experienced hands on deck, ignored all such talk and appointed Sahay nonetheless, while former IPS officer Lalit Vijay Singh was made minister of state for defence in view of his administrative background.

Despite the initial dilly-dallying, in the end it was Shekhar who had the last word on ministry allocation. And despite the obvious unhappiness of some of those who didn't get the portfolios of their choice, there was no large-scale revolt in the ranks.

The suspense lasted till late into the night of 20 November. Until 8 pm, the ministerial aspirants were frantically ringing up one another for news, in the absence of any intimation from the PMO. It was only around 9 pm that C.V. Gautam, Chandra Shekhar's private secretary, started calling up those on the list. By midnight, special passes for the swearing-in ceremony for the ministers-to-be and their guests were readied and issued by Rashtrapati Bhavan. The only minister to get prior information was V.C. Shukla, and that because he was to be appointed external affairs minister and had to accompany the Prime Minister to Male for the SAARC summit.

While most of the prospective members of the council were celebrating, an entirely different drama was being staged at the Prime Minister's house. The industry ministry was to go to one of Devi Lal's men, and the Tau had recommended Chand Ram's name. Om Prakash Chautala, however, opposed this move and the proposal was hastily junked. A compromise was worked out, according to which Chand Ram would get another—though less important—portfolio Ram turned down the offer. Another Tau loyalist, Jagdeep Dhankhar, played hookey at the swearing-in, though his equation with Lal means he will remain an important member of the new team, if only by extension.

As Devi Lal's principal liaison man, Dhankhar will continue to be the Chaudhary's conduit to both the press and the Congress. While Dhankhar's affinity for journalists—especially photographers—is well known, he also has long-standing connections with the Congress, his family having been supporters of the party for decades. Even though the ubiquitous MP hasn't found fit to accept a berth in the ministry (what was offered to him wasn't good enough), he will function as Devi Lal's eyes and ears in the government. He may not be a part of Chandra Shekhar's team, but he remains the man to watch.

But after Ram was out, another Devi Lal follower had to be accommodated. Chautala suggested the name of Jai Prakash, Green Brigade chief and one of his loyalists. Around midnight, Jai Prakash was summoned from Chandigarh so that he could be in Delhi during the oath-taking ceremony, scheduled for the morning of 21 November, the Prime Minister having to fly off to Maldives that very day.

In fact, Shekhar drove straight to the airport from Rashtrapati Bhavan. The newly-appointed ministers were hustled out of Ashoka Hall in record time so that they could see off the PM on his first official tour abroad. Shekhar himself was in a foul mood, refusing to talk to newsmen because of their slogan-shouting earlier in the day.

It wasn't the best of beginnings. But, no doubt, the Prime Minister comforted himself with the thought that from now on things could only improve. • the fray to complicate matters further. The Tau insisted that some of the key portfolios, such as finance, commerce, industry and petroleum, go to his men and at least 50 per cent of the ministries be placed under his followers. Shekhar, with some help from Om Prakash Chautala, was able to convince him not to persist with this demand.

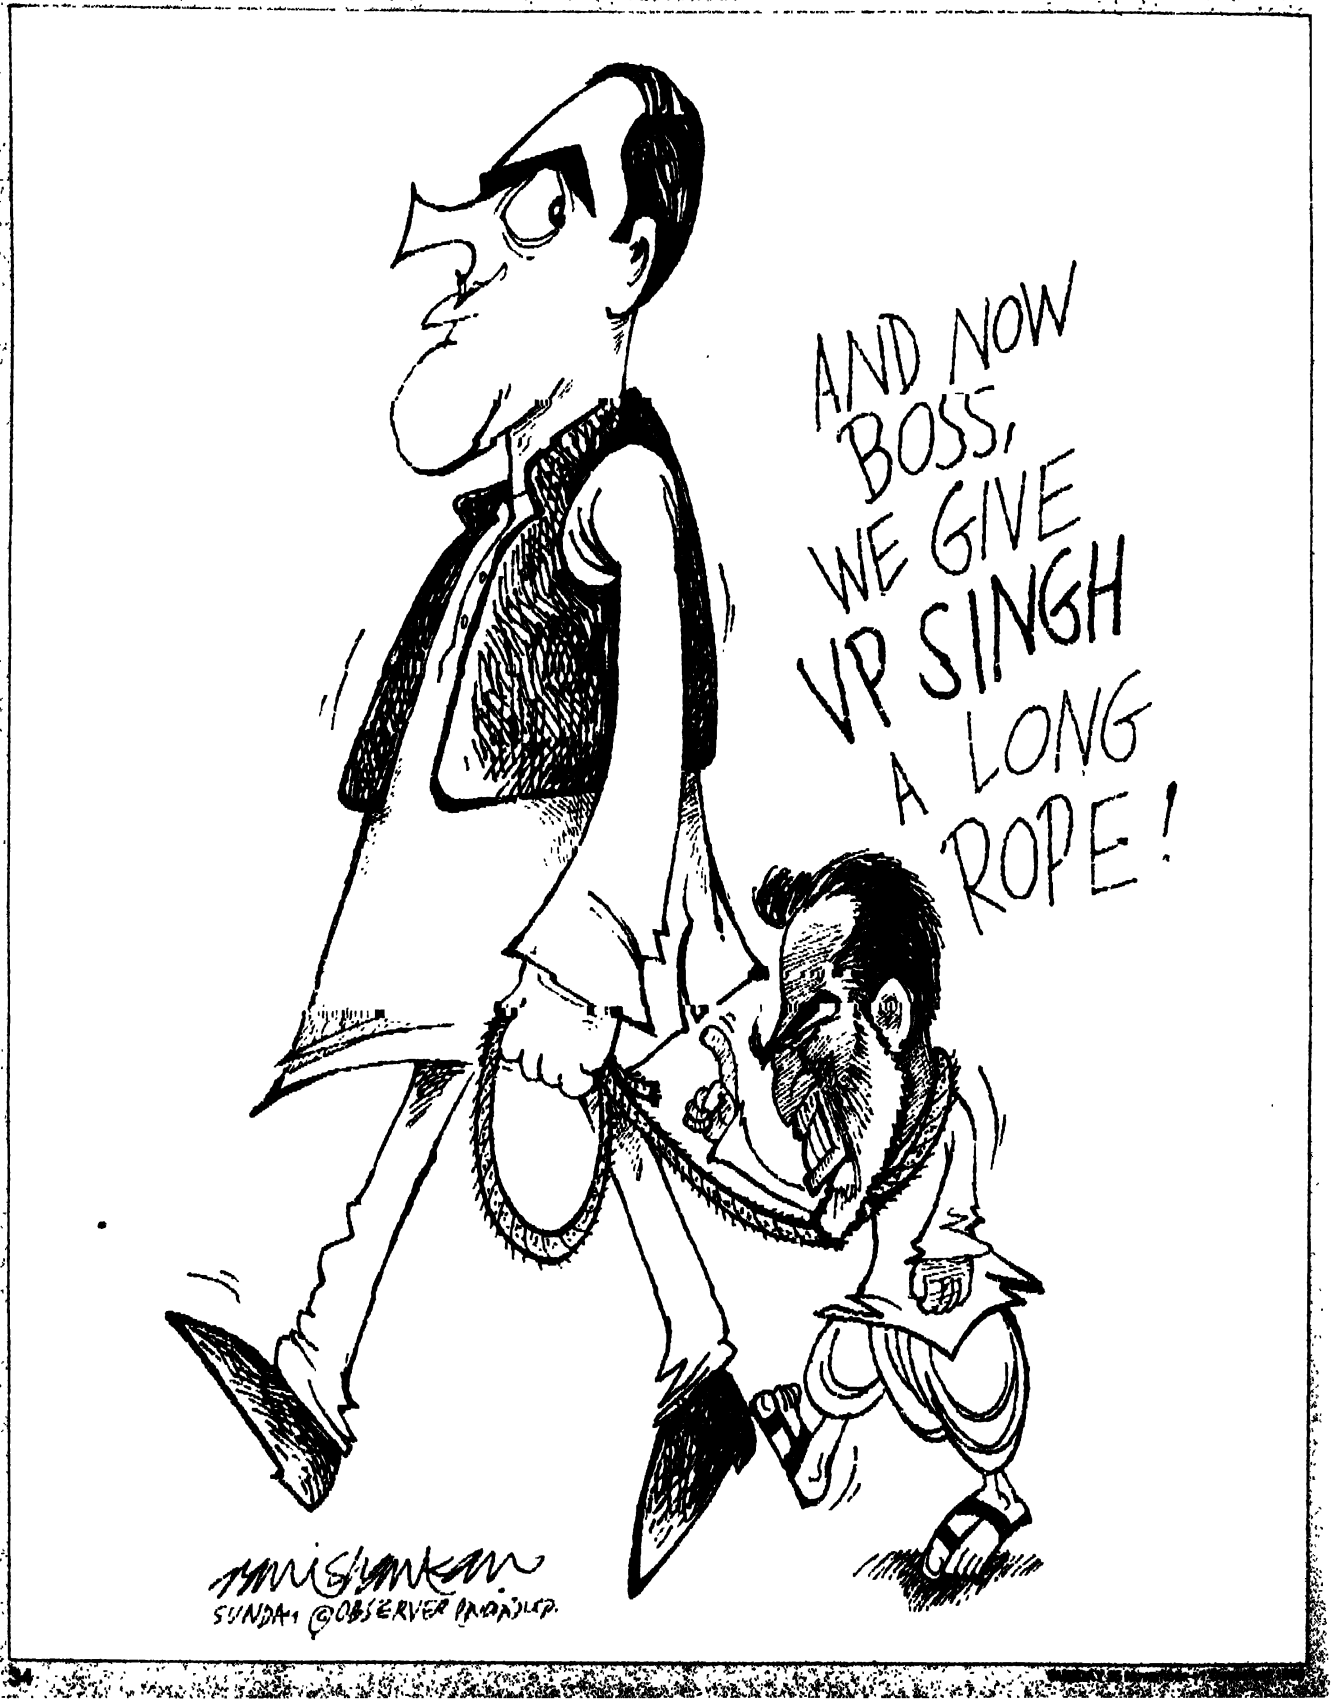
But not before precious days had been lost.

The membership of the Janata Dal(S) posed its own problems. Most of the party's MPs were from the Hindi belt, with little or no administrative experience. The one person who did qualify for a major berth was Yashwant Sinha. But if he got finance, who would get home, and vice versa?



While such conundrums were being worked out, Shekhar also had to deal with the issue of Muslim representation in the ministry. Of all the nine Muslim Dal MPs, none agreed to cross over at first. Finally, Shakil-ur-Rehman and Sarwar Hussain joined the Dal(S) and were rewarded with ministries.

Giving adequate representation to the south wasn't easy either. Names like Babul Reddy, B.V. Raju, H.D. Deve Gowda and others were being bandied about, but the only sure-shot entrant was the Janata Party maverick Dr Subramaniam Swamy.

In the end, it took Shekhar all of 11 days to decide on his team. And not a terribly inspiring team, at that.

Mulayam survives

But how long will the Congress(I) let the Uttar Pradesh chief minister rule?

First it was Gujarat. Then came the question of propping up the Chandra Shekhar regime. On 19 November, Rajiv Gandhi pulled yet another Janata Dal (S) government out of the oxygen tent. Mulayam Singh's 11-month-old set-up in Uttar Pradesh, which was gasping for breath following the UP chief minister's defection to the Chandra Shekhar camp and the rebellion within the Janata Dal Legislature Party. On that day, Mulayam Singh won the confidence motion moved by him with a comfortable margin of 224 to 146, thanks to the support extended to his regime by the 93 Congress(I) MLAs (Dharam Pal Singh, the party legislator from Bahraich, defied the whip and voted against the confidence motion). The dissident Dal faction led by the former Union industry minister Ajit Singh could muster the support of only 80 legislators, while the communists abstained from voting.

The one-day special session of the Uttar Pradesh Assembly witnessed unruly scenes on 19 November. Twice, the Speaker had to intervene to keep rival legislators of the Janata Dal from clashing. While the leader of the Opposition in the House, veteran Congress(I) politician N.D. Tiwari utilised the occasion to come down heavily on the Mulayam regime and warned that the Congress(I) would closely monitor the performance of the Dal(S) government, chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav turned the session into a round of V.P. Singh-bashing. The UP chief minister blamed the former Prime Minister for making a deal with the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) to unsettle his government. Mulayam even accused the Raja of pandering to communal sentiments. Undoubtedly a transformed Mulayam Singh, very different from the days when he was all praises for V.P. Singh.

Mulayam first got into problems with the Janata Dal high command soon after the December 1990 Assembly polls in which the party won 210 seats out of the 425 in the Uttar Pradesh House and staked its claim to form the government But the choice of the Janata Dal Legislature Party (JDLP) leader proved to be a contentious issue. While most observers in UP felt that Mulayam Singh should have been the unanimous choice, senior Dal leaders like Arif Mohammad Khan and Arun Nehru thought otherwise. At one point, Arif Mohammad Khan even threatened to contest the elections himself if no one dared to oppose Mulayam Singh Yadav. Nothing of the sort happened as the group successfully persuaded Ajit Singh, who has a sizeable following in western Uttar Pradesh, to have a go at the chief ministership of the country's most important state. What was V.P. Singh's role during this crisis? Apparently, the Raja wanted to remain neutral and thus, asked half of his supporters in the Uttar Pradesh Assembly to vote in favour of Ajit Singh and the other half to support Mulayam Singh Yadav.

The leadership tussle was a closely

Mulayam Singh Yadav may have won the confidence of the House, but it's going to be difficult for him to stick to power fought affair. But Mulayam Singh pipped Ajit Singh to the post and became the chief minister. And, Ajit Singh was promptly made Union industry minister to keep him away from UP politics and Mulayam Singh.

Mulayam started off well and his stand on secularism was appreciated even by his critics. But then, his desire to consolidate his position in the state landed him in trouble. Mulayam's advisers reasoned that the Mandal report had already made the chief minister's position unassailable among the backwards of the state. And if he could win over the minorities of the state, no one in future could defeat him at the hustings. The chief minister agreed and thus began Mulayam's efforts to woo the Muslims. In the name of secularism, of course.

Mulayam Singh Yadav utilised the special session of the Assembly to hit out against his one-time mentor, V.P. Singh. He obviously wanted to justify his loyalty to Chandra Shekhar

Such a policy of pandering to the minority sentiment brought the Uttar Pradesh chief minister in confrontation with V.P. Singh. Realising perhaps that Mulayam Singh Yadav was emerging as the new saviour of the Muslims, the former Prime Minister too went on the offensive: he went ahead and announced a number of measures to appease the Muslims and began cultivating the Shahi Imam of the Jama Masjid to counter the UP CM's growing influence among the minorities.

It was around this time that Mulayam Singh switched loyalties and settled for Chandra Sekhar. He even called Shekhar "a saint", much to the displeasure of V.P. Singh. Mulayam also did everything possible to make things difficult for Singh in Delhi. Since his government was in no way dependent on the BJP for survival, he went ahead and started provoking the party: at every public meeting, the UP chief minister abused BJP leaders and even arrested some of them. Mulayam's aim was to force the BJP to withdraw support to the National Front government at the Centre. And as it turned out later, things worked out wonderfully well for Mulayam Singh Yadav. The V.P. Singh regime collapsed and the Janata Dal split down the middle.

Not that V.P. Singh was unaware of the activities of the Uttar Pradesh chief minister. But he just couldn't afford to annoy Mulayam Singh Yadav. Thus, even after the fall of the government V.P. Singh tried hard to keep the UP chief minister in good humour and ignored demands from several senior Dal leaders to expel him from the party. For, Mulayam now was the key figure in Janata Dal politics. With as many as 14 MPs under his control, Mulayam Singh Yadav's support was crucial for both V.P. Singh and Chandra Shekhar. And, it was largely because of Mulayam's backing that Chandra Shekhar could effect a formal split in the Janata Dal and become the Prime Minister.

But Mulayam Singh's support to Chandra Shekhar was not unconditional. He asked the Prime Minister to persuade the Congress(I) to back his government in Uttar Pradesh, knowing full well that Ajit Singh's followers in the state were capable of toppling him. But even at that point of time, V.P. Singh hesitated to expel Mulayam from the party, largely, because of pressures from prominent Muslim leaders. But the Raja finally took the extreme step when Arif Mohammad Khan threatened to resign from the party if Mulayam was not thrown out.

Mulayam too struck back: he promptly formed the Janata Dal (S) in the state and expelled 37 MLAs from the party. He even got the Speaker to declare them "unattached".

But the party on which Mulayam banked for survival, kept him guessing till the last moment. The Congress(I) in Uttar Pradesh virtually revolted against the idea of supporting the Janata Dal (S) regime in the state. A delegation of Congress MLAs from UP even met party president Rajiv Gandhi and explained to him the disastrous consequences of the move. But Rajiv had his compulsions as well. A high-powered Congress(I) team, including leaders Ghulam Nabi Azad and Sitaram Kesri, was sent to Lucknow to persuade party MLAs to back Mulayam. But Azad and Kesri had a tough time and at one point Balram Singh Yadav even threatened that his group of 50 MLAs would abstain from voting on the day Mulayam moves the confidence motion in the Assembly.

A visibly worried Congress high command held hectic parleys even as the hour of reckoning for Mulayam drew nearer. Finally, the issue was thrashed out at a meeting held at the residence of P.V. Narasimha Rao, where prominent heavyweights from UP like N.D. Tiwari, Rajendra Kumari Bajpai and others were present. It was decided that under the prevailing political climate in the country, it would only serve the Congress interests to keep the Mulayam regime alive in Uttar Pradesh. But the support, clarified the Congress high command, would be conditional. The party would perform the role of an Opposition, and continue to criticise the government on issues. Moreover, the Congress would also demand judicial enquiries into the communal clashes in Ayodhya and Bijnor.

A strange arrangement to say the least. And, a temporary one too. With leaders like N.D. Tiwari waiting in the wings, Mulayam will not find the going easy. •

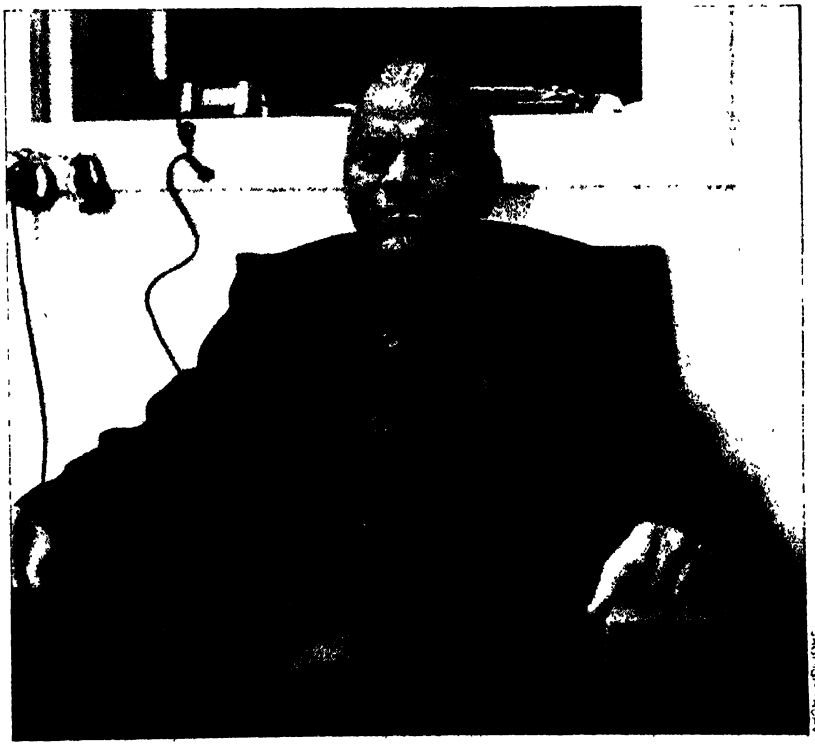
Biased ruling?

Speaker Rabi Ray is criticised for his role during the Janata Dal split

As far as the media—official and otherwise—were concerned, the Janata Dal officially split on 5 November, with the dissidents holding their parallel meet on the lawns of Devi Lal's Willingdon Crescent residence. Only the Lok Sabha Speaker, Rabi Ray, seemed to believe otherwise. For, that very night Ray sent a notice to 30 MPs, belonging to the newly-formed Janata Dal(S), declaring them "unattached" on the grounds that they had been expelled by the president of the parent party, S.R. Bommai.

With this notice, Ray had effectively reduced the strength of the dissident group below 47, the magic number required for a legitimate split, according to the provisions of the Tenth Schedule, popularly known as the Anti-Defection Act.



The controversy soon snowballed. The Janata Dal defended Ray's action, while the rebel camp maintained that he had sold out to the government. Both sides had their arguments ready. The Bommai faction insisted that the rebels had neglected to inform the Speaker of the split, and so Ray was well within his rights to accept the expulsion at face value. But Chandra Shekhar's followers maintained that Ray had merely got involved in political gimmickry on behalf of the Raja, for he could hardly be unaware that the split preceeded the expulsion

Said Jaipal Reddy: "The rebels only informed the Speaker about the split on the 6th. But the expulsions were carried out on the 5th. It was not for the Speaker to argue with the party leader's decision." The former parliamentary affairs minister, P. Upendra, defended the expulsion of only 30 members on the grounds that nobody knew at that point who had joined the splinter group's meeting. "We expelled those who had been leading anti-party activities for some months now. The rest were given the benefit of the doubt."

Members of the Janata Dal(S) had their answers ready. Said Kamal Morarka: "Is this a 100 metres race that the person who gets into the Speaker's office first wins? If everything depends upon who has the fastest system of communications at his disposal, then the person who has a Mercedes car and a FAX machine will never be on the wrong side of the law."

And even if the party authorities wished to expel certain members as a disciplinary measure, they were bound to follow certain procedures according to the Dal constitution. "The members," said Morarka, "should have been served with a show-cause notice, their case referred to the party disciplinary committee so that they could respond to the allegations levelled against them. If even after that they had been found guilty, they could be expelled. But what Bommai did was completely arbitrary and unreasonable."

The former secretary-general of the Lok Sabha, Subhash C. Kashyap, went further: "The split, without a doubt, came first. So how could Mr Bommai expel some people who didn't belong to his party in the first place. That's like Rajiv Gandhi expelling certain members of the Bharatiya Janata Party."

AJAY VERMA

The entire episode left the Speaker's office besmirched, with Rabi Ray's impartiality being questioned by political leaders, the media and ordinary citizens

The Indian Constitution does not confer Ray the right to either recognise a split in a political party or even declare a group of MPs "unattached". The Tenth Schedule, which applies to all such situations, has it that the presiding officer of the Lok

Chandra Shekhar with his camp followers: upset with the Speaker's ruling

Sabha only comes into the picture when a petition is presented to him by a party asking for the disqualification of a member or more on the grounds that he has disobeyed the party whip.

The Speaker is then obliged to enquire into the matter and ascertain why the member has disobeyed the party directive. If the member claims that the parent party has split and he now owes allegiance to the new group, the Speaker has to conduct investigations and find out the actual strength of the group. If it comprises one-third of the membership of the original party, he recognises the group as a separate party. If not, the members against whom the complaint has been made risk disqualification under the Anti-Defection Act.

Says Subhash Kashyap: "Expulsion does not concern the Speaker. It is purely a party affair and is not mentioned in the Constitution."

Constitutional expert Dr L.M. Singhvi concedes that going by the Tenth Schedule alone the Speaker does not have any locus standi in recognising a split unless a petition is made to him. "According to certain subordinate legislation, however," he says, "he has to be informed of a split in a political party. But even in that event there is a 30-day time limit, within which the news must be intimated to the Speaker."

The upshot being that the Janata Dal(S) was perfectly within its rights to wait until the day after to inform the presiding officer of the Lok Sabha about the formation of the new party.

The Constitution or the rules of the Lok Sabha do not provide for any such thing as an "unattached" member. The term is only used to distinguish such MPs who have been elected on the ticket of a certain political party—and are therefore distinct from Independents—and now, for some reason

The Janata Dal officially split when the dissidents boycotted the Dal parliamentary party meet convened by V.P. Singh and instead chose to hold their own at Devi Lal's residence on 5 November have left the party and have to be seated in a separate block. Thus, when V.P. Singh, Arun Nehru and Arif Mohammad Khan were expelled by the Congress, they were declared "unattached" and seated elsewhere.

"But this is done only for the sake of convenience," says Kashyap, "and has no significance as far as the Anti-Defection Act is concerned. There is a big difference between doing something to facilitate the working of the House and mischievously declaring a large group 'unattached' so that they can't split the party."

Former Speaker Balram Jhakar, who has also declared a fair number of people unattached, agrees that Ray's action was a trifle suspect. "This was done," he said, "only to hang a Damocles' sword over the rest. I would have conducted thorough enquiries before taking action of any sort. The notice of the Speaker only resulted in a war of nerves."

Ray salvaged his reputation somewhat, by agreeing to review his decision and then giving the dissidents a period of three weeks to reply to the show-cause notice vis-a-vis their disobeying of the party whip. But by then, everyone was seeing political motivations in his every action. Initially Ray's critics argued he has given the rebels a one-week notice period hoping to disqualify them on the 17th, before the special session of Parliament took place on the original date of 20 November. The Janata Dal(S), however, saw through this plan, and preponed the session to 16 November. Ray, therefore, decided to play magnanimous, because the disqualification would have no impact after the motion of confidence in the minority Shekhar government had been passed.

Legalities aside, the entire episode left the Speaker's office besmirched, with his impartiality being questioned by political leaders, the media and ordinary citizens. Says Dr L.M. Singhvi: "What is at stake in the present controversy is the neutrality of the Lok Sabha secretariat, and indeed even the neutrality of the august office of the Speaker. It is necessary that the Speaker's neutrality is beyond reproach, and that this controversy is resolved within the precincts of the Parliament rather than in court-room battles."

But whatever the venue, the resolution will take time. And, perhaps, involve suitable modification of the Tenth Schedule of the Constitution. ●

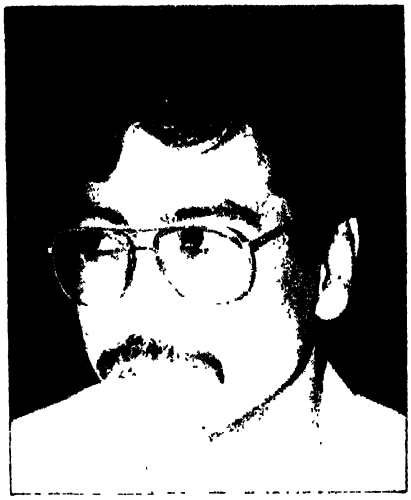
MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

Boys will be boys

It's not Prafulla Mahanta's fault that Assam is in such a turmoil—or is it?



Perplexed readers of my column last week have enquired how it is that I forgot to bid my tearful farewell to our erstwhile minister for law (and steel)—for if the law is an ass, surely the steel must be true—Shri Dinesh Goswami, the sole Representative of the Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) in what used to be called the National Front government (till it proved itself to be a purely Notional Front).

The fact is that I didn't forget. But would a mere paragraph do justice to one who was minister too of justice? Would not an entire column be required to pay true homage to a party which was given the steel portfolio presumably because of its long experience in consigning Assam—and, indeed, the country -to the blast furnace?

And so this column turns its attention once again to the north-eastern reaches of the country, where the once-lovely state of Assam lumbers to the end of five years of the tender ministrations of Dinesh Goswami's betters and superiors, chief minister Prafulla Kumar Mahanta and the most enterprising band of ministers he has gathered about him (—and, with that, you may take your leave, Goswamiji, thank you very much, we won't be needing you any more. Jai ai Ahom, as we say!).

Says Prafulla Mahanta: "I am not happy with Brighu Phukan's functioning as home minister. He has not been able to do justice to the department"

Says Brighu Phukan. "Mahanta is not sincere about implementing the Accord on the basis of which we were elected"

The AGP council of ministers is certainly the most colourful the country has ever seen. Perched at its apex are a chief minister and a home minister who hate each other with a venom they usually reserve for non-upper caste, non-Hindu, non-tribal, non-Assamese speaking settlers in the Brahmaputra Valley, i.e. themselves and their immediate kith and kin. The chief minister has told The Illustrated Weekly of India (11/2/90): "I am not happy with Brighu Phukan's functioning as home minister. He has not been able to do justice to the department." While the home minister, in the same issue of the same magazine, bluntly says: "Mahanta is not sincere about implementing the Accord on the basis of which we were elected to power."

This quarrelsome Odd Couple—hitched together till the electorate (or the Rashtrapatiji—whichever is earlier) shall bundle them out together—has presided over a Cabinet in which a lady minister has been molested (at a Cabinet meeting, no less—and by a Cabinet colleague at that!); where a minister vomited on the conference table with a meeting in progress (not in disgust at the Mahanta-Phukan quarrel, but entirely because of a touch too much of the liquid which the poet Keats described as the "blushful Hippocrene"); where yet another minister has physically assaulted an Opposition MLA on the floor of the House; where still another minister has belaboured a foreign tourist who had the gall to occupy a room—reserved in the name of the tourist—in the Manas Sanctuary, to which the minister had taken a passing fancy: where the home minister (no less!) had an Indian Airlines passenger beaten to a pulp in the aircraft itself because the passenger had the temerity to not surrender his duly allotted seat to a minion of the man who, by the people's will, represents the awful Majesty of the Law in Assam; and where the list of financial scandals extends from the felling of trees for railway sleepers (accused: minister of forests, who also happens to be the chief minister!) by way of the potato seeds scandal and the Mathala Tea Estate scandal and the zoo meat supply scandal and the Statfed rice supply scandal etc., etc., etc., to the cooperative scandal inviting strictures from the Guwahati High Court (accused: minister of cooperation, who also happens to be—surprise! surprise!—the chief minister!). No wonder the greatest living writer of the Assamese language, Homen Borgohain, has this to say about the AGP "boys" in reply to a questionnaire given him (and others) by Assam's shiny new English-language newspaper, The North East Times:

> "They (the AGP) have introduced a different political culture, if you can call it a culture, which is totally devoid of refinement and respect for moral values...I do not mean to say that all politicians before them were saints and only the AGP politicians are a bunch of rogues. But they frighten me by their arrogance, intolerance, bad manners and disrespect for our age-old values."

And yet it was not so long ago that much of our national press (by which I mean, of course, the provincial press of the smallest Union Territory of our land—the blessed capital city of Delhi) went bananas over the brave "boys" of the All-Assam Students Union (AASU) and the Asom Gana Sangram Parishad (AGSP), whose greatest virtue was that they tickled the palate of our intelligentsia by pitting themselves against Indira Gandhi long after the tired old men of the Janata Party had slaughtered each other to a collective genocide in the battlefield of democracy.

Significantly, the rise of the Assam agitation in the summer of 1979 coincided with the disintegration of the first Janata experiment. With delicious irony (for "history," as I keep citing T.S. Eliot, has indeed "many cunning passages"), the collapse of the AGP is being hastened by the disintegration of the second Janata experiment. From hotch-potch to hotch-potch, it has taken 11 long blood-stained years for the vicious narrow-mindedness and violence-riddled chauvinism of the AGP to work itself out to this denouement.

And if you consider that too harsh a judgment on the "boys", please reflect for a moment on what home minister Phukan has to say in justification of his failure to take stern action against ULFA: "After all, these ULFA boys are from amongst us"! (Illustrated Weekly, 11/2/90). Who is the shikari, then—and who the prey?

The story goes back to 1826, the year the East India Company seized much of present-day Assam and its surrounding hill tracts from the Burmese under the Treaty of Yandaboo. It was a thinly-populated, indeed, a virtually unpopulated valley, richer far in natural resources than its carefree indigenous people cared—or, perhaps, even wished—to know. Came tea. Came oil. Came the laying of railway lines. Each new industry needed labour. And the labour was brought in from elsewhere. The boom in the economy led to a boom in population. And the population had to be fed. For which practitioners in paddy cultivation were needed. In they came from Mymensingh and virtually every other district of what today is Bangladesh but was then very much India. For close on 150 years, the economic development of Assam has been fuelled by labour and enterprise imported from outside the state. But over that same period of a century and a half, Assam has been home to generation upon generation of so-called "outsiders" who have known no home, no land, no hearth other than the gentle soil of Assam itself. Some have indeed grown rich. Most have remained desperately poor. The wretchedness of poverty is the common inheritance of all of Assam's people, whatever the provenance of their forefathers. The richness of the land is equally the inheritance of all of Assam's people, whatever the provenance of their forefathers. The central issue in Assam is: should the state be the priviledged preserve of the Ahoms alone—or does it belong to all the legitimate citizens of India who live there, whatever the language they speak, whatever the religion they follow, whatever the rites and rituals they own? Or, as India Today (15/4/83) put it, with that delightful penchant for mixing metaphors which is the hallmark of the magazine's personal revenge on the mother-tongue of our former colonial masters:

> "(The task is to) darn the torn socio-cultural fabric of the polyglot state."

In the only continuous sheaf of ten pages where India Today has never mixed a metaphor, Arun Shourie gave a blow-by-blow account of the telexes before the Nellie massacre. India Today failed to mention that Shourie had played Socrates to the murderous thugs of the AASU/AGSP

The AASU/AGSP agitation (which fathered the AGP as a political party) deliberately confused the "outsider" with the "foreigner". Fantastic figures were bruited about—five million, at one stage; six million, at another; even seven million, in its more fanciful flights—of the number of "foreigners" to be found illegitimately lurking in the valley. Former chief election commissioner R.K. Trivedi hit the nail on the head when he told India Today (15/3/83): "The agitators do not merely want an enumeration of the foreigners—they want a redefinition of the term 'citizen'."

It was through deliberately fostered confusion between "outsiders" and "foreigners" that the AASU/AGSP agitators gave the entirely justified concern over the preservation of the Assamese language an ugly, bull-headed, violent visage. For six years—from 1979 till the Assam Accord of 15 August, 1985—Assam was held to ransom. In the guise of ridding Assam of "foreigners", hatred was stoked against every ethnic, linguistic and religious minority in the state. The Bodos banded themselves and other anti-AASU tribal groups into the Plains Tribals Council of Assam (PTCA). The Bengalis of the Barak valley were virtually compelled to declare UDI. The Marwaris simply paid up. The Muslims huddled in fear of their lives. (There is nothing the ULFA does today that they didn't learn from the AASU/AGSP. They are, indeed, as Phukan has so perceptively put it, "from amongst us"!)

In these circumstances, the Indira Gandhi government decided in 1983 to let the people of Assam determine whom they wanted to have run their state for them—the wild-eyed agitators, the discredited Janata Party or the Congress-on-the-comeback-trail. Preferring, as ever, the anarchy of agitation to the discipline of democracy (in the usual spirit of anything goes that gives grist to the editorial mill), the press and the intelligentsia worked themselves into paroxysms of indignation over Indiraji's decision to call an election that was, in any case, due. Foul, cried the pressgentsia, no elections because

(i) the Congress will win (tauba! tauba!), and

(ii) the Constitution does not provide for "elections" but for "free and fair elections".

Conveniently overlooking the fact that elections would not be "free and fair" only because the agitators opposing the elections would ensure they would not be "free and fair", the pressgentsia denounced the democrats and hailed the anarchists. And then went on to darkly prophesy that if Indiraji persisted with elections there would be unmatched violence. (In a curious reversal of conventional morality, the pressgentsia had nothing but condemnation for the advocates of peaceful, non-violent elections—and nothing but praise for the advocates of bloody reprisals against innocent Bodos, Muslims and any other ethnic minority seeking justice at the polls!)

If, of course, there is a Muslim to bash up, can Arun Shourie be far behind? So he gave India Today (15/5/83)—in the only continuous sheaf of ten pages where India Today has never mixed a metaphor—a blow-by-blow account of every wireless and telex message exchanged between the law-and-order authorities in the fateful weeks that led in February 1983 to the massacre of 1,383 innocent women and children (and some men) in ten villages in and around Nellie (in future chief minister Prafulla Kumar Mahanta's home district of Nowgong) by Lalung tribals armed with daos (machetes) incited, organised and armed by AASU activists to disrupt the electoral process even if it meant butchering over a thousand poor innocents. Gushingly describing the writer as "Magsaysay-award winning journalist and author ARUN SHOURIE" (capitals theirs, not mine!), India Today failed to mention that Shourie had played Socrates to the murderous thugs of the AASU/AGSP and was entirely at one with them in thought and deed. Instead, nurturing their scoop as lovingly as they had the grisly photographs of what the AASU/AGSP and its supporters (and, ergo, Shourie) had done to these hundreds of poor, murdered innocents, India Today gave full play to Shourie's fulminations against the intelligence agencies for "conjuring up the RSS"—but did not draw their readers' attention to Shourie's abject—but entirely motivated and partisan—failure to regard as germane to the issue anything of what India Today itself (why go elsewhere?) had to say about the goondas who were behind the killings at Nellie and Gohpur (and who, from 1985 to 1990, were to assume the reins of government in Assam). A sampling (as India Today might itself say):

- "The leaders of the agitation must recognise that they cannot escape the blame for the frenzied spilling of blood." (Editorial, India Today, 15/3/83)
- At Gohpur, "Bodo tribals, supporters of pro-poll PTCA, were enraged because of intimidation from the Assamese". (Dubashi and Sen, India Today, 15/3/83).

Home minister Phukan has this to say in justification of his failure to take stern action against the ULFA: "After all, these ULFA boys are from amongst us!" Who then is the shikari and who the prey?

- "Pro-election Muslims (said the agitators) must be socially ostracised and anybody trading with them would be fined Rs. 500." (ibid)
- In the weeks leading to the massacre "people from 'other places' (clearly AASU/AGSP activists) were seen coming to Assamese (i.e. non-Muslim) villages—Mukuria, Palaguri, Silbhata—and holding closed-door meetings with AASU leaders". (ibid, my italics, my parentheses)
- "The refugees display a despairing resolve not to leave the region. Says Rajab Ali, who lost his mother and brother: "Where can we go?" (ibid)
- There is a growing lobby in the AASU that makes a fine distinction between 'refugees' meaning Hindus who ought by right to be allowed to stay on in 'Hindustan' and 'infiltrators' who are, by implication, Muslims" (India Today, 31/3/83)
- "The most dangerous aspect of the Assam situation is what seems to be a deliberate attempt to keep the population split along communal lines...both the BJP and the Jamaat-e-Islami have been engaged in actions that can only threaten Hindu-Muslim unity." (India Today, 30/4/83: so much for the knickerwallah's fulminations against the Intelligence Agencies "conjuring up the RSS"!)

And after the 1983 elections were over, the violence did not stop. It continued, showing that it was not elections and violence that were interconnected, but the AASU/AGSP and violence that were inseparable. Indeed, India Today (30/4/83), in a triumphant mixed metaphor, pronounced:

> "Like a cancer, the violence continues to spread, taking lives and burning down villages" (sic!)

In the week that this article is to be published, the new Prime Minister will have to decide whether "free and fair elections" are possible under the benign dispensation of the Mahanta Mafia—or whether a spell of President's Rule is the only salve available to the state. Since our new Prime Minister is both a socialist and a conjuror with words, let me leave him reflecting on the condition of Assam under the AGP in the inimitable verses of the immortal Faiz:

Jab kabhi bikta hai bazaar mein
mazdoor ka ghosht,
Shahraon pe gharibon ka lahu
bahta hai.
Aag si sine mein rah-rahke ubalti

Apne dil par mujhe qabu hi nahi

When the flesh of poor workmen is sold in the marketplace,
And the streets run red with the blood of the destitute,
A nameless rage bursts into flame within my breast
And I am left with no control of my being!●

Reddy for the attack

A notoriously noisy nonentity

The name is more familiar than the face. For four years now, Jaipal Reddy has been heard rather than seen. Most people still don't know what he looks like or even who he is. But every newspaper reader has been entertained by his witticisms and insults which feature on the front pages with unfailing regularity.

Jaipal Reddy belongs to a long and glorious tradition of Indian politics: the rootless windbag. His predecessors are men as diverse as K.K. Tewari and Subramaniam Swamy and like them, he will never count for much on the basis of his following, but will always attract journalistic attention because of the tenor of his utterances.

The difference, perhaps, is that while other windbags get somewhere eventually (Tewari was a minister of state during the Rajiv raj while Swamy is a Big Cheese now), Reddy remains a noisy nonentity. The last time he made a bid for some authority (as president of the Janata Dal), he got nowhere and even V.P. Singh, who had originally urged him to stand, withdrew his support.

Reddy belongs to a long and glorious tradition of Indian politics: the rootless windbag. His predecessors are men as diverse as K.K. Tewari and Subramaniam Swamy

No matter. Despite such reverses, Reddy remains a good-natured, publicity-loving sort, willing to say anything that is necessary to keep his name in the headlines.

Take his recent statements.

Why did the V.P. Singh government fall?

Because the BJP withdrew support, surely?

No way. That's not the way Reddy tells it.

His version: it fell because the names of the Bofors beneficiaries were about to be revealed and Rajiv Gandhi wanted V.P. Singh out of office. (So, was L.K. Advani acting at Rajiv's behest? Don't ask. Few of Reddy's statements bear that kind of examination.)

Or how about this one, a few days before Chandra Shekhar took over? "Chandra Shekhar can become Prime Minister only in his dreams." But surely, Shekhar was on the verge of getting the job...Never mind. For Reddy, it is unimportant that what he says make sense. It must just sound dramatic enough to be quoted.

If all this suggests a bitter, twisted K.K. Tewari sort, perish the thought. Up close, Jaipal Reddy has a talent to amuse just as much as he has one to abuse. Why does he take up so many columns of newsprint then with bombastic utterances that have only a tenuous connection with reality?

His answer: he does it to defend his leader, V.P. Singh. "VP is a loner," he explains, "he doesn't cultivate friends easily. Somebody had to speak on his behalf."

But could anybody defend the shenanigans that passed for governance in the Raja's day?

Reddy has another answer ready: "The government was earthshaking and characterised by dynamic instability."

And then Reddy is off, words flowing forth in a torrent of speech, the thoughts tumbling out as fast as his brain can translate them into English from his native Telugu.

On Chandra Shekhar: "He led the party for 11 damn years. He is just a tenuous manipulator. But I am no more the romantic idealist who was a blind follower of his."

On V.P. Singh: "A gentleman who has proved to be a man! At the very height of the self-immolation spree, he stated that what had been given could not be taken away."

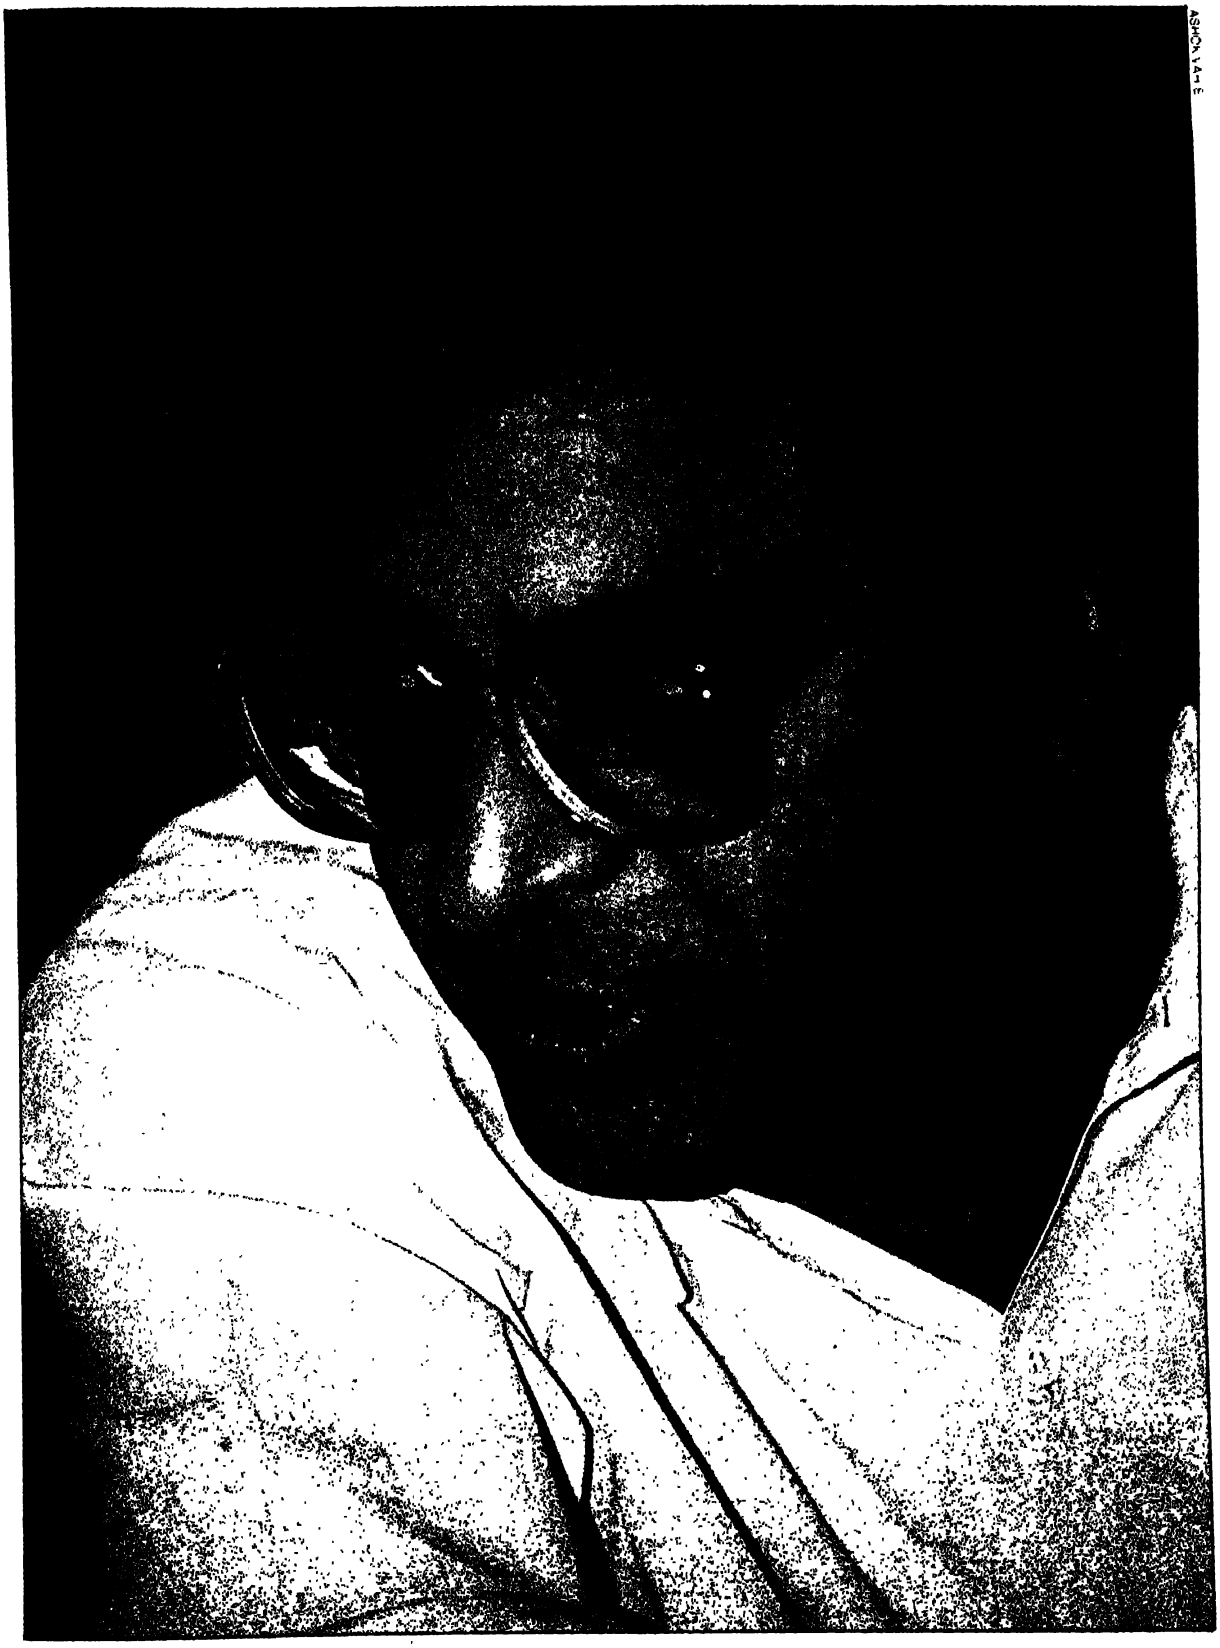
On the Janata Dal split: "It is an act of multiple betrayal of the people's chastity."

And so on. It does not always make sense. But you watch. It'll find its way into Sight and Sound. Into Voices. And into every quotes-of-the-week column.

And as long as they spell the name right, why should Reddy mind?

FOR ALL this, Jaipal Reddy does have a political background. He was a Congressman who opposed the Emergency and found himself expelled from the party. He then became a founding member of Janata and stood by the party through thick and thin, eventually ending up in the Janata Dal after the last round of mergers.

His problem is that while he has enough support to ensure some prominence in Andhra Pradesh politics (he spent four terms as an MLA from Kalvakurti), he is a nonentity at the national level. He lost the Lok Sabha poll from Mahboob Nagar and has scurried back to Delhi only on the basis of N.T. Rama Rao's goodwill.



This is ironic because NTR's dislike of Reddy is well known and the former Andhra chief minister agreed to give him one of the two Rajya Sabha seats the National Front could win from Andhra this year only after V.P. Singh used all his powers of persuasion.

So is Reddy's loud support for the Raja a case of quid pro quo? Is this why he abuses Chandra Shekhar, his former Janata comrade, now?

Reddy denies the allegations. He backs VP, he says, because he believes in him.

And why does he spend so much time abusing his rivals?

Well, look at it this way: would any of us have heard of him otherwise? ●

YES, IT IS THE RAJA!

Despite the change of government, Upendra's poodle continues to be faithful to him. Or why would Doordarshan cover the former Prime Minister V.P. Singh's encounters with the masses on the lawns of his 1 Teen Murti residence, and telecast them during the national news?

Perhaps, there was a case for showing the deposed PM on TV, if only to prove that Mandi

V.P. Singh: Upendra does the trick yet again

House has nothing against losers. But what surprised viewers was that the Raja came on to criticise the newly-sworn in Prime Minister, Chandra Shekhar, if only obliquely. The new government had come to power only because of the efforts of capitalists, VP suggested, while Ram Vilas Paswan tried to squeeze himself into the frame.

There may be more to Upendra's PR skills than the press can understand, after all.

TRADE GAMES

[redacted] Yes, he's always been one to spring surprises. But even by the Tau's standards, his behaviour at the Tenth International Trade Fair was bizarre, to say the least.

The deputy prime minister was not among the special invitees; after Chandra Shekhar had declined to attend, the PM's principal secretary B.G.Deshmukh had been roped in as the chief guest.

But Deshmukh was only halfway-through his address, when the impressive bulk of Devi Lal walked in. Amid general consternation, the chairman of the Trade Fair authority, Moosa Raza rushed towards the door to greet the unexpected guest, a seat was hurriedly vacated for him on the dais and the Chaudhary settled in to listen to Deshmukh.

To the principal secretary's credit, he

DANCE, LITTLE LADY, DANCE

Delhi audiences were treated to a rare glimpse of Meenakshi Seshadri, the classical dancer, on the occasion of the silver jubilee of the Indian Cultural Society. But the actress disappointed with a rather dismal display of Odissi, belieing the fact that she'd been trained by the legendary Guru, Kelucharan Mahapatra.

But Seshadri's bombast survived the new avatar. Said the actress: "Now that I am restarting my romance with dance, I want to prove that I can be a master of all forms, Bharatanatyam, Kathak, Kuchipudi and Odissi."

Also on the anvil are plans to set up an institute that would teach all forms of dance and make a tele-serial, Asthanaika, which "epitomises Indian womanhood, portraying her in all the roles of wife and beloved".

Films will continue alongside. For, as Seshadri confesses: "I am where I am because of them."

gamely continued speaking, and concluded by asking Lal to say a few words.

What followed was vintage Tau. A sample: "Trade mein hum bahut peechche hain. Yeh to hona hi tha. Abhi haal ki Asian Games ko hi dekh lo. China ne subko hara diya. (We are lagging behind in trade. That was bound to happen. Look what happened at the Asian Games. China beat everyone.)"

No, we don't get that either.

BACK IN THE SADDLE

You can take the captaincy away from Imran Khan—though only when he's willing to give it up—but you can't take Imran Khan away from the captaincy.

And now that the "second-rate" New Zealand team is back after a thorough drubbing at the hands of the Pakistani Test team, Imran has decided to reclaim his seat. He will take over as skipper on the West Indies tour, with Javed Miandad obligingly stepping down to "concentrate" on his batting.

Until Imran loses interest in the job, yet again, no doubt.

Imran Khan: taking over from Javed Miandad

DURGAPRASAD

FOR OLD TIMES SAKE

He'd been a regular for more than a decade. Nonetheless, the staff at the Ritz, a three-star Bombay hotel, were thrown into a tizzy when Chandra Shekhar dropped in for a bit during his visit to the city. For, now their honoured guest was also the Prime Minister of India.

Not that it made any difference to Shekhar's demeanour. While his security staff ran circles around him, the PM decided to use his regular room number 307, which had been kept ready on the off chance to freshen up and have a cup of tea.

After that, it was time for a courtesy meeting with the management of the hotel, which found that the prime ministership had not changed Shekhar in the least.

Said the secretary to the hotel's manager: "I have never known a man who is as polite as Chandra Shekhar. He loves Indian food and contrary to what people say I have never known him to order alcohol at the hotel. But now that he is Prime Minister, I don't think he will stay here."

Well, he can take comfort from the fact that, if expert political opinion is anything to go by, Shekhar won't be Prime Minister for long.

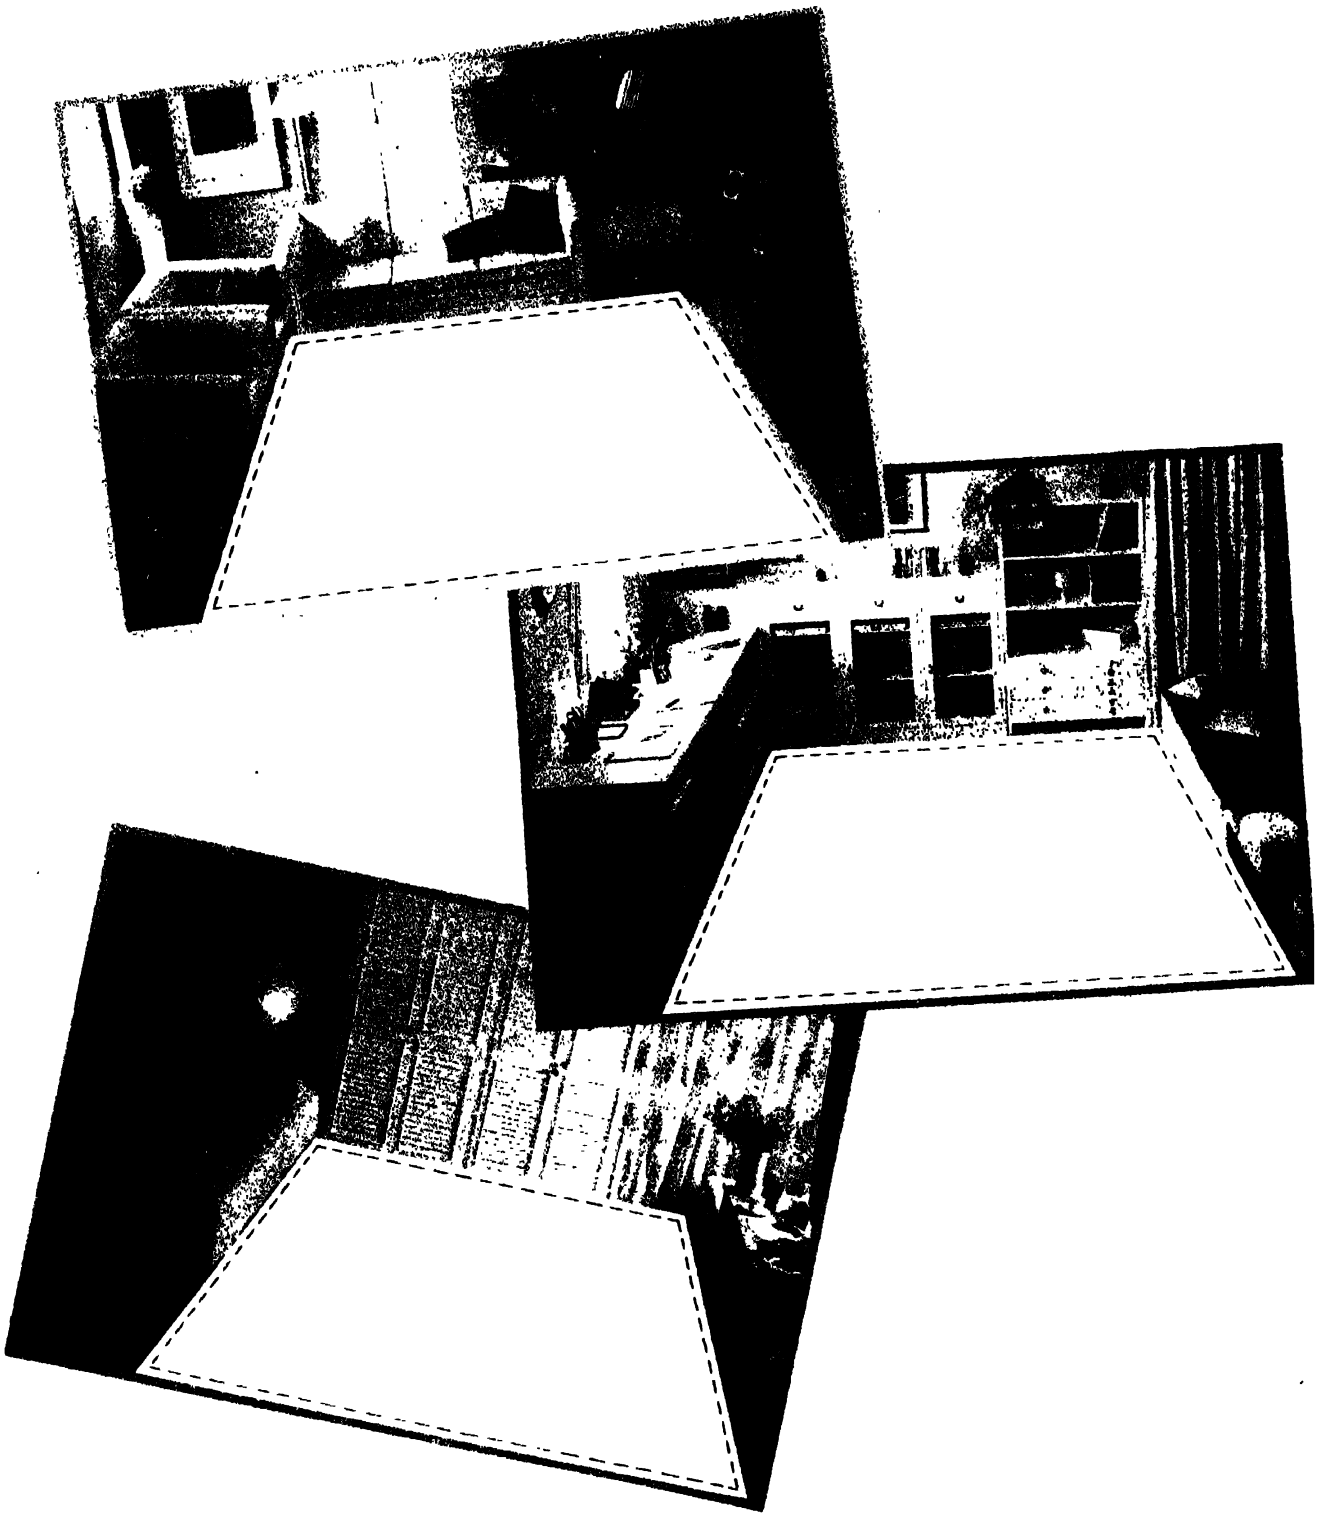
WANTED: AN APOLOGY

[redacted] After a month long silence on her husband's suicide, Rekha has finally decided to take her critics head-on. And she's started with film glossy Cine Blitz, which carried a cover story on the Macabre Truth Behind Mukesh Aggarwal's Suicide.

In a notice issued by her lawyer Anand Grover, the actress has asked the magazine for an unconditional apology and damages worth Rs 1 crore for her, and Rs 50 lakhs for her secretary Farzana, with interest thereon at the rate of 21 per cent from 31 October, 1990.

Calling the article, "completely false and grossly per se defamatory" of Rekha and Farzana, Grover contended that the least Cine Blitz could have done was "wait for my clients to come back to India and verify the facts from them personally".



If the magazine refused to apologise and pay up, Rekha and Farzana would take "appropriate action".

There promise to be interesting times ahead.●

INTERVIEW

"We are leaving a difficult legacy"

Former finance minister Madhu Dandavate on what went wrong with the economy, policies, and more

NITIN RAI

By any reckoning, the 'professor' had a difficult task: reduce a scary deficit, debt, and inflation. For a while, it looked as if the recently deposed National Front government's respected money man would actually pull it off. Then came self-proclaimed socialist bandwagoners such as Chandra Shekhar. The Raja backtracked on all his policy promises—no liberalisation, no economic future, nothing at all. And then, came Saddam Hussein with his conquest of Kuwait, creating a scenario that looks frighteningly like 1973. Finally, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank were breathing down India's neck.

Dandavate washed up. He got defensive about deficit and raised taxes and levies, for which numerous citizens are unlikely to forgive him. Because, things have never been so expensive, and the term 'purchasing power' has been reduced to a joke. Less than a week after he lost office, and three days after Chandra Shekhar took over as Prime Minister on 9 November, Dandavate spoke to SUNDAY*'s* Ritu Sarin in New Delhi. What comes out is that the professor still thinks and talks like a finance minister. Excerpts from the interview:

SUNDAY: When the Janata Dal came to power last year you said the government had inherited empty coffers. Are you leaving behind emptier coffers?

Madhu Dandavate: I had said publicly at that time that when the Prime Minister says we have inherited empty coffers it is a figurative way of describing the state of economy of the country. It does not mean that the coffers are physically empty.

The leader of the Opposition, Rajiv Gandhi, had then asked during a Parliament debate that while the Prime Minister is saying the coffers are empty, the finance minister has contradicted that. I quietly got up and pointed out to Rajiv Gandhi that my comment is that my Prime Minister's statement is an understatement, because I can even understand empty coffers but what we see is even worse than that.

The economic situation when we took charge, and at the point of our leaving must be viewed against the background of certain internal and external factors. I had said during my (1990 Union) budget speech that when we took over, the estimate of deficit was to the order of Rs 18,920 crores. At that time, the external debt was about Rs 82,000 crores. Then, for the entire year the total amount that we would have been required to pay for internal and external borrowing was Rs 17,000 crores. The rate of inflation was 8 per cent and foodstocks in the country had dwindled down from 20 million tonnes to about 10 million tonnes. The foreign exchange reserve position was such that it was adequate only to have imports for three weeks. It is against this background that I had started managing the economy.

Q: These were your liabilities. What sort of legacy are you leaving behind for your successor?

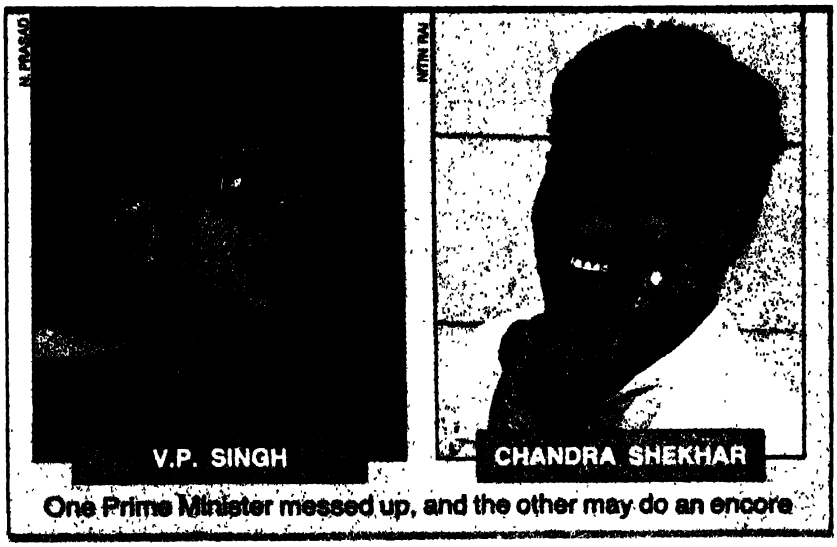
A: These were the actual, visible indicators of the economy when we took over power. I was not talking about projected deficits or debts, but the figures already arrived at.

Then, I started projecfing certain targets, deficits, tax collections and all that. In fact, I was congratulated that I was able to project a deficit of the order of Rs 7,206 crores by the end 1990-91. Then the Doubting Thomases had raised the question as to what guarantee was there that I would be able to restrain the deficit? To that my reply was that I was also introducing a monitoring system for the budget and I assured (them) that every four months I will appear before Parliament and report through a written statement about the performance of my efforts. And I am very happy to say that when I presented the first statement to Parliament even those who were ideologically opposed to me at least congratulated me modestly.

Q: Are you saying the Gulf crisis upset all your calculations?
A: Grave constraints developed because of it. For instance, before 1 September we find that the price of oil imported from the Arab countries was about US $14-16 per barrel. And the maximum it went up was (of course it fluctuates) to the order of US $40.

Please realise that when the price of imported crude oil increases even by one dollar the additional burden thrown on our coffers is Rs 400 crores. Based on the fluctuations we had calculated the additional burden for 12 months. It was to the order of US $2.8 billion (Rs 5,040 crores at current exchange rates)! And if by chance the average is upgraded from US $25 to US $35 per barrel, the additional impact would be to the order of US $3.9 to 4 billion!

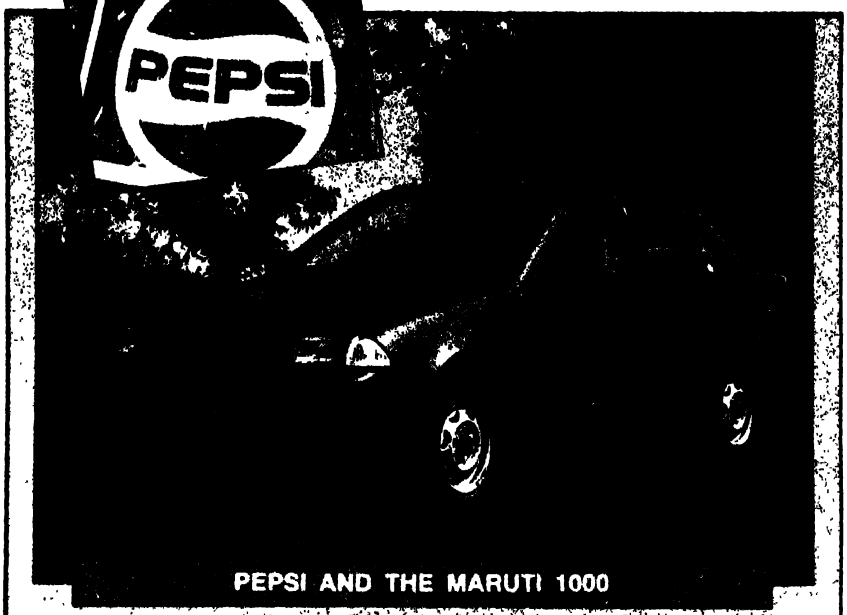


Secondly, as a result of the crisis we lost remittances from Kuwait and Iraq to the order of US $200 million(Rs 360 crores). And because of the crisis also the value of exports we lost out to these two countries was US $100 million.

Q: How seriously was the balance of payments (BOP) situation affected?
A: As far as the first four months (of the fiscal year 1990) are concerned, compared to the first four months last year, the BOP situation had marginally improved. Now if you see Moody's (a New York-based agency which, among other things, assesses the credit status of countries) report, it states that India's BOP situation is as it is because of the Gulf crisis, the instability created in the country because of recent agitations, and dislocations in production. They (Moody's) mention the Babri Masjid and Ram Janmabhoomi agitations. They say that this resulted in a loss of tourism (revenue) and the credit status of the country had gone down by two grades.

I must admit it was because of all this that we started losing our foreign exchange reserves to the extent of Rs 500-600 crores every month. So, our BOP has also gone up by about Rs 1,000 crores and would stand today at about Rs 3,800 crores.

Therefore, the recent steps I took to check this outflow—everyone agreed they were inescapable. When I find that the imported crude prices have risen by 100 per cent, then naturally, unless I have the resource mobilisation we would not have the money for import. Availability of oil came later. The steps were the following: number one, I put a 25 per cent surcharge on petroleum products and at the same time on corporate taxation I had to put an additional surcharge of 7 per cent. Through that we tried to mop up something. Not that it was adequate but it was an indicator of our direction. I must tell you frankly that when faced with such a crisis we try to have commercial borrowings from foreign countries and bilateral assistance which may not just be in the form of loans. And therefore, also, the legacy which I would have left in the normal process would have been improved deficits, improved foodgrains stocks, better foreign exchange reserves. But as a result of this oil crisis, I am afraid we are leaving a legacy of a very difficult BOP position and that is the root of many problems.



Q: Is this the only reason why India has suddenly become so unpopular with the International Monetary Fund (IMF)?
A: That is part of the problem. The legacy of the oil crisis would have been extremely sad had it not been for certain concrete—though unpopular—steps we had taken. As a result, there is a pruning down of the burden we would have put on the government. We want to see that whatever government is in power, it does not face the foreign exchange difficulties to the extent they are created.

One Prime Minister messed up, and the other may do an encore

We have tried to enter into certain contracts for exports with other countries. We have made a contract with Japan for more than Rs 1,000 crores for iron ore. There are other contracts for surplus agricultural commodities and, if everything goes well, it will be a contract of the order of Rs 2,000 crores.

Also, there is an extended structural facility from the IMF and we can get some money through that. But for that there is a very severe condition imposed by the IMF. And one of the reasons why the IMF has become unpopular with us, and we with them, is because they tried to impose a very severe conditionality upon us. India resented, this and they (the IMF) are angry because we did not accept this conditionality. That is how the relationship has become strained.

PEPSI AND THE MARUTI 1000

Consumerism will not be affected with the new government

Q: Will the change in government affect IMF negotiations?
A: I have even tried to sort out the conditionality clause with the IMF. My strategy was: for all times let India try to manage the resource mobilisation in such a manner that no creditor who gives us assistance will say you are only taking money from us and not raising it internally. Organisations like the IMF and the World Bank often feel that India solely relies on credit facilities and does nothing else.

Even when the oil crisis was not there I had a levy on petroleum products. This time I again tried to impose it. We have augmented exports and cut down consumption. There has been a 50 per cent reducton in the rate of increase of consumption of petroleum products as compared to last year.

This time too I added gulf surcharge and corporate taxation. Having done all this I don't think it will be very difficult for even a new government to get assistance for IMF loans if they go on arguing with them properly. My attitude with the IMF has been that whatever be the grudges against a particular loan or assistance when such a super crisis has taken place... And let me tell you that if the price of a barrel of crude is US $38-40; if war breaks out it may even go up to US $100 and I shudder to think about what will happen.

Q: What is the rate of inflation in India today? While it is officially put at nine per cent, many economists feel it has touched 12-13 per cent. Is this true?
A: No, no. As yet double figures have not been reached and inflation is still nine per cent. You see, even our money supply rate was checked and inflation was not as high as it was expected to be. Only, the foreign exchange position deteriorated and I must admit it has been worrisome.

Q: But for instance, the price of tea has gone up by over 60 per cent in one year and the price of sugar is up by 50 per cent. What else is this if not runaway inflation?

AJIT SINGH

His industrial policy may come in for attack

A: It is like this: some commodities have been restrained and some commodities have been very bad. Now tea and cement have been restrained but edible oil has been bad. But these are not linked up with the macro-economic picture.

Q: What will the effect of a Gulf war be on the Indian economy?
A: The way the Iraqi leaders are behaving, one will not be surprised if war breaks out soon and everything depends on what happens there. The economic plight of the UK and America are before you. It (the international situation) has already deteriorated.

Q: In such an event, will the Chandra Shekhar government have to resort to a further hike in petrol prices?
A: I don't think they will go up very much.

Q: Do you admit that measures like keeping petrol pumps closed on Sundays and the like were ill-conceived?
A: Therefore we removed them after some time. What we did was that after we put these additional measures, we removed them. At the time they were introduced they were absolutely necessary.

Q: In the past few months a sharp decline in the rate of tax collection has been noticed. The amount of direct taxes due to the government is now over Rs. 6,000 crores. This is becoming a serious problem, isn't it?
A: That is exactly what the Moody's report has said. In many large sectors of the country there have been disturbances for 15-20 days in a month. There have been communal disturbances, curfews. As a result, production had suffered, exports had suffered and tourism had suffered. Naturally then, our tax collections also suffered.

As far as the direct taxes and income tax are concerned, they are not like the customs duty and excise duty. There are certain assessment dates by which you can pay up. But it (tax collection) has gone down. Generally, all the revenue has gone down.

Q: That is precisely the point. How do you rationalise this when we have had the best crop in years and industrial production is up?
A: Let me tell you that despite the customs, excise (shortfalls), compared to last year's figures we have been able to maintain the rate. But the targets which we had projected have not been met. For instance, if you restrain imports in order to check the deficit, then due to the difficult international situation too, the exports are reduced. The excise duty and customs duty collection will naturally suffer more. And though due to hike in petrol prices, (industrial) production has not yet suffered much, all these other factors have had an amalgamated effect.

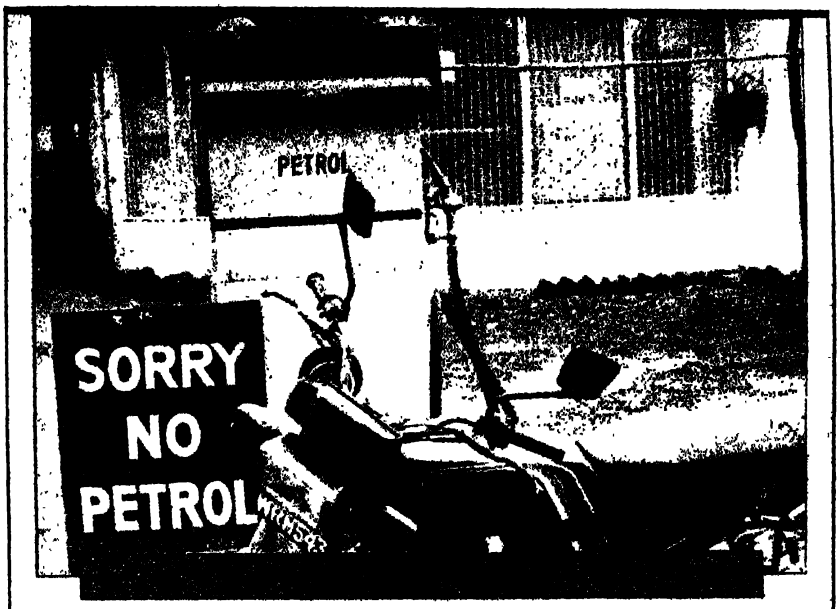
Q: What do you think the Chandra Shekhar government will do with the National Front's much-touted new industrial policy proposals? Will they be canned?



A: You will find that there will be hardly any difference in the industrial policy even with the new government coming in. It was imaginary for anyone to think that after we came in, automatic licencing would go on indiscriminately for foreign companies. We had made it very clear in para 24 of the industrial policy statement that it is automatic only in the case of those items which are manufactured on the select list. There is a positive list and a negative list. And this will eventually become an incentive for production. After all, what have we done?

Let me tell you that the so-called radicals who raised doubts and said that we are selling the country to the multinationals, forgot that so far as assistance coming from the developed countries to the developing countries is concerned, it is only 0.5 per cent of their GDP (Gross Domestic Product). That is all. And out of that a small fraction comes to India. And when eastern Europe gets opened up, that amount will be further decreased. So, there is no question whatsoever about you being swarmed by foreign capital.

Some people have created the impression that the whole world is in a queue and we are saying 'come on, come on', we are importing foreign capital. It is actually nothing like that.

Q: When your government took over, the impression created was that the entire thrust of the economy would be pro-rural and definitely anti-multinational or anti-consumerist. How have projects such as Pepsi and Maruti 1000 come through?

A: We have said this in debates in Parliament and I will say it again: that on merits we have been against Pepsi Cola but since a (previous) government had already entered into an agreement it is a different thing. Government is a continuous process and we have to agree to what has been previously committed. Otherwise also, the whole of Punjab would have been angry.

Threat of a Gulf war and rising oil prices could shatter the economy

Coming back to the industrial policy. The whole question of the industrial policy should be discussed in three sectors. In the largest sector of industry there is no question of foreign investment and it is self-reliant. Even today, in the scheme of things, the major sector in India will be a middle sector in which we will allow foreign investment only in the case of those items which are contained in the positive list. And so, it is restricted and automatic at the same time.

"Some people have created the impression that the whole world is in a queue and we're saying 'come on, come on'... it is actually nothing like that"

So where will we have foreign investment? One, where there is a critical technology gap. Number two, where we need a great degree of modernisation. And number three, where we are required to do it for the augmentation of exports. Here again, the equity ratio will be 60:40, 60 in favour of the Indian collaborator.

Now we come to the third sector, which is the small, export-oriented sector. Here we will not have any inhibitions about 60:40 equity ratio. And I had spoken to many foreigners, all of whom talked about procedural delays. They said they did not even mind a 60:40 equity ratio, but even with that, the procedures are so cumbersome that (they) took months in getting the licences.

Now, according to the new industrial policy, once you are on that particular positive list, you automatically get the licence. We have not kept any restrictions for export-oriented industry from where we want to get foreign exchange.

Q: Do you think this process of 'liberalisation' will continue? Or will it be shelved?

A: On the very second day (after he took over as Prime Minister) I heard Chandra Shekhar's comments on television. His wording was that the new government would continue the present liberalisation policies. So, when you see the grim picture of the Indian economy, then you have to face the reality.

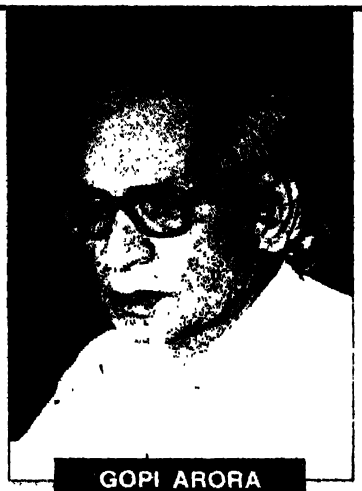
Q: Often, rumours had surfaced about a rift between you and the former industries minister Ajit Singh. What were these disagreements about?
A: There were no disagreements. But I must tell you that even among members of the Cabinet, while their basic thrust can be identical, each one has his own emphasis.

Q: Ajit Singh had, in the recent past, issued a large number of licences to private sugar manufacturers in UP. Were you in favour of this move?
A: This is also a question of emphasis... All the decisions taken by the Cabinet were unanimous.

Q: It is being said that these same sugar barons from UP participated in the moneybag operations in favour of the Janata Dal, while industrialists such as Dhirubhai Ambani and K.K. Birla supported the Chandra Shekhar faction. Do you agree?
A: I am not saying that about any individuals, but for the first time we find that the big businessmen were very active in Delhi. It is a very sad day for India whether one takes the moneybag or not. But it is fact that the moneybags were offered. Many people not taking them is a good thing but that the businessmen had the courage to offer large sums of money is a very sad thing for the country. However, I must say that I think there is a inner vitality in the political life of our country. That under the deadweight of the moneybags still I feel the political structure will not crumble.

Q: Were you happy with the work of the senior bureaucrats who worked with you? Like finance secretary Bimal Jalan and Montek Singh Ahluwalia?
A: Let me tell you, if the minister does not function effectively and does not apply his mind to the policy issues then the bureaucrats rule the roost. And very often, the tendency of a minister is to take credit for all the good things and try to throw the blame on the bureaucrats. When they (the bureaucrats) gave me the sendoff the other day, I said—even while in Opposition—that 'heads I win and tails you lose' should never be the attitude of the ministers towards the bureaucrats. Therefore, I did not rely upon the bureaucrats as you must have seen during the question hour of the finance ministry in Parliament—I was as comfortable with any question

"I did not rely on the bureaucrats... my homework for 20 years was more useful to me than some of the background material they used to supply me with"



because I did not helplessly rely only on the material given to me by them. As an Opposition member for the last 15-20 years, I was taking a keen interest in all subjects of my interest and all the homework that I did for 20 years was more useful to me than some of the background material the bureaucrats used to supply me with. So, if the minister has an initiative, a thrust and a sense of direction, I think bureaucrats have to toe the line.

Q: There are rumours that Gopi Arora will be returning from his IMF posting to become finance secretary again. Will that be a good idea?
A: I don't know. I do not comment on transfers and such matters.

Q: You have said that those who had come to the ministry with clean hands are leaving with clean hands. Did the scandal involving the refund of excise due to industry sully your term in the finance ministry?
A: It has already been settled and cleared. I had intervened and stopped that refund and said that if necessary, amendments can be made. It is like this : even according to the courts, whatever order has appeared, they say if there is an unjust enrichment in the sense that some manufacturers and exporters have paid excess to the government and at the same time they have recovered that by throwing the burden on the consumers and under that circumstance they are given the refund, that means they have got double money. That is an unjust enrichment.

It is the court which says there is a relevance of unjust enrichment and the Bombay High Court has also said that whether there is an unjust enrichment or not, we are not giving the judgment and the writ courts must be utilised to decide that. So far, there was no provision of creating a fund so I said that stop the refund for the present, and let us have the feasibility of a legal modification by which amendment we can create some consumer (welfare) fund, in which that amount can be put. The money cannot go to the government. It cannot even go to the industrialists.

Q: Many political observers feel that fresh elections could be held as early as spring next year. Do you think economic issues, such as inflation, will replace corruption as a major platform?
A: I am afraid social justice and secularism will be the most important election issue. Just as Ram Janmabhoomi upset everything else—I imposed Rs 2,700 crores of burden because of the Gulf crisis, but I could go scot free because the whole country was engulfed in the Ram Janmabhoomi issue. That has brought to the focus the question of secularism, and as a result of the Mandal Commission, the social justice issue has also come to the forefront. And I think they will dominate the election. Inflation and the state of the economy will be diluted and modulated by these issues. Also there is great resentment about the manipulative politics which we have just seen and this will be a issue. As far as the present Chandra Shekhar government is concerned, I feel the landlords are the Congress(I) and the tenants actually form the government. ●

BEVERAGES

The hiss of the Cobra

A 'real' Indian beer makes waves in the UK

It's a bit like shipping coal to Newcastle. Mysore Breweries Ltd (MBL) is exporting loads of lager beer to the UK, a country already flooded with the stuff. After a test launch in April this year, the Bangalore-based company launched its Cobra brand of beer in early November, starting out in one of London's more successful Indian eateries, The Bombay Brasserie. Cobra is billed as the only 'really' Indian beer, brewed and bottled in India.

The net is spreading. Just back from the UK, MBL managing director K.P. Balasubramaniam is upbeat. "On an average," he says, "we are sending four containers (72,000 bottles) a month. For the forthcoming Christmas season, we are likely to send more." At home, MBL makes the Pals and Knock Out beer brands.

Whisky and brandy drinking is on the decline in the UK, thanks to stringent driving laws and anti-alcohol campaigns. And lager beer is the drink for the trendy young Briton, considered by market analysts to be the heaviest spender on alcohol. The 340 or so brands of lager available in the UK are doing booming business, but MBL—a Rs 20 crore company with interests in food and beverages, distilleries and sea-food exports -plans to cash in on a special market.

"Ethnicity is in," says Balasubramaniam, who has lived in the UK as a London School of Economics student. "Thai restaurants serve Thai beer, Singapore restaurants serve Singapore beer, as do the Mexicans. Every ethnic restaurant serves ethnic beer, and we thought why shouldn't the Indian restaurants serve authentic Indian beer?" Hence, Cobra. Balasubramaniam says the beer is ideal with curry meals. "It bites," he says. "But doesn't sting."

The Cobra may not sting diners, but it will have to save some of its venom for the competition. In the imported beer segment, Heineken, an internationally-known Dutch brand, and Budweiser, a lighter beer from the US, dominate the market. "That's why," says Balasubramaniam, "we are targeting it (Cobra) to the Indians and Britishers visiting Indian restaurants, and Indians visiting Indian clubs." The potential market is vast: there are anything between 6,000-7,000 Indian restaurants in the UK. And numerous smaller operations that are not listed.

Cobra hopes to last out in a market that has seen other Indian brands, Elephant and Tiger, to name a few, that have been unsuccessful in the UK market. The most successful has been the Kingfisher brand, manufactured and exported by Bangalore-based United Breweries Ltd (UBL), a division of Vijay Mallya's UB Group. But Kingfisher has moved out of the 'really real' Indian beer slot. "As demand for (the) beer increased, we felt it was more viable to have the beer brewed in Britain," says S.J. Kaul, director and senior vice-president with UBL. "Also, the life of the beer is short. From the day you bottle it, it starts deteriorating, so it was only practical we shift the unit to Britain."

"Ethnicity is in," says MBL's Balasubramaniam, "Thai restaurants serve Thai beer, Singapore restaurants serve Singapore beer, so why shouldn't Indian restaurants?"

"Kingfisher is no different from other beers available in Britain," says MBL's Balasubramaniam. "It's an Indian beer made in Britain." That is why Cobra is unique, he says. Also, Cobra sells in 650 ml bottles, the way it mainly sells in India, unlike the 325 ml variety that is common in the UK. The brand also claims a higher alcohol content—at five per cent, more than British beers, and even Kingfisher's UK incarnation - just the way it is at home.

MBL is not too worried about the Cobra's shelf-life, and claims that the beer will last anything between nine months to a year. And it appears that MBL's associates in the UK believe it too. A&K International, a Fulham-based company which is mainly in the fashion business, is the importer. And Newcastle-based Brent Walker Breweries, a major trade outfit, will distribute Cobra in the UK.

Balasubramaniam hopes that after a successful stint in the UK, MBL will be able to make inroads into the US market. (UB already has a brand there, the Taj Mahal.) Also on the cards is the export of a dark Indian rum—contrary to changing Western drinking habits that increasingly prefer clear spirits—called Captain's Table. For the moment, however, MBL is banking on the Cobra, and its marketing hiss. ●

ESSENTIAL SERVICES

Chaos compounded

Calcutta taxis queuing up for diesel: a nightmare

West Bengal shows India the way to the Stone Age

Everyday life has come to a standstill—almost -as parts of the country reels from the breakdown of essential services. There is an acute shortage of diesel, petrol and cooking gas. The telecommunications system is all but defunct, thanks to the indefinite, nationwide strike by telecom workers. And braving the tricky exercise of living life as usual, the befuddled Indian citizen looks up to see a new face ruling the country. In short: chaos. And here, West Bengal leads the way.

Take the telecom strike, for example. Mahanagar Telephone Nigam workers in Bombay and New Delhi received ad-hoc payment of Rs 100 a month from 1 September. And telecom workers all over the country raised a stink about it—alleging discrimination and demanding similar treatment. Talks fall through, and the class III and IV employees went on an indefinite strike from 3 November. And paralysed long-distance communication by trunk-call, telex, facsimile, and satellite communication links. Most telephones here are dead anyway, and citizens regularly bring out funeral processions mourning the state's telephone system. The strike worsened the situation. Till recently, the STD system worked in telephones lucky enough to be alive, but in the last few days, that too has stopped. And with organisations such as the All India Telephone Operators and Supervisers Association and the Maharashtra Telephone Nigam Ltd supporting the agitation, the communication gap can only grow.

Communication by road, too, is in disarray. Ever since the Gulf crisis, oil supplies to the states have been cut down. But shortage of petrol has not caused such a panic as diesel shortages. Fearing that the diesel crisis would play havoc with the irrigation system and therefore, the rabi crop, the Centre has promised to meet the demands of the agricultural sector which mostly used diesel to operate pump sets. But road transport was left out.

West Bengal, expectedly, was hit the hardest. The perennial shortage of electricity in the state necessitates extensive use of generators, which feed mostly on diesel. To add to the misery, tankers of the Indian Oil Corporation (IOC), which supplies the major share, allegedly strayed from their destinations, to instead supply industries which offered better deals. "The IOC is not cooperating at all," fumes West Bengal transport minister Shyamal Chakraborty. "Not only the IOC," adds Kalyan Bhadra, president of the All India Petrol Dealers Association, "but Hindustan Petroleum too. We have no alternative but to have police escorts," to ensure diesel reaches petrol stations. And though the Centre cut only 10 per cent of supplies, since this is based on last year's demands, the growth in the number of users is unaccounted for—in effect increasing the cuts to 19 per cent.

More trouble. The electricity deficiency of 250-450 MW a day is the norm in West Bengal. Multi-storied buildings have become nightmares with no power to even work the lifts, and no diesel to work the generators. "We are giving priority to multi-storied buildings and nursing homes," says Bhadra. "Obviously, we have to ration the supplies."

Everyday, mile-long queues of taxis, private buses and trucks lead to petrol pumps all over the state which run out of supplies with incredible speed. The inevitable fall-out of a dislocated transportation system: skyrocketting prices.

The oil crunch has also affected the availability of cooking gas. And corrupt practices by distributors, plus a gas tanker strike, has practically left kitchens in the state with no LPG (liquified petroleum gas). And the backlog of about 10 per cent in LPG cylinder orders has backed up still further, to about 25 per cent.

Since kerosene is also in short supply, life is especially tough. Necessity being the mother of invention, Calcuttans have devised a crude way of getting kitchen fuel: by adding 100g of common salt to a litre of diesel, roadside scientists are now preparing kerosene. But diesel being in short supply too, this innovation might not help a great deal.

The stone age beckons—recession is an understatement. And even here, West Bengal could show India the way. ●

■ Doctor in clover

Is Dr Subramaniam Swamy attached to the Prime Minister by his navel? This may seem like a silly question (and no doubt, Dr Swamy will now go off into a sulk and accuse SUNDAY of 'irresponsible journalism', if precedents are anything to go by). But we ask because the good doctor has managed the incredible feat of turning up wherever Chandra Shekhar goes: Jaipur, Bombay, Delhi's riot-hit areas, Rajghat, etc.

Does this mean that Shekhar's economic philosophy is the same as Swamy's abolish-income-tax-and-free-the-economy credo? Not quite. Shekhar's views owe more to Ram Manohar Lohia and D.R. Goyal than they do to Adam Smith and Subramaniam Swamy.

So, regardless of what job Swamy gets in the new dispensation, free-marketeers can spend more sleepless nights: the PM still believes in 1950s socialism. What accounts for Swamy's proximity to Shekhar then? Not much more than a mutuality of political interest. They certainly don't share the same views.

STOCK QUOTE

"At least one appointment was decided the day Chandra Shekhar was sworn in: Mukesh Ambani will be chief economic adviser."

A member of the Indian Express lobby.

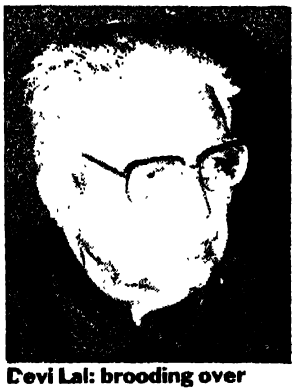
■ Timely profits

At a time when the industrial policy is up for grabs to the highest bidder, half-yearly results from India's top 100 companies come as a revitaliser. Collective operating profit for the six-month period ending 30 September is at Rs 1,613 crores, up 31.5 per cent from the corresponding period last year. Collective net profit for the same period is at Rs 555 crores, up from Rs 395 crores last year. This should surely help out, with more money to absorb shocks. Expenses are bound to mount with rising oil prices - so will production and transportation costs.

The next six months, leading up to year-closing on 31 March 1991 are crucial. It is now that the real effects of the Gulf crisis will hit the industry, bottom lines will flatten out, and profit margins are likely to get still lower (for the end-September 1990 period, the collective profit margin is up a mere one per cent to two per cent from last year, when net profit and operating profit are compared to sales). Margin is going to be the 1991 nightmare for companies. And that is going to lead to cut-throat competition government policy or not. Thank the stars for profit now, if not profitability.

SPECULATION OF THE WEEK

Reshuffling in New Delhi



V.P. Singh stuck with Rajiv's economic team (plus S. Gurumurthy) thus ensuring a degree of certainty. But will Chandra Shekhar shuffle the bureaucrats and advisers around? Those who are definitely out include the afore-mentioned S. Gurumurthy (and things don't look too good for him at the Indian Express, either) and the unfortunate Montek Singh Ahluwalia (see last week's Delhi Diary).

Deepak Nayar's fate is less certain. The chief economic adviser's views are similar to Shekhar's, but the PM is suspicious of his attachment to V.P. Singh. Ditto for finance secretary Bimal Jalan who, as a Stalinist, has something in common with the latest Brezhnevite to occupy the PM's chair. Delhi gossip has it that Gopi Arora may be back from Washington, perhaps as finance secretary. But this is certain to be opposed by the Congress(I) which regards Arora as a traitor.

Certain to be replaced is the chairman of the Board of Direct Taxes (Nariman Point is allergic to him). And there is speculation that R.N. Malhotra's replacement at the Reserve Bank of India will be our old friend the finance manager himself: S. Venkitaramanan.

■ The Sirsa syndrome

That's one the Indian stock markets could do without. Ever since the Raja's regime took off to the political wilderness, the share bazaar has been going around in circles. Because, they have Devi Lal and his brood to contend with. In the week beginning 12 November, rumours suddenly began to fly: the resurrected deputy Prime Minister is throwing his weight around, and wants his son Om Prakash Chautala to become finance minister. In a week in which markets should have spiralled upwards, buoyed by Reliance Industries Ltd, Larsen & Toubro and fancy half-yearly results from the corporate world, they dipped, at least in Bombay, which controls more than 60 per cent of the country's trading. Before they could move up, came another shocker: Lal wants younger son Ranjit Singh to be industry minister. Dip. Fortunately, nothing quite that disastrous may happen. While reining in Devi Lal is like a matador asking a bull out to tea, Chandra Shekhar may stand his ground when it comes to Lal's ilk. ●

CASTE AWAY?

How to have the Mandal cake and eat V.P. Singh up too

RAJESH KUMAR

Which of the three brought V.P. Singh down—Chandra Shekhar, Lal Krishna Advani or Bindeswari Prasad Mandal?

On the face of it, this appears a ridiculous question. We know it was Shekhar and his band of opportunistic dissidents who split the Janata Dal in half, just as we know it was L.K. Advani's Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) which sealed the V.P. Singh government's fate by withdrawing support. So, where does B.P. Mandal now many years dead—come into this?

The answer—though it is hardly ever recognised—is at the beginning.

Advani's rath yatra, after all, was a direct reaction to V.P. Singh's announcement (on 7 August) that the Mandal Commission's recommendations would be implemented. As hordes of commentators have pointed out, Advani felt the Mandal Report threatened to divide the BJP's Hindu vote-bank. The BJP president, of course, has denied time and again that there was any such "linkage", but his protests against the 'No Mandal, no rath' thesis have been completely unconvincing. There was no talk of the yatra before Mandal and, moreover, nobody—not even someone smitten with an overpowering wanderlust—decides to set off on a 10,000 km journey spanning 35 days on the spur of the moment and with under a month for preparation. Especially not a politician as shrewd and calculating as Advani.

The consequences of the yatra, of course, are all too familiar—the halting of the rath and the arrest of Advani, the withdrawal of support by the BJP and, finally, the vote of no-confidence against the V.P. Singh regime. The former Prime Minister has claimed that he sacrificed his government on the altar of secularism, but the truth is that he lost his political head to the sword of Mandal.

Ever since 7 August—the day he made the announcement—V.P. Singh's days were numbered. It may have been Advani who finally toppled him, but even otherwise, the hatred and violence that the Mandal Report inspired would have done the Raja in. By acting on Mandal's recommendations, V.P. Singh—in one stroke—created a powerful array of forces ferociously opposed to him.

By acting on the Mandal Report, V.P. Singh—in one stroke—created a powerful array of forces ferociously opposed to him

SHOOTER

If this appears so odd, it is because almost nobody claimed to be fundamentally opposed to the Mandal Report. Not the Congress Opposition, which initially welcomed and supported V.P. Singh's move. Not the BJP, which won its 80-odd seats in the last Lok Sabha election on a manifesto that promised to implement the Mandal Report. And certainly not the Janata Dal dissidents, who intensified their plotting and scheming following the Mandal announcement. Even the press—which launched an ugly and hysterical campaign against V.P. Singh—rarely, if ever, said it opposed reservations on principle.

Everybody, it seemed, was happy to have the Mandal cake and eat V.P. Singh up too.

Consider first the hypocrisy and doublespeak of the political parties that opposed V.P. Singh over Mandal. The Congress—which gave Mandal two extensions and (in his

Within days, the anti-reservation stir spread like wildfire through much of the urban areas in the cow belt. The Congress and the BJP accepted Mandal, but covertly supported the agitation own words) "full support" when it was the ruling party in 1980—was initially caught off guard. "You will have our unqualified support in the implementation of the report," said P. Shiv Shankar in the Rajya Sabha on the day V.P. Singh made the announcement. The leader of the Opposition in the Upper House also went so far as to suggest that reservations be extended to educational institutions and minorities!

Within days, however, the anti-reservation agitation had spread like wildfire through much of the urban areas in the cow belt. And the Congress, which had seemed to all but applaud V.P. Singh for his attempt to uplift the backwards, began to maintain a deafening silence on the Mandal issue. At the same time, the party did everything it could to lend its support to the snowballing protests in university campuses.

In the capital, Congress(I) students floated the Equality Front—which, among other things, held demonstrations and called a bandh against the implementation of the Mandal Report. The party, however, didn't have the courage to confirm that it had anything to do with it: the Front became a cover for surreptitious anti-reservation activity. Significantly, it did not deny this either.

It was only at the end of August that the Congress evolved an official or formal 'stance' on the Mandal affair. After a protracted meeting of the central working committee, the party equivocated once again. While it did not—as its role at the forefront of the agitation would lead one to expect—reject the Mandal Report outright, the Congress claimed that it was against the concept of reservations based on caste. Rather, the 'Rajiv formula', as it has come to be known, sought to enhance Mandal's recommendations by the "introduction of economic criteria". Among the suggestions: public school students, tax-payers, the landed, etc. be excluded from the ambit of reservations.

These were by no means bad or irrational suggestions. But why was the Congress advancing them? To improve on Mandal, as it self-righteously claimed? Or to distance itself from the report without going so far as to risk rejecting it? Soon enough, the truth was out.

Understandably, Rajiv was asked the obvious question. If he was serious about his 'formula', then would he be prepared to introduce it in a Congress-ruled state such as Andhra Pradesh, which has a reservation system for the backward castes? And, moreover, if he really believed that caste-based reservations divided the country, was he willing to ask chief minister Chenna Reddy to scrap them? The Congress president had no good answers. During a speech in the Lok Sabha, Rajiv was forced to admit that the criteria laid down by his party for job reservations in Andhra and elsewhere were faulty. His defence, however, was pathetic: "Blame for what happened cannot be laid at my door. I was not in

SUBHA IIT PAL

Advani's rath yatra was a direct reaction to V.P. Singh's announcement that the Mandal Commission's recommendations would be implemented. There was no talk of the yatra before Mandal politics then."

After the Congress chief ministers of Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh protested against the position adopted by the Congress (apparently, the talk of economic criteria threatened their own caste-based vote-banks), less and less was heard about the Rajiv formula. Till today, the party's position on Mandal remains unclear. Rather, it is unclear whether the party has a position on it at all.

The BJP's attitude was no less confused. Like the Congress, it did not reject the recommendations and argued that economic criteria must be taken into consideration. And like the Congress again, it used its student organisations to pressure V.P. Singh to back off. Its main grouse was that it wasn't consulted on the implementation decision, despite being an ally of the National Front government. "How could V.P. Singh assume he had our support on this issue?" BJP leaders kept asking.

Both parties ridiculed the motives behind V.P. Singh's sudden decision to act on the report. Here their arguments were more than plausible. There is little doubt that the timing of V.P. Singh's announcement had less to do with the plight of the backwards and more to do with countering the 9 August rally organised by Devi Lal, who had just been ousted as deputy prime minister. The Raja may also have believed that his decision would divide Devi Lal's vote-bank as the Jat leader enjoys a sizeable backward caste following.

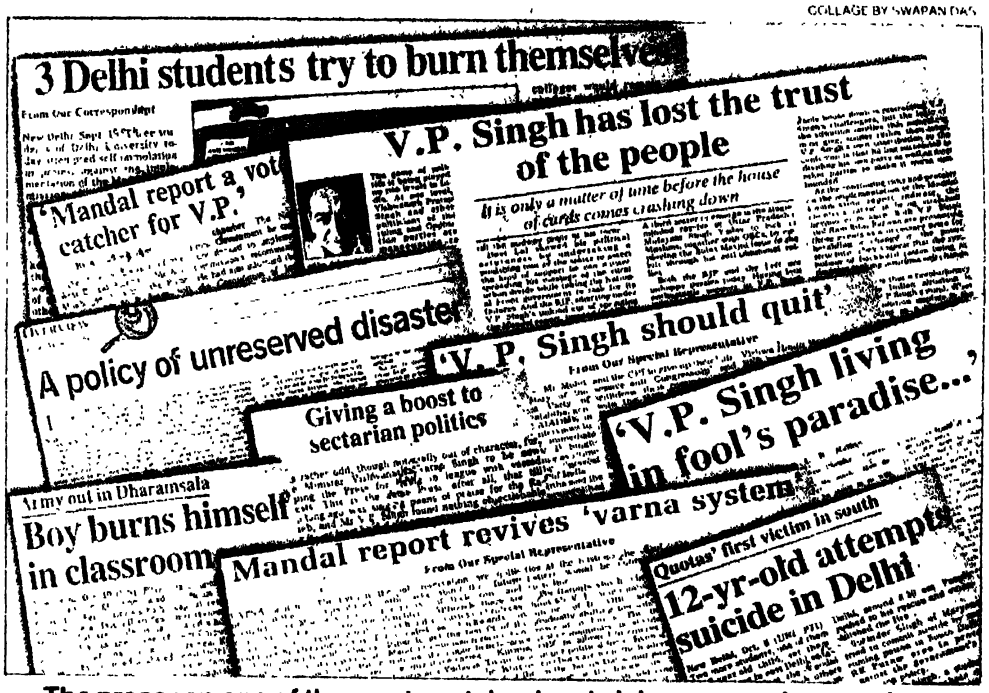
ASHOK VAHIE

Till today, the Congress' position on Mandal remains unclear. Rather, it is unclear whether the party has a position on it at all

But even if V.P. Singh took a politically motivated decision with an eye on the electorate, could the Congress really afford to accuse him as it did of "betraying a degree of cynical opportunism, intellectual dishonesty and political malfeasance never before seen in the history of independent India"?

The problem with resorting to arguments which question the motives of others is that your own must be above suspicion. And, clearly, both the Congress and the BJP fail on this count. What motive could the Congress have had for seeing "considerable merit in the Mandal Commission Report" and at the same time unleashing its goons to destroy government property in the capital and elsewhere? Or, for that matter, was Advani's post-Mandal decision to embark on the rath yatra free from electoral caste calculations? And if both parties resorted to doing what they did for fear of losing the backward class vote, didn't this betray an even greater degree of "cynical opportunism, intellectual dishonesty and political malfeasance"?

Clearly, there were only two honest approaches that the Congress and the BJP could have adopted. Either reject the Mandal Report and then openly support the agitation. Or accept it and then persuade the government to introduce the necessary modifications.



What the two parties chose to do, however, was to accept Mandal and then covertly support—even lead—the agitation. The cost of this needs no reminding: scores of people dead, crores of government property destroyed and an atmosphere of rancour and hatred.

Given the extent of the violence and trauma that gripped much of north India between August and September, the press may have been expected to exercise a measure of objectivity and restraint. But, on the contrary, it ran one of the most sustained and vicious campaigns against V.P. Singh and the pro-reservationists.

It was a drive which saw publications sympathetic to the government do U-turns, pitched men as incongruous as Mani Shankar Aiyar and Arun Shourie on the same side of the fence and made virtually every major newspaper read pretty much like the National Herald. Never before had the media displayed such united hostility—whether on Bofors ("Yes, but we don't have a Swiss account number with Rajiv's name on it"), the Emergency ("But didn't the trains run on time?") or the Defamation Bill ("Well, it was scrapped, wasn't it?")

COLLAGE BY SWAPAN DAS

The press ran one of the most sustained and vicious campaigns against V.P. Singh and the Mandal Report and played up the spate of shocking self-immolations

How the decision on Mandal—which essentially consisted of extending reservations to the backward classes and involved but a few thousand jobs a year—could have aroused such unaccommodating hatred in the media is astounding. Did it really pose any (or as much of a) threat to India's unity as the press kept claiming? Could a policy aimed at providing employment to a deprived and underrepresented 52 per cent of the population really mean, as Girilal Jain put it, "the Lebanonisation of India"?

Having arrogated to itself the role of defending a united and casteless India, the press went on to invent its own definitions. A 'casteist' was any pro-reservationist—particularly, a Janata Dal backward class leader such as Ram Vilas Paswan. 'Anti-reservationists', on the other hand, were never 'casteist' but people who stood for equality of opportunity and India's unity. (Never mind that the overwhelming majority of anti-reservationists who took to the streets were forwards threatened by the loss of caste privileges.) And a 'martyr' was any one of those misguided youths who—perhaps carried away by the hysteria whipped up by the political parties and the press—chose tragically to put a torch to himself.

While the press played up the spate of shocking self-immolations (whether restraint and disapproval would have served to check them is a question worth examining), it barely bothered itself with the ugly and casteist side of the anti-reservation stir. How many newspapers came down on the students in the capital who demonstrated by sweeping the streets and posing as vegetable vendors? The suggestion: that these were occupations unworthy of upper castes. Who criticised the women students who carried placards saying: "We don't want unemployed husbands"? The implication: backward caste husbands with jobs are not fit for marrying. And what about all those inflammatory and casteist slogans that were raised right through the agitation (see SUNDAY, The Voices of Mandal, issue dated 28 October—3 November 1990)?

V.P. Singh probably believed that his decision would divide Devi Lal's vote-bank as the Jat leader enjoys a sizeable backward caste following

Neither did the press do much to focus on the unlawfulness and violence that attended the anti-reservation stir. And when it did, there was usually some excuse or the other advanced for it. Who recalls the attempted hijack of a Vayudoot plane at Shimla ("Boys will be boys")? How much column space was devoted to condemning the bid to set fire to Dal MP Satya Prakash Malaviya's residence near Allahabad ("Well, passions are bound to get inflamed in this kind of situation")? And what about peasant leader Mahendra Singh Tikait's call to burn the sons of (government) MPs and MLAs as a form of protest ("Shocking and awful, but wasn't it V.P. Singh himself who invited this kind of madness?")?

In contrast, there were reams of newsprint expended on the pro-reservation agitation—which, undoubtedly, did more than its bit to contribute to the overall violence. Ram Vilas Paswan's call to the backwards to fight on the streets (he later denied saying this), for instance, was the subject of innumerable (justifiably) angry editorials.

The naked bias and the hysteria which attended the reporting on Mandal contrasted starkly with the 'objectivity' and 'restraint' with which the media dealt with Advani's rath yatra. If the division of this country was what the press was so worried about, then surely it was the latter that should have occupied most of its attention. Yet, there was none of that savage hatred and pious high-mindedness with which the newspapers dealt with Mandal. Never mind the blatantly inflammatory slogans, the riots that preceded and followed in its wake and the dubious objective of the exercise.

The media's obsession with Mandal was all the more curious given that during the time, the country was rocked by communal violence in places as far-flung as Uttar Pradesh, Karnataka, Rajasthan and Gujarat. A recent and interesting study published in People's Democracy—the CPI(M)'s weekly organ—reveals the contrast between the media's interest in the two issues. Between 30 September and 4 October—during which communal disturbances accounted for 70 lives—three mainstream English newspapers (Indian Express, The Hindu and The Times of India) devoted a bare 47 column centimetres on their front pages to the riots. The anti-reservation stir, however, received as much as 333 column centimetres. The figures for the reports off front page and editorials are even more divergent.

The kind of postures the media adopted on Mandal may have been acceptable if the recommendations threatened to change the face of employment in India. But how many newspapers and magazines really cared to study the number of jobs that came within the ambit of reservations? Statistics have it that an average of a little less than two lakh jobs are generated by the public sector every year. They also reveal that out of these, the central sector accounts for something like 40,000. (This is the crucial statistic as the previous government left the decision to implement the Mandal Report to the states.) An additional 27 per cent reservation then would have meant a little over a mere 10,000 jobs.

OF THE

BACKWARD CLASSES COMMISSION

FIRST PART

1980

Which of the three brought V.P. Singh down—Chandra Shekhar, L.K. Advani or Bindeswari Prasad Mandal?

If this strikes someone as an unacceptably large number, it is instructive to ask once again what the anti-reservation stir was all about. Was it about the class three and class four jobs that account for the majority of those in the central sector? Was the agitation about jobs for sweepers, peons, manual workers and lower division clerks? Did the students of the medical colleges, the IITs (Indian Institutes of Technology) and posh colleges such as St Stephen's and Hindu take to the streets for fear of losing out on such employment? And would there have been an agitation at all if reservations were limited to class three and class four posts only?

Or was the anti-reservation stir about the class one and class two jobs? About officer-level jobs in industry, the civil service and elsewhere? About jobs which altogether amount to a few hundred every year?

As hundreds of commentators pointed out, there may have been many things wrong with the Mandal Report. The methodology used was far from perfect, the recommendations would have benefited the better off among the backward classes the most and, as we all know, reservation by itself cannot help the socially and educationally deprived.

But these are points of view that call for discussion and not the madness which gripped the nation for most of three months. They did not justify the deceit and duplicity of the parties opposed to Mandal—just as they did not warrant the nastiness and savagery of the press. Most of all, they did not merit the demand for V.P. Singh's head. •

Communal clashes break out in Old Delhi

The tension began with Advani's rath yatra. As the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) president's Ram rath made its way down the narrow lanes and by-lanes of the walled city of Delhi, feelings on both sides of the communal fence ran high. The strict vigil maintained by the administration, however, prevented the outbreak of any violence.

But that situation, obviously, was too good to last. For, only a month later on 14 November, communal riots were raging in the Sadar Bazar area of old Delhi, with looting, arson and loss of lives.

The immediate provocation was a procession taken out jointly by a number of minority organisations. All three were relatively unknown outfits, the Sikh Muslim Dalit Panth, the All India Minority Front and the All India Muslim Unity Front. The organisers, apparently, assured the police and the administration that their's would be a peaceful procession, with no raising of slogans. Permission was granted to this silent procession to go around the walled city, though police officials later claimed that there had been no official go-ahead.

The procession began from Sisganj Gurdwara, Chandni Chowk at 10 am. The participants were mostly youths from the trans-Yamuna area, according to police sources, and were armed with spears, daggers, lathis and other lethal weapons. The processionists reached Idgah, Sadar Bazar, at 2.30 pm.

That's when the trouble began. For, some of the prominent leaders, including Jasbir Singh Rode of the Akali Dal (Mann) and Sukhvinder Singh Khalsa of the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF) made provocative speeches at the venue, instigating the 15,000-odd people assembled. Some of the young people were sufficiently roused to rush off to the adjoining Dhobi Katra to pelt stones at members of the other community. Swift retaliation followed and soon a full-fledged battle was in progress on the street.

Despite the prior notice of the procession and the likelihood of violence breaking out, police presence was at a minimum. So, while the communities clashed, the small group of policemen on duty stood around waiting for reinforcements. That took another 10 minutes or so. Meanwhile, the elders of both communities were trying to calm passions without much success.

The police finally swung into action, using tear-gas shells and firing 22 rounds at the mob. Shopkeepers quickly downed shutters, while the smoke rising from burning vehicles gave an ominous look to the entire scene. Around 14 vehicles were set on fire and so was the fodder at the Idgah slaughter house. Till late into the night firemen were trying to extinguish the blaze at a motor mechanic's shop and a medical dispensary across the road.

By the evening, however, the situation was under control, with the death count standing at five. The additional commissioner of police (northern range), S.K. Kain, maintained that none of the dead or injured (around 20 at the first count) has sustained bullet injuries. All of them had been wounded by sharp-edged weapons.

Communal feelings were already running high in the capital after the burning of a holy book in east of Kailash in south Delhi, and the Sadar riots made matters worse. The fall-out was experienced all over the city

RAJESH KUMAR

Hospital sources, however, disputed this version.

Curfew was imposed in the area for an indefinite period and cases registered against those who had made provocative speeches, for the police held that the violence had been preplanned.

Communal feelings were already running high in the capital after the burning of a holy book in east of Kailash in south Delhi, and the Sadar riots only made matters worse. The fall-out was experienced all over the city, with buses being burnt in east Delhi, with Trilokpuri becoming especially tense.

The police, however, concentrated its attention on the Sadar area, with police commissioner Vijay Karan visiting the area. The Lieutenant-Governor of Delhi, Arjan Singh, also went around the affected area, announcing the grant of Rs 1 lakh to the next of kin of those killed and Rs 10,000 to those seriously injured. Compensation would also be paid to those whose property had been damaged.

The next day, 15 November, it was

RAJESH KUMAR

Two days after the riots, the Shahi Imam visited the troubled areas (far left) and condemned the organisers of the march. A day before, Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar also toured the riot-hit places (left and above)

Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar's turn to conduct a tour of the affected areas. He gave the slip to those assembled to greet him, including H.K.L. Bhagat and Jagdish Tytler, entering the police station by the back door, to remain closeted with Vijay Karan and Arjan Singh.

Finally, Shekhar's convoy wound its way down the roads of Sadar. Some residents wandering around were asked by the PM how they'd been affected in the riots. The heart-rending stories that followed left Shekhar visibly upset. The Prime Minister gave a clean chit to the administration and the police before leaving, and announced a grant of Rs 5 lakhs from the PM's Relief Fund to those who'd suffered in the violence. Asked whether a political conspiracy had caused the riots, Shekhar replied: "I don't want to politicise the issue. All I can say is that every death saddens me."

Earlier in the day, despite the curfew and heavy police presence, violence had broken out again in the Qasabpura, Sarai Khalil Khan and Nawab Road areas, with members of both communities getting on roof-tops to pelt stones on each other and the police. The security forces retrieved the situation by firing tear-gas shells and plastic bullets. According to Vijay Karan, 250 miscreants were arrested, including those who had violated the curfew, and Nooruddin, the main organiser of the 14 November rally

Karan further disclosed that he'd asked for 15 additional companies from the central government. The entire area would be divided into four sectors, each headed by one assistant commissioner of police.

While Karan chalked out these elaborate arrangements, fighting broke out again that same night, at Atma Ram Katra behind the Anaj Mandi of Filmistan. The fighting lasted from 10.30-11.30 pm, and the task of the police was made more difficult by the fact that someone cut the electricity supply line, plunging the entire area into darkness. Around midnight, the Border Security Force (BSF) was roped into the task of instilling confidence in the local populace, and it staged a flag march in the riot-affected localities.

On the 16th, the Shahi Imam, Syed Abdullah Bukhari, got in on the act, condemning the organisers of the march at his Friday sermon at the Jama Masjid, and distancing himself from the endeavour. "Kuch sirphire Mussalmanon ne ye shararat ki aur doosri quam ke logon ke khilaf nare lagane ki ijazat di (some foolish and mischievous Muslims raised slogans against the other community)," said Bukhari, adding that he was willing to apologise on behalf of his errant brothers.

But it was Advani's rath yatra which started it all, said the Imam. "Jo dukano mein aag lagaye gayi hai, woh bhujayi ja sakte hai. Par jo aag Mussalmanon ke dilon mein lagi hai, woh bhujayi nahi ja sakti. (the fire that has gutted shops can be destroyed but the fire in the hearts of the Muslims cannot be extinguished)." Bukhari also visited the riot-affected areas to get a first-hand account of the suffering of the victims.

By then, law and order appeared to have been restored to the area. But beneath the veneer of normalcy, communal passions still raged. And it would be a while before they were quelled.●

An Indian obsession

Hilary Spurling's account of the life and works of Paul Scott

When Granada television serialised The Raj Quartet in 1983, it was the beginning of a wave of Raj nostalgia, more fashionable than that set off by Kim and North West Frontier. But few watching The Jewel In The Crown, both in Britain and India, know that its author died virtually penniless, consumed by cancer, cirrohsis of the liver and an overriding passion for India. Fame and a Booker Prize came too late for Paul Scott: he had already paid the greatest price any novelist can pay.

Hilary Spurling writes about the struggle and heartbreak that went into The Raj Quartet in her sensitive biography of the author released last month. The book is at once an exploration of the life of a man who lived and died alienated from most of his own people, and a gentle rebuke to London's snobbish literati, who never gave Scott his due.

Spurling is never obstrusive, and her moving account of the man who spent more than ten years of his life living with an Indian obsession is a must read for all those who enjoyed the story of Ronald Merrick and Hari Kumar.

Scott's first encounter with India began when he joined the army and was posted to the country in 1943. The man who had wanted to be a poet had by now married a nurse--Penny Avery— and was struggling with his own bisexuality. Scott returned from India, with what he felt was enough matter for a novel. Working for some time as a literary agent, he helped to launch novelists like Muriel Spark and John Braine. His own early novels—Johnnie Sahib (1952) and The Alien Sky (1953)—got a lukewarm reception.

In 1959 he left the agency and went freelance. It was an entirely directionless Scott who left for India in 1963, searching for the novel that he knew was inside him. He reached Bombay without itinerary or hotel bookings and was given a room by a wealthy Bombay landlady, Dorothy Ganapathy.

Ganapathy became a life-long friend and it was to her that he dedicated The Jewel In The Crown. She later provided the role model for Lily Chatterjee in Jewel who takes in the stranger. It was from Dorothy Ganapathy's flat in Queen's Road, that Scott could see the sprawling Oval and the Bombay High Court. This was the same scene that Guy Perron would see in Jewel.

When Scott left Bombay, Ganapathy gave him a silver Ganesh. Later in England, Scott would place the image on his study table and repeat Dorothy's prayer om prakash om to it whenever he had a writer's block.

From Bombay, Scott flew to Madras and then on to the village of Timmapuram, to meet his old havildar, Narayan Dass. The Timmapuram experience remained unforgettable for Scott. He hated the feeling of being an object of curiosity; he couldn't come to terms with having to join Dass and several other villagers with a pot of water in the field every morning, and later developed an amoebic infection. It brought out the worst of the sahib in him and he left Timmapuram, ill and humiliated. This would later be the feeling that Hari Kumar suffered on his initial contact with India.

Scott's next destination was Calcutta. His host there was Neil Ghosh, an Anglicised Bengali, who had never adjusted to post-imperial India. Hari Kumar was instantly born. Ghosh had been educated in a public school in England and returned to India at 19. He had encountered the alienation of his fellow Indians as well as the patronising attitude of the British who excluded him from their "Whites-only" clubs. He had an Australian girl-friend and was popularly known as the "Black Englishman"

Scott later confessed that it was on one drunken night, spent talking with Ghosh, that he felt the book had come within his grasp. Hence Harry Coomer, the anglicised name that Hari Kumar sports (Neil was actually an Anglicised version of Neel Baron Ghosh). Everything in Hari Kumar—from his clipped accent, to his abundant charm—was borrowed from Ghosh. Even the girl-friend Ghosh left behind in England--Daphne—gave her name to Kumar's girl-friend in Jewel—Daphne Manners.

Scene from The Jewel In The Crown: evoking Raj nostalgia

It was in Calcutta again that Scott made another friend who became a constant support and comfort to him: the singer, Dipali Nag, and her husband Dulal Nag Chowdhury. In their spacious house in Behala with its sprawling gardens, Scott recovered from his Timmapuram shock and found another character for his novel. The house of the Macgregors' with its beautiful gardens would be none other than the Nags'.

Scott left India in April 1964. Ten years later the final book in The Quartets was completed. These years happened to be the darkest in Scott's life and it is here that Spurling's account is brilliant. Surviving on publisher's advances and retreating into his shell, Scott spent lonely hours in a cold house, desperately trying to complete a series that had become an obsession with him.

Division Of The Spoils—the last book in The Quartet, was published in 1975. The series got good reviews from Philip Knightley in The Times

Surviving on publisher's advances and retreating into his shell, Scott spent lonely hours desperately trying to complete a series that had become an obsession with him: The Raj Quartet and in the Times Literary Supplement and Spectator. The returns from it were however preciously low. Scott's drinking increased and he started working on another novel Staying On.

In 1976, his wife—Penny—who had steadily supported him so far, left him and took refuge in a home for battered wives. A broken Scott left for USA to lecture in Tulsa.

Staying On won the Booker Prize in 1977 but by then Scott was too ill to collect it. His daughter Carol stood in for him instead. Scott returned to Britain and it was discovered he had cancer. Penny came back to nurse him just as if she had never left. The Scott family spent their last few days together. In 1978, three weeks short of his 58th birthday, Scott died in the Middlesex Hospital. The next year Anglia Television filmed Staying On. And five years later Jewel In The Crown was serialised and established Scott's fame.

Neil Ghosh died a year after Scott, and Dorothy Ganapathy—who helped Spurling write the biography—died suddenly on 3 October, three weeks before the publication of the book. She was 90. She had also given Spurling a Ganesh carved out of amethyst and like her subject, Spurling completed her book under the gaze of the Elephant God.

Spurling on Scott is an excellent biography, sympathetic and understanding in its study and defence of the life of a neglected novelist. That Dorothy Ganapathy should die without reading it seems another of the tragic ironies that appear to have haunted the life of the novelist. •

Fantasies and fables

But, Manoj Das' new book also provides food for thought

Urban Indians are normally multilingual but true literary bilingualism, which enables a creative author to write equally adeptly in two languages, is rare. Manoj Das is one such writer. Acknowledged as an Oriya fictionist (his short stories won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1972), he is better known nationally as the ex-editor of The Heritage, the sophisticated monthly that ceased publication last year. He has also authored several anthologies of English short stories and a novel, in addition to his prolific output in Oriya.

His latest offering is another collection of stories—his second for the New World Literature Series recently begun by Delhi's BR Publishing—Bulldozers And Fables And Fantasies For Adults. The dozen tales here consist of two longish works (Das calls the title story a novella), four fables (in the strict sense, that is, tales in which animals speak and behave like men) and six fantasies (fiction with strange or unfamiliar settings and grotesque or out-of-the-ordinary people). For instance, kings and princesses populate many of them, both the fables and the fantasies—a distancing method that allows Das to poke gentle fun at human foibles.

Das' style is primarily satiric, but not of the vitriolic variety. He exposes the ridiculous side of his characters with a comic flavour that betrays affection rather than the misanthropy that satirists sometimes cultivate. Frequently, therefore, one finds a note of sorrow creeping in, about what might have been, or an evanescent air of romance, particularly in the two longer works. And every once in a while one comes across vivid poetic imagery, such as, "Viewed from far the (hill) town looked like a nest. And there were giant clouds above it... like birds about to settle down in it."

Bulldozers deserves its prominent place in the volume, for it touchingly describes how the aspirations of Ravi, a small-town librarian, come to nought despite his earnest work. Almost in the manner of R.K. Narayan, the mood turns sad although the narrative proceeds through humour. A few of Das' jokes at the expense of Indian English are illustrative. A telegram: "Hearty congratulations for your heroic entry into the IAS (Stop) We pray almighty God to shower choicest blessings on your head and give your muscles strength to whitewash the face of the motherland and prove that this is as good as ICS of British days of which my own heavengone maternal uncle was a member."

A chief minister's speech: "You will be wonderful to hear that I have not read very much English, but only sufficient for the enough. It is by my will power that I speak it. I do mistakes and sins in English but all ladies and gentlemen do mistakes and sins! A month ago I was accorded a very very grand congratulation by good men and good good women... On the leaflets they printed T for C. I became Thief Minister...there was the mistake in my car today which lated me... When I was arrested accused of seduction, my family thought I will be massacred. Seduction was historic crime." There is also a famous poet who composes couplets like "Beware of me, get off the rail,/I come! I come!! the Frontier Mail!" and a managing trustee who orders Ravi to buy the much-quoted book titled Ibid for his library.

The other long story, Sharma And The Wonderful Lump (which seems to be an English version of Das's Abu Purushga in Oriya), relates with delectable irony how an Indian's massive cranial tumour makes him a celebrity in the US as owner of the largest ever recorded human growth, providing Das plenty of opportunities to take potshots at American commercialism. For example, Sharma is given a lot of money to pose for a photo with a topless model leaning over his tumour. But Das is not unfairly unpatriotic: American journalists tell Sharma that India would win hands down if the Olympics included talking, a "tradition so assiduously built up by the leading Indians of our time". And Sharma resents the fact that India never recognised his uniqueness, causing another case of brain drain to the States!

Three of the fables in the book give new interpretations to the Panchatantra tales. The Tiger And The Traveller reveals man's insatiable attraction to material wealth. The Turtle From The Sky tells of the pitfalls of exaggeration, and The Stupid Servant (about the monkey who kills his master) warns against heeding the advice of bad gurus. In an Orwellian mode, Story Of A Strange Last Journey analyses human politics reflected through animal society. It is chastening to find how many (six) of Das' fables and fantasies end in death—despite their apparent enjoyableness, he is actually preoccupied with rather serious concerns.

The fantasies come in thematic pairs. He Who Rode The Tiger and Man Who Lifted The Mountain deal graphically with the consequences of vanity and ambitiousness, how irrationality leads to extreme end results. Old Folks Of The Northern Valley and A Tale Of The Northern Valley depict remote hamlets whose maliceless people spin tall tales and love benign rumours; for Das, they represent the culture of innocence that bourgeois man has lost The book is lightly digested, no doubt, but offers enough food for thought.●

Future tense

Islamabad and Washington are not on the best of terms

Though it is hard to believe, something strange but serious seems to be happening in US-Pakistan relations. In both Islamabad and New Delhi the dominant view still is that the downturn in America's traditionally close relationship with its "most allied ally" is temporary. The general expectation is that soon enough George Bush would issue Pakistan the certificate of "nuclear innocence" and the flow of US military and economic aid, suspended in the first week of October, would begin afresh. Both sides can live happily thereafter.

Frankly, this has so far been my assessment, too. But second thoughts are in order and there is a chance that a fairly acrimonious estrangement between Washington and Islamabad could be round the corner

Of the available evidence to support this conclusion, two items are of particular significance. First, after the initial SOS for 5,000 Pakistani troops needed in Saudi Arabia, the United States has shown not the slightest interest in any Pakistani participation in, or contribution to, the regional security arrangements the Americans are trying to rig up for the Gulf after the problem of Iraqi occupation of Kuwait is sorted out one way or the other.

Observers here had taken it for granted that Pakistan would be an important part of the US-sponsored dispensation in the Gulf and would be principally responsible for the chowkidari duty in the area after the bulk of the American forces were withdrawn. But that has not turned out to be the case. American preference seems to be for troops from Egypt, Syria, Morocco, Turkey and so on.

Similarly, when the Americans started reading out the riot act to Pakistan on the vexed issue of the latter's relentless quest for nuclear capability, the general belief was that this was a repetition of the charade enacted every year before the certification by the US President that Pakistan did not possess a nuclear device nor was manufacturing one. To the extent the American protests about Pakistani nuclear activities seemed sharper than in previous years, this was attributed to uncertainty about Pakistani elections and especially over the possibility of Benazir Bhutto being debarred from them.

However, even after the elections have been held and have been accepted by the US to have been free and fair, the US remains very critical of Pakistan's nuclear policy and programme. The coveted certificate is still out of Pakistani reach.

The general expectation is that soon enough George Bush would issue Pakistan the certificate of "nuclear innocence" and the flow of US military and economic aid would begin afresh

The key question therefore is: why is the US, having turned a blind eye to Pakistan's feverish efforts to build the nuclear bomb, so stern at this late stage? Unfortunately, American sources are not coming forth with a clear answer. But they are saying enough to hint that during the last 12 months Pakistan has done something which has offended them immensely. Since the red line limiting the enrichment of uranium had been transgressed even during Zia-ul Haq's time, evidently something else has got the Americans' goat.

No wonder then that usually reliable American sources claim that American military supplies and aid to Pakistan can be resumed, only if Pakistan gives assurances about its nuclear policies and programmes which can be verified on the ground and are no longer in the realm of the intangible. Once again, these sources are reticent about details But it seems that America wants Pakistan to shut down its reprocessing facility and to let US experts monitor the extent of uranium enrichment.

On both counts, the Pakistani answer is an emphatic no. Indeed, both President Ghulam Ishaq Khan and the new Pakistani Prime Minister, Nawaz Sharif, have spoken about the Americans in stridently defiant tones. They have said that they would welcome close relations with and aid from the US only if America refrained from "interfering" in Pakistan's internal policies or trying to circumscribe its sovereignty. Ishaq Khan has said that for the sake of aid Pakistan would not "compromise its dignity". Nawaz Sharif has ostentatiously announced an acceleration of Pakistan's nuclear programme. ●

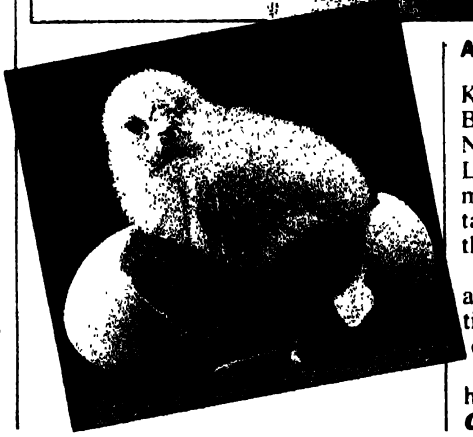
Boil that egg

There is fear about salmonella infection

For years now, the conventional wisdom had it consuming eggs and chicken made for good health. But salmonellosis turned that on its head. Reports from such states as Haryana, Uttar Pradesh and the Union Territory of Delhi indicated that the disease, popularly known as fowl typhoid, was raging in epidemic proportions among the poultry stock. And anyone who ate eggs or broiler chicken risked acute dysentery which would eventually effect bowel movement. Not too many people understood the medical aspect, but the impression gained ground that eating eggs could be a dangerous thing, threatening both the Rs 2,000 crore per annum egg market and the Rs 1,000 crore per annum broiler market.



According to Dr D.B. Survashe, of Venkateshwara Hatcheries Private Limited (which controls 70 per cent of the layer and 50 per cent of the broiler market) this was a false scare. Said the doctor, an expert in microbiology, virology and immunology: "What affects chicken is salmonellosis galloreum and salmonellosis pullorieum And numerous tests have shown that it is not transferable to human beings. While our concern doesn't have infected chickens, I cannot make a categorical statement that salmonella doesn't exist in India. If it does, all the infected birds must be destroyed."

But circumstantial evidence, says Dr A.K. Khanna, a general physician, seems to indicate that infected eggs do harm a person. "If the strain is treated with heat, it dies," he says, "but what happens to those people who eat their eggs raw or half-boiled?" According to Dr Khanna, he has several patients who suffered from dysentery and gastroenteritis. All of them had their eggs raw or half-cooked. Once they stopped eating them, their problems disappeared. "You can draw your own conclusion," says the doctor.

While the salmonella problem occurs world-wide, the last time such an epidemic raged in India was during the 1970s. Obviously, all the infected birds were not destroyed and the strain was transferred down to the present generation of infected birds. At present, a powder called Furazolidon is being fed to the birds along with their feed. But this only prevents the disease from setting in. It does not cure those already infected. And the poor hygienic conditions prevailing in some poultry farms, with such carriers as rodents and cockroaches abounding, contributes to the spread of the infection.

Testing poultry for salmonella is simple. All that is needed is one drop of blood, one drop of antigen and the mixture produces a reaction which can confirm or deny the existence of the strain. A seminar held on the subject at the Pusa Institute, New Delhi, came to the conclusion that the disease had assumed epidemic proportions in the northern parts of the country. Such scientists as Dr R.K. Kaushik, senior disease investigation officer at the Krishi Gyan Kendra, Gurgaon and Dr B.R. Gupta, principal scientist of the National Salmonella Reference Laboratory went along with this. But most of the participants also maintained that salmonella does not pose a threat to human health.

A poultry farm: how hygienic is it?

Nevertheless, the government has asked the bureaucracy to get into action, identify the infected stock and exterminate it.

Until then, you're best advised to have that egg hard-boiled. •

Scene from Mississippi Masala: wacky and poignant

Mississippi Masala

Mira Nair's bold new film looks into racial discrimination

Greenwood, Mississippi. A brooding, ugly town in the deep south of the United States, mired in a history of slavery, cotton wealth and White supremacy.

But the unusual electricity in Greenwood and its outskirts these days comes from the motley film crew and actors of Mississippi Masala, Mira Nair's brave, provocative and entertaining big-screen movie, which is being shot here, and in Uganda. A story of a relationship between an Indian immigrant woman and a local Black man that captures the politics and prejudice of race, Nair's movie takes a rare look at the contemporary American south.

On the day's set, an endless expanse of still water and drowned cypress trees outside Greenwood, Nair directs her way through a melee of actors crew, equipment, pet mascots, and surprised spectators.

On schedule: a love scene, one of many. Nair, short hair bunched under a baseball cap, dressed in a loose batik shirt, knee-length white pants, and with her trademark purple Gandhi darkglasses tucked into her shirt, briefs a slim Black man and a striking brown-skinned woman. Nair is surrounded by a jostling crowd of cameramen, still photographers, sound men, and the film's assistant director. "Lock it up," says Nair. "Quiet please." Silence settles. Dogs are prevented from barking. Visitors shepherded out of camera view. "Roll sound. Speed. Mark it. Action."

The actress, her huge doe eyes turned up to the handsome Black man, begins to walk down the grassy bank near the waterside with him. "Do people kiss in India?" the man asks.

"What?"

The kiss and clinch that follow need numerous repeats to satisfy Nair. The final take is palpably first-rate, ending in a long kiss that leaves both actors and viewers shaken. There is dead silence, and then, Nair calls out: "Cut! Print the take."

Mississippi Masala hopes to both entertain and provoke. There is an underlying wickedness to the film, part humour and part eye for reality that delivers on the masala pungency of the title. Indians, whether in India or abroad, could be jolted by an Indian woman character at ease with her sexuality. And Americans, defensive and oddly ill-informed about southern US, are likely to feel as uncomfortable, though for different reasons.

Much like Nair's award-winning film Salaam Bombay!, Mississippi Masala treads the fine line between acute social commentary and popular cinematic form. Nair's maturing ability to combine these demands is evident in Masala. "It's a very compassionate film," Nair says thoughtfully. "It doesn't seek to poke fun at anybody. It's as truthful a way as we (Nair and scriptwriter Sooni Taraporevala, who also wrote the script for Salaam Bombay!) know to reveal the nature of human love...when it's very clear what the Indian community feels about the Black community, and for the lack community to voice their tensions. It's a great responsibility."

The film deals with the legacies of Black-Brown-White racial hatred on a first cyclical level, and retains the agony of discrimination. The movie opens on a dark night in Idi Amin's Uganda. These are the two months in 1972 in which Amin exiled 70,000 of Uganda's 74,000 Asians. Nair has Amin on television saying: "Asians came to Uganda to build the railway. The railway is finished. They must leave now... I must liberate Uganda from foreign domination. The Asians are sabotaging the economy." A few scenes later there is a drunken revel in a Kampala bar as Indian men prepare to leave Uganda. There, Jay, (played by Roshan Seth), the father of the Indian girl shown later in Mississippi, punch-drunk and philosophical, says what most Asians in Uganda would rather have left unsaid: "We created the madman, we buggers in Uganda. Most people are born with five senses. We're left with only one—the sense of property."

In Mississippi, almost two decades later, there is another history of racism to live through. This is the land where Blacks live on the wrong side of the railway tracks, still call White children "sir" "ma'am," and they stay away from White neighbourhoods and bars. Black men were lynched by White supremacist groups here as recently as the 1980s. "This is where the lid was on the tightest," says Mark Marquadart, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Mississippi. "People say why can't Blacks get their act together, they've been free since 1863? But the reality is that 25 years ago Black people in Greenwood who went to register themselves for voting had Alsatian dogs sicced on them."

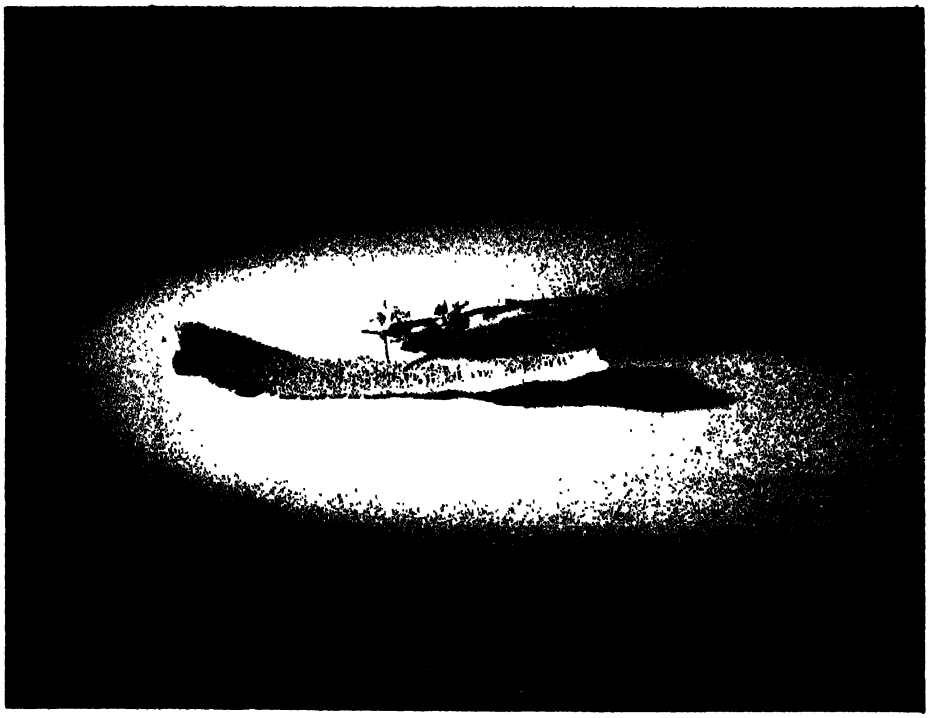
But unlike Amin's Uganda, Blacks here are even lower in rank by colour than the Indian immigrants with their dirty motels and liquor stores. "Carpet cleaning kallu," says one Indian of the young Black man in love with Jay's daughter. At a drunken party, Indian friends kid Jay about his being an activist lawyer in Uganda. "Our Jaybhai! The King of Kampala! In Uganda he was champion of the blecks. Then the same blecks—they kicked him out! Right Jaybhai?," says one.

Nair captures the essence of Indian life in strange lands with a deftness born of her first harsh documentaries on immigrants and rootlessness, So Far From India in 1984 and India Cabaret in 1985. Enmeshed with the pujas and the yaar camaraderie is the weakening of closely-knit Indian families and the unpleasantness of surviving abroad. Much of the movie is shot around a seedy motel owned by Gujarati immigrants where Mina, the young Indian woman, cleans bathrooms. It is a place of prostitution, pettiness, and prejudice. After Mina is caught having sex with her Black lover, one Indian woman in the motel tells another: "You know what she told her mother? 'I love him that's not a crime!' Can you imagine dumping Harry Patel for a bleck?!"

If such bleakness can be fashioned into a love story and comedy, it owes much to Nair's ability to see the glimmerings of life in dark places. There is an undercurrent of vibrancy to the film that ranges from Jay's undefeated humanism to the devil-may-care persona of Mina, who, escaping from Greenwood with her Black lover in the film's last scene, stops to urinate in an open field, waving shamelessly to amused truck-drivers. It is a happy ending—with a masala twist.

Indian viewers who can cope with Nair's iconoclastic vision will enjoy a movie that is unusually strong in its portrayal of complex race relations and the lives of Indian immigrants. They can also look forward to seeing Sharmila Tagore on the screen again, in what promises to be a unusually nuanced performance by the great screen star. Tagore plays Kinnu—Jay's wife and Mina's mother—in a role shorn of glamour. Nair, who admired Tagore's performance in Satyajit Ray's Devi, says of Tagore: "I could see how malleable she is in a way, but when you speak to her as a woman she's someone who has made a lot of choices that have required a lot of strength. In a way, I really cast her for those guts."

A sharp contrast to La Tagore is Sarita Chowdhury, half-Bangladeshi, half-British, who plays Mina. An extraordinarily intelligent actress, and a former journalist and film student, Chowdhury's strong-boned looks are not the stuff of Indian male fantasies nor is the independent character she portrays likely to sit easy with Indian audiences.



Nair's directorial fame has attracted a first-rate American cast. Denzel Washington, the country's leading Black actor, plays the clear-eyed man who earns the ire of Blacks, Indians and Whites in Greenwood by falling for a Brown outsider. Washington, who stars in a Broadway production of Shakespeare's Richard III this season has played lead roles in both big-budget Hollywood productions and independent films. Washington won an Oscar for best supporting actor last year in Glory.

Mississippi Masala will be released in Cannes next May. Nair is currently finishing filming in Uganda, where, she says, the colourful street-life rivals that of the back-alleys she discovered in Salaam Bombay. It's a long haul from Bombay to Uganda to Mississippi, but Mississippi Masala, wacky, poignant, rich in experience, is worth the journey. •

Protima Bedi's ambitious venture, Nrityagram, runs into trouble

It seemed, for the moment at least, as if Protima Gauri Bedi's pet project would die a premature death. For, Nrityagram, Bedi's village of dance, inaugurated six months ago by the then Prime Minister V.P. Singh, had just enough funds to get by until March-April 1990. And unless more money is poured in, the danseuse would be forced to close down, giving up on the dream she'd cherished for so long.

But Protima Bedi's not one to give up so easily. And the gutsy Odissi exponent flew off to Bombay to consult the other trustees of Nrityagram, declaring: "I can't let my baby die of malnutrition like this."

Finances proved to be a problem from the very beginning. The initial investment of Rs 4 lakhs went into the construction of the academy, leaving very little over for day-to-day expenses. With a view to making Nrityagram self-sufficient, Bedi began a sericulture project on the ten-acre plot, which now yields around Rs 3,000 every month. But the monthly expenses of the community come to Rs 15,000, not a large sum in itself, so the shortfall remained. Says Bedi : "If 15 industrial companies in Bangalore decide to give Rs 1,000 each, which is no skin off anyone's nose, it will help a lot."

The dancer admits that if she began more projects like the sericulture one, the community could make a lot more money. But that would ultimately be quite self-defeating. For, as Bedi explains: "If we enlarge activities beyond the dance-oriented ones, we will find our students more involved in those than in learning dance. The idea behind Nrityagram was to evolve a place where undivided attention could be given to perfecting the dance forms."

But despite the noble intent behind the scheme—reviving the guru-shishya parampara—not too many people were forthcoming with big donations. If private institutions failed Bedi, the Karnataka state government wasn't any better. Ramakrishna Hegde did give her land to set up the village, but successive regimes weren't quite so obliging. Bedi attributes this to her being an "outsider". B.V. Karanth's repertory, she says, gets adequate funds, because he is a Kannadiga. Protests Bedi: "I may be an outsider, but Karnataka should be proud of having such a place as Nrityagram."

Unfortunately, the state government doesn't seem to think so, forgetting even to clear the dues it owes Bedi. Says the lady: "For the Vasanthe Habba (Spring Festival) organised on the occasion of the inauguration, the state government had promised to reimburse me for the payment to the artistes. The money has yet to come. If people consider me an outsider, why don't they think of the initial inputs into Nrityagram which came from outside the state."

Protima Bedi's (inset) Nrityagram: a dream which is yet to be realised

Ramakrishna Hegde gave Protima Bedi the land to set up Nrityagram. But the successive regimes have not been so forthcoming. Bedi attributes this to her being an "outsider"

The financial crunch did get Bedi down initially. "For what have I sacrificed the good life, my family, my social circle? I live in a tent, use an open toilet and a hot water bath has become my idea of a luxury. What else can I do?"

In the end, Protima Gauri Bedi did the most sensible thing: she flew off to Bombay to arrange for more funds. And, apparently, hit pay dirt, for now the dancer proclaims: "I'm not leaving Nrityagram. I've found my roots here and here I stay." ●

When something happens to Anil Kapoor can Madhuri Dixit be far behind?

Some time back when Anil fell ill, the shootings of a few films were cancelled. The upshot of this was that Madhuri, his most consistent co-star, earned a holiday with her family in the States.

Now it is Madhuri's turn to be indisposed after she was bitten by a rabbit during the shooting of Sahibaan at Kulu Manali. Consequently, her schedule was disrupted and shootings of her films Beta, Saajan, Zindagi Ek Jua and Pratikar were postponed.

Anil could have gone off for a holiday himself, but a very pregnant wife Sunita is not exactly the most exciting person to have around during a quick getaway—or is she?

Naseeruddin Shah: the happy square

The lush east African setting in Rajiv Rai's Vishwatma proved to be an agreeable backdrop to a host of minor off-screen romances.

There was Rajiv's beau Sonam, who had made it a point to be there to keep an eye on him, though to be fair to her she does have a minuscule role in the film.

The other two heroines, Divya Bharati and Jyotsna Singh, also kept themselve occupied. Divya with Rajiv's best friend Shabbir, who had ostensibly gone there to help with the shooting. And Jyotsna Singh, in the best traditions of a starlet desperately seeking the big time, latched on to one Umesh Patel.

When the heroines of the film had been so forthcoming, the heroes could hardly be expected to play the prude. So Dimple, who was holidaying in London came down to be with Sunny and stayed on till the shooting was over. And Chunky basked in the company of the virginal Anu Kottoor. The only happy exception to this scenario was Naseeruddin Shah who appeared only too pleased to be with his wife Ratna.

So what if the others sneered and called him a square? ●

Devi Lal and sons take over Haryana

HARYANA

The Tau of Indian politics is back in the deputy prime minister's seat. And Haryana can feel the difference. Within two days of Devi Lal's return to the Centre, the dissident drama witnessed in New Delhi was re-enacted in Chandigarh. There was a major split in the Haryana Janata Dal, with 41 of the total 86 sitting MLA s in the state breaking away and joining the faction of the party led by Chandra Shekhar. With this, the strength of the V.P. Singh-led Janata Dal in the state has been reduced to only 8. The Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) stands isolated with 16 legislative seats. And, as usual, the political scenario in the Jat-dominated state is volatile.

While Haryana politicians feel the split in the state Janata Dal was only expected, they also blame Devi Lal and Om Prakash Chautala for V.P. Singh's downfall. Commented Ran Singh Mann, a former chief parliamentary secretary who had resigned with five other MLA's over the Meham issue: "I would put the blame entirely on Chautala for destabilising V.P. Singh's party. Haryana today is not run by rulers but by looters and the 41 MLA s who have joined the Janata Dal(S) have switched sides only for money and power. Devi Lal had threatened them with dissolution of the Assembly if they did not join him."

According to Mann and other members of the Janata Dal, the state is being run entirely by Devi Lal's clan while chief minister Hukum Singh has been reduced to a "signing machine". One MLA complained that even decisions on applications for Haryana Financial Development Corporation (HFDC) loans or selection to the Haryana Service Selection Board cannot be made without the approval of Chautala. "The MLAs with Devi Lal have no political commitment and that is why they agreed to join hands with the Congress(I). With talk of dissolution and political insecurity looming before them, they had no qualms about joining Chandra Shekhar," said one MLA.

NITIN RAI

Devi Lal: in full swing

Many leaders opposed to the Devi Lal-Chautala domination in Haryana feel the current domination of the duo could only be neutralised by an amalgamation of other political forces in the near future. Though Assembly elections are due only in June 1992, there are already efforts to unite the minority faction of the Janata Dal and the Haryana Panchayat Sangharsh Samiti led by Anand Singh Dangi. There is also some speculation about former chief minister Bansi Lal breaking away from the Congress(I) (which has only 5 legislative seats in Haryana) and joining any such Janata Dal-Dangi combination.

Such an electoral alliance might well become a necessity in the future because of the absence of alternate leadership in Haryana. Both Bhajan Lal and Bansi Lal had unimpressive runs as chief ministers, and even Ajit Singh has not been able to capitalise on the rural base created in Haryana by Charan Singh. In fact, the Janata Dal and BJP leadership in Haryana today blames V.P. Singh for not taking notice of the brewing discontent and the anti-Devi Lal feeling building up among some Janata Dal legislators.

It is inevitable that in any upcoming electoral battle, the Congress(I), the BJP and both the factions of the Janata Dal would pitch in candidates for most of the seats in Haryana. Bansi Lal could play a key role in any political alliances and in any case, the state Opposition would try and push home the issue of criminalisation of politics because of the unfortunate events in Meham. On the other hand is the Janata Dal(S) which will make the deaths because of Mandal and the Ram Janmabhoomi issues its main electoral planks.

What is important is that now with the Janata Dal(S) having 41 MLAs and the support of five Independents, the proxy rule in Haryana will continue. It is only a matter of time before Devi Lal's sons—Chautala and Ranjit Singh—assert themselves as political heavyweights. The self-imposed importance of Haryana's first family on national politics is hardly likely to end soon. ●

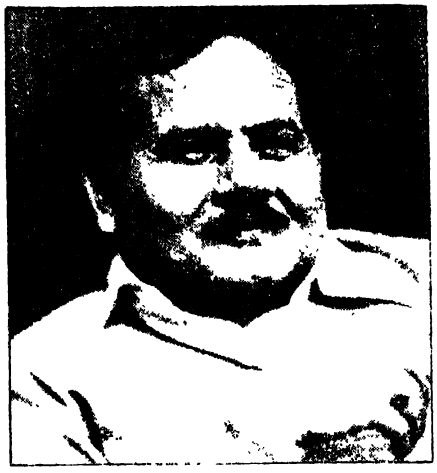
Chandra Shekhar may go slow in effecting bureaucratic changes

DELHI

The tension has eased slightly in the corridors of North Block and South Block. Word has gone around that the new Prime Minister, Chandra Shekhar, does not intend to make sweeping changes in the top echelons of the bureaucracy. At least not immediately. "The impression Chandra Shekhar wants to give is that he will not be vindictive against anyone who is identified with the old regime", said one senior bureaucrat.

While agreeing with this view, aides of the Prime Minister feel that the immediate changes, if any, will be restricted to certain key posts like those of the Cabinet secretary, home secretary, attorney general, and the solicitor general. Moreover, the chiefs of the premier intelligence agencies are also likely to be replaced. So, R.P. Joshi of the Intelligence Bureau (IB), Gouri Shankar Bajpai, Research and Analysis Wing (RAW), and Rajendra Shekhar, director of the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI), might be shifted.

Two officials, who have been asked by the Prime Minister to stay back with him are his principal secretary, B.G. Deshmukh and M.K. Narayanan, chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC). According to sources in the Prime Minister's office, Deshmukh is somewhat reluctant to continue. But in case he does, he will create history of sorts by serving three Prime Ministers in the course of one year.



As far as Narayanan is concerned, he has worked with two successive Prime Ministers - Rajiv Gandhi and V.P. Singh. Narayanan was the IB director during the Congress(I) rule but was found to be indispensable by the Raja also. In fact, though he was officially the JIC chief, Narayanan emerged as a key political adviser to the Prime Minister. This time around, Chandra Shekhar may redesignate him, but seems hesitant to do away with the brilliant police officer.

The appointment that is being watched with great interest in bureaucratic circles is of the Cabinet secretary. The present appointee, Vinod Pandey, was widely accepted as the second most powerful man in the country through 1990 - next only to V.P. Singh himself. But now Pandey is surely on his way out.

Understandably, Chandra Shekhar would like to replace Vinod Pandey with someone who is both reliable and agrees with his socialistic beliefs. Among the senior bureaucrats who are believed to have been shortlisted for the key post are: the agriculture secretary, S.K. Mishra, the West Bengal chief secretary, T.C. Dutt, the industries secretary, A.N. Verma, the home secretary, Naresh Chandra, and the Gujarat chief secretary, H.K. Khan. Among them, it is the present home secretary who is seen as the front-runner.

While Chandra Shekhar has told many of his confidants that he is averse to a major reshuffle of Governors, he is under considerable pressure to make gubernatorial changes in the two trouble-spots of Punjab and

Morarji wishes Chandra Shekhar well

One of the first things the new Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar did was to meet former Prime Minister Morarji Desai. According to Chandra Shekhar, he met the octogenarian Desai to seek his blessings.

The police machinery was geared up before Shekhar arrived. The entire route from Santacruz airport to Raj Bhavan and from Raj Bhavan to Sarang building, where Morarji Desai now stays, was heavily policed. Plain-clothes men from the special branch were posted at vital points.

The area around Sarang was crowded with people eager to get a glimpse of the new Prime Minister. "I have just come to pay my respects to Mr Desai ," Shekhar told pressmen at Morarji's house. The former Prime Minister, in a light yellow kurta, smiled broadly when Chandra Shekhar presented him with a bouquet of flowers. After ten minutes, all journalists were asked to leave, and the two leaders began a closed-door meeting. Others present in the discussions were chief minister Sharad Pawar, trade unionist Shanti Patel, state Janata Dal (S) MP Babanrao Dhankne, and Janata Party president Subramaniam Swamy. Kashmir. The present Punjab Governor, Virendra Verma, has indicated to New Delhi that he will not step down voluntarily, while the former Governor, Siddhartha Shankar Ray, who resigned after the V.P. Singh government came to power, has expressed his desire to come back.

Among the ambassadors and high commissioners, Kuldip Nayar in London and Lt Gen. S.K. Sinha (retd) in Kathmandu have already offered to step down. The rest of India's ambassadorial team might stay intact.

But till the changes are effected, the country will be kept guessing on how Chandra Shekhar is going to pick the key players to form his bureaucratic team. •

Desai told SUNDAY "It was only a courtesy call. Since Chandra Shekhar was president of the then Janata Party when my father was heading the Janata Government in 1977, Chandra Shekhar came to receive his blessings, and, of course, Mr Desai wished him well. There was no talk of politics. Chandra Shekhar has promised to visit again when he comes to Bombay on 25 November."

The press had a tough time covering the visit. At first, security personnel refused to let journalists go up to Morarji Desai's sixth floor flat. Finally, after heated arguments, they relented and allowed small groups in. When members of the press complained to Chandra Shekhar, the Prime Minister smiled and promised that there would be no such trouble the next time. •

Biju faces angry crowds in Ganjam

ORISSA

A copter circled Ganjam district for some time and then began descending at Soroda. Inside was chief minister Biju Patnaik, taking a bird's eye-view of the havoc caused by the rivers Rusikulya and Badanadi which had overflowed their banks on 4 November. Below, around the helipad, a crowd of weary people stood waiting. And as the craft touched down and Biju emerged, hoping to hear a chorus of slogans in his praise, a volley of chappals and brickbats greeted the chief minister. For almost a week the people of Soroda had waited to vent their anger and an unwary Biju found himself at the receiving end.

If such was the reception Biju received, the plight of other ministers touring the district was worse. Surendranath Patnaik, minister of revenue, and Ramakrushna Patnaik, minister of rural development, were gheraoed and humiliated at Soroda and other places, as relief had not reached the people even four days after the floods.

To the people of Ganjam, the floods this season were the worst natural calamity in living memory. Nearly a hundred people are believed to have died, property worth Rs 2 crores has been destroyed and standing crops—Ganjam is known as the rice bowl of Orissa—ruined. But for four days, the nonplussed administration had remained paralysed.

While the people reeled under the floods, Biju was away in Delhi trying to solve the crisis in the Janata Dal. And after the hostile reception he got at Soroda a week after the disaster, the chief minister flew back to Bhubaneswar, where he held a press conference and lambasted the bureaucracy for failing to cope with an emergency.

But it was the state Cabinet more than the officialdom that lacked direction. Even ten days after the calamity, the chief minister and his colleagues were handing out divergent versions of the death toll and the damages. The ministers thus betrayed a total lack of coordination among themselves and between them and the bureaucracy.

Official sources admit that the tragedy was to a large extent man-made. The Rusikulya and the Badanadi, as well as their tributaries, were already flowing well above the danger level when the irrigation department released huge quantities of water from three reservoirs at Ghodahada, Soroda and Doha without forewarning the people. The disaster was aggravated by the fact that the people of Ganjam—unlike those living in the districts of Balasore, Cuttack and Puri—were unaccustomed to floods.

With six lakh people affected in 600 villages and standing crops destroyed on nearly one lakh hectares of land, the economy of Ganjam lies shattered, and so does the popularity of the Janata Dal government in the state. It will be quite some time before the economy is rejuvenated, but it may not be quite the same for the government's credibility which seems to have been largely washed away. •

MADHYA PRADESH

Fire redeems. Fire purifies. And fire destroys incriminating evidence. Recently there has been a lot of purification, or whatever, in the government offices of this BJP-state. There have been several cases of fire, including one at a university, in the past three months.

First it was the office room of the collectorate in Raipur. Several files were destroyed in the accident. Most concerned certain scandals involving officials of the administration. Needless to say, quite a few skins were saved by the convenient flames.

This incident was closely followed by another. One particular almirah in the sales tax office in Raipur suddenly burst into flames. It contained all the files on two particular trading firms which had been raided recently and were found to have entered into an unrecorded transaction of Rs 50 lakhs.

And in Ambikapur, a fire in the irrigation office happened to completely destroy tender documents, cash books, receipts and several other papers. Some officials, it seems, were facing charges of corruption.

Incidentally, it is not only government offices that have sudden mysterious fires. The Ravi Shankar University in Raipur experienced it as well. Just two days after the local press flashed reports of university staff manipulating examination marksheets (including the photostat copy of a note by a university employee to a student asking for the promised money now that the job was done), a fire engulfed the section which stored all examination records. It is now quite impossible to substantiate any of those corruption charges. And possibly the system of made-to-order marksheets will continue as a result. •

Former home minister Jalappa is acquitted in the Rasheed murder case

KARNATAKA

R.L. Jalappa is a happy man. The former home minister in the erstwhile Janata Party government headed by Ramakrishna Hegde, has won the first round in the controversial Rasheed murder case. Three years ago, M. Abdul Rasheed, a Kerala lawyer was found murdered near Salem and Jalappa was implicated in the case. Jalappa was acquitted, while seven policemen were sentenced to varying degrees of jail terms in a judgement handed down by the district and sessions judge of Salem, V. Rangaswamy, on 7 November. The case had taken the state by storm, as a sitting state home minister was charge-sheeted for abetting murder. It is highly unlikely, however, that it will peter down with the judgment.

The acquittal will not mean Jalappa's re-entry into mainstream politics just yet. With a new government at the Centre,he cannot look forward to easy legal battles that are sure to follow in the higher courts

MUSHTAQ AHMED

But for Jalappa, who has been sidelined in state politics because of the case, the judgement was small consolation. When contacted by SUNDAY, he said: "This case had certainly harmed me. It ruined me. The judgement shows that truth prevails."

A close associate of former chief minister Hegde, Jalappa is hedging about the verdict, for he knows that with a new dispensation at the Centre the tables could yet again be turned on him. With one DCP (deputy commissioner of police) sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment and two constables to life terms, the case is certain to go up to the Supreme Court.

For the present, Jalappa seems determined to lie low as he has done since the case hit the headlines in 1987. Though he had protested that he was not involved in the murder -and Hegde had staunchly stood by him— Jalappa had to resign as home minister and seek anticipatory bail.

Jalappa's role in the mysterious death of Kerala lawyer, M. Abdul Rasheed, was suspected because of his interests in a medical college. The Hegde government had, in 1987, granted permission for opening a medical college in Kolar to a trust headed by one Sadasivam of Kerala. But Jalappa, who was part of another trust called the Devaraj Urs trust had been able to get that order changed in favour of his trust.

On the cancellation of the permission, Sadasivam roped in Rasheed from Kerala to fight his case. But when Rasheed arrived in Bangalore on 9 August, 1987, he was arrested by the city police and roughed up. Released on self-bail, Rasheed landed at newspaper offices to complain of police harassment at the instance of Jalappa.

Soon afterwards, Rasheed disappeared and his body was found four days later, near a railway track near Salem, about 200 km from Bangalore. Suspected foul play lead to the demand for Jalappa's resignation from the Cabinet.

Since it was a lawyer who had been murdered, the Bangalore Bar Association took up the issue and mounted pressure on Hegde to dismiss Jalappa. Besides boycotting the courts, they also wanted to seek the Governor's permission to prosecute Jalappa since Hegde was refusing to take action.

Although Hegde decried the demand as a ploy by the Congress government at the Centre to destabilise his government, he was forced to ask the CBI to enquire into the case. Under the Congress dispensation, the CBI quickly chargesheeted 21 people for "kidnap, wrongful confinement, conspiracy, murder and causing disappearance of evidence in the murder of Rasheed".

And soon enough the CBI accused Jalappa of "hatching a conspiracy and engineering the murder of Rasheed". Three days later, Jalappa resigned, saying the charges were "politically motivated".

Through 1988 and 1989, the case dragged on in the Salem courts with depositions by a number of witnesses produced by the CBI. But the case began to turn topsy-turvy early this year—for, by then, the Janata Dal had come to power at the Centre.

In rapid succession, the witnesses started turning hostile and accused the CBI of harassing and torturing them and getting them to attest "blank sheets of statements under duress". It was by then clear that the case had been progressing according to the dictates of the Centre.

The verdict, however, will not see Jalappa's confident re-entry into mainstream politics just yet. With Chandra Shekhar at the helm now—one of whose bete noire is Ramakrishna Hegde—Jalappa cannot look forward to having an easy run at the legal battles that are to follow in the higher courts. But that again depends on how long Shekhar's government will last and whose orders the CBI will follow next. ●

Famine blossoms

The flowering of bamboo creates panic among tribals

When flowers bloom in the lush bamboo plantations in the hills of the northeast, the tribesmen are thrown into a state of panic. The rare phenomenon of the flowering of a dwarf-sized bamboo species trigger a boom in the rat population. They devour the crops in nearby farmlands. The result is famine.

The mauve-coloured flowers sprouting in the hill-slopes in the sprawling Seppa valley in east Kameng district, Arunachal Pradesh, are a palpable threat to the state government. The worries are justified, if the catastrophe caused by the flowering of a bamboo species named Mau in Mizoram in 1959 is anything to go by. Rodents had multiplied in millions during the flowering of Mau bamboos and ravaged the crops in the foothills. The ire of the Mizos over the government's indifference towards them during the famine that followed was exploited by Laldenga, the legendary Mizo leader, to gather momentum for a popular revolt.

The flowering of the bamboo species in Arunachal Pradesh was first noticed in September this year. The depradations by the rats in the paddy, maize and millet fields from Bhalukpong on the Assam border to Seppa valley in the north were reported soon after wards. As the agriculture department rushed its field-staff to the affected areas to fight the rampaging rodents with rat-traps and zinc phosphate, fresh alarms were sounded with flowering reported from the Tezu circle.

According to MLA Hari Natung, much of the crops in Kameng had been destroyed by October. The state veterinary minister, Kameng Dolo, also confirmed the reports of a near-famine condition in that inaccessible district. The rats, feeding on the flower seedlings, continue to multiply. Till today, 33,000 rats, of the 26 varieties in the state have been trapped with the help of indigenous devices. Chief minister Gegong Apang has sent an SOS to the Centre for both supplies and expertise in combating the rat menace.

This intriguing biological relationship between the bamboo flowering and an increase in the population of rats is now being elaborately studied by the life scientists of NEHU, Shillong, and Delhi University, in collaboration with the Shillong campus of the ICAR.

Bamboo flowers: evil beauty

While the bamboo flowering has occurred for the first time in Arunachal Pradesh, it is no longer a new phenomenon in Mizoram. Two different recurring types of famine (known as Thingtam and Mautam) strike the land in an ominous interval of 48 to 50 years. The Mautam ravaged their lands in 1861, 1911 and 1959. Its next upheaval is due in the year 2007. The Thingtam occurred in 1880, 1927, 1929, and due to strike again in 2025. Why the flowering sweeps the bamboo trees in cycles is still baffling to the biologists. Old Mizo folk-lore has an answer. It is God's own way of punishing His chosen people for their accumulated sins. ●

The last Metro

The MGM theatre in Calcutta is up for auction

WEST BENGAL

On 10 December, the Metro theatre of Calcutta will be up for sale. The scheduled auction would be an ironic death-blow to the cultural hallmark that once served as a status symbol for the upper crust of British Bengal. Yet a huge backlog of unpaid taxes has suddenly made the state government sit up, take notice and serve the same on the management.

Exactly 55 years ago, in December 1935, the Metro cinema hall opened in Calcutta, with Laurel and Hardy's Bonnie Scotland. Advertised by MGM as "India's finest cinema", this theatre had the distinction of running exclusively Hollywood greats in a carefully created atmosphere of sophisticated luxury. The visitors included British officers, Maharajas and corporate bosses; high society ladies moving in wisps of expensive perfume, their feet sinking ankle-deep in the lush softness of the red carpets. French chandeliers glittered, the air-conditioning sprayed a fine mist of delicate cologne, the bars served true French wine and Scotch whisky to the honoured guests. And the rest was left up to Greta Garbo, Gary Cooper or Marlene Dietrich.

Today, next to sepia and white pictures of young Liz Taylor, Richard Burton and Omar Sharif on the first floor, glares a garish coloured poster of Pratibandh—currently running at the Metro. The hall was thrown open to Hindi movies only after the Metro Theatre Company in the USA was sold out and a "Swiss company" bought the two Metro halls in Calcutta and Bombay. That was in 1972, and the theatre has been steadily dying ever since. The treasured ambience of yesteryears has been replaced by shrill whistles, cat-calls and bawdy comments.

"The audience today rips off the seats if unhappy with the show," says Santosh Mazumdar, the secretary of the Metro Cinema Employees' Union. "They scream for an extra-loud soundtrack. They have no class, no civic sense..." The grand Westex projector and soundbox installed for the release of Ben Hur in 1961 wheeze on.

Former information minister P. Upendra's interest in taking over the Metro had made the workers hopeful. But the change at the Centre has altered the picture

And the Metro has no money to bring back the past glory. The "Swiss company" that bought the halls was owned by a Shiv Shankar Gupta, a diamond merchant of dubious reputation, and there was a lot of legal trouble regarding the change of hand. The government takeover bid in 1976—on the basis of FERA violations—was countered by the management. But the finance ministry refused to let the matter pass. The Reserve Bank also opposed the applications of this apparently foreign firm, which had not gone through the procedure permitted by the FERA while buying the Metro theatres. Gupta immediately floated another company, Golden Films and Finance Pvt. Ltd, which collects the rent from four offices that occupy parts of the building.

"This money should be ours," says Santosh Mazumdar. "We get no money from the proprietor. All expenses of this establishment, including our salaries, are met out of ticket-money. In fact, we have no manager, assistant manager or accountant. Gupta is legally bound to pay the taxes, but he doesn't even do that." And with the taxes heaping up to almost 13 lakhs, the Metro is up for the auctioneer's hammer.

After discussions in Parliament and former Union information and broadcasting minister P. Upendra's interest in taking over and shaping up the Metro, the employees' union was hopeful. The changes at the Centre might put an end to that. But the union still hopes for a last minute turnaround. Rumours that the building will be pulled down and replaced by a hotel have the old employees sending heart-broken appeals to the government to save the cultural hallmark. But minus the glamour and the glory, the Metro might just be any other cinema hall. Unless one is taking a lazy trip down memory lane, that is. ●

But will kabaddi be included in the 1994 Asian Games?

Will kabaddi end up as a one-Games wonder? Or will it find a place in the Hiroshima Asian Games in '94? Four years ago, in Seoul, a new sport was introduced in the Asian Games schdeule—taekwando. It was essentially a Far Eastern sport, with its base in South Korea. The latter had included it in the Games with the intention of bagging an additional gold metal. But when the roster for the Beijing Games was drawn up, taekwando found no place.

Kabaddi's case was slightly different. Although it was essentially centred in the Indian sub-continent, the game had had a longish run in the international arena. Kabaddi was included in the South Asian Federation Games and Asian-level competitions as well.

But strangely, kabaddi was not included in the New Delhi Asiad—though India did have the opportunity of doing so in 1982. But, thanks to the peculiar attitude of Messrs Bhalinder Singh and company, kabaddi was just an exhibition sport when the Games were held in India.

At the Asian Games level, the untiring efforts of the Amateur Kabaddi Federation of India (AKFI) officials were rewarded in China this year. The Chinese Olympic Committee was wooed by AKFI office-bearers from the time the World Table Tennis Championships were held in Calcutta in 1975. Their efforts were rewarded when kabaddi was included in the Asian Games held in Beijing this year

That's not all. The kabaddi team brought home from China the only gold medal for the country. Naturally, a great deal of interest suddenly shifted to this game, which has all along been labelled as a "country sport". Now, the government as well as sponsors are getting enthusiastic about an indigenous game that has actually been played in several parts of Asia for centuries, in different forms of course.

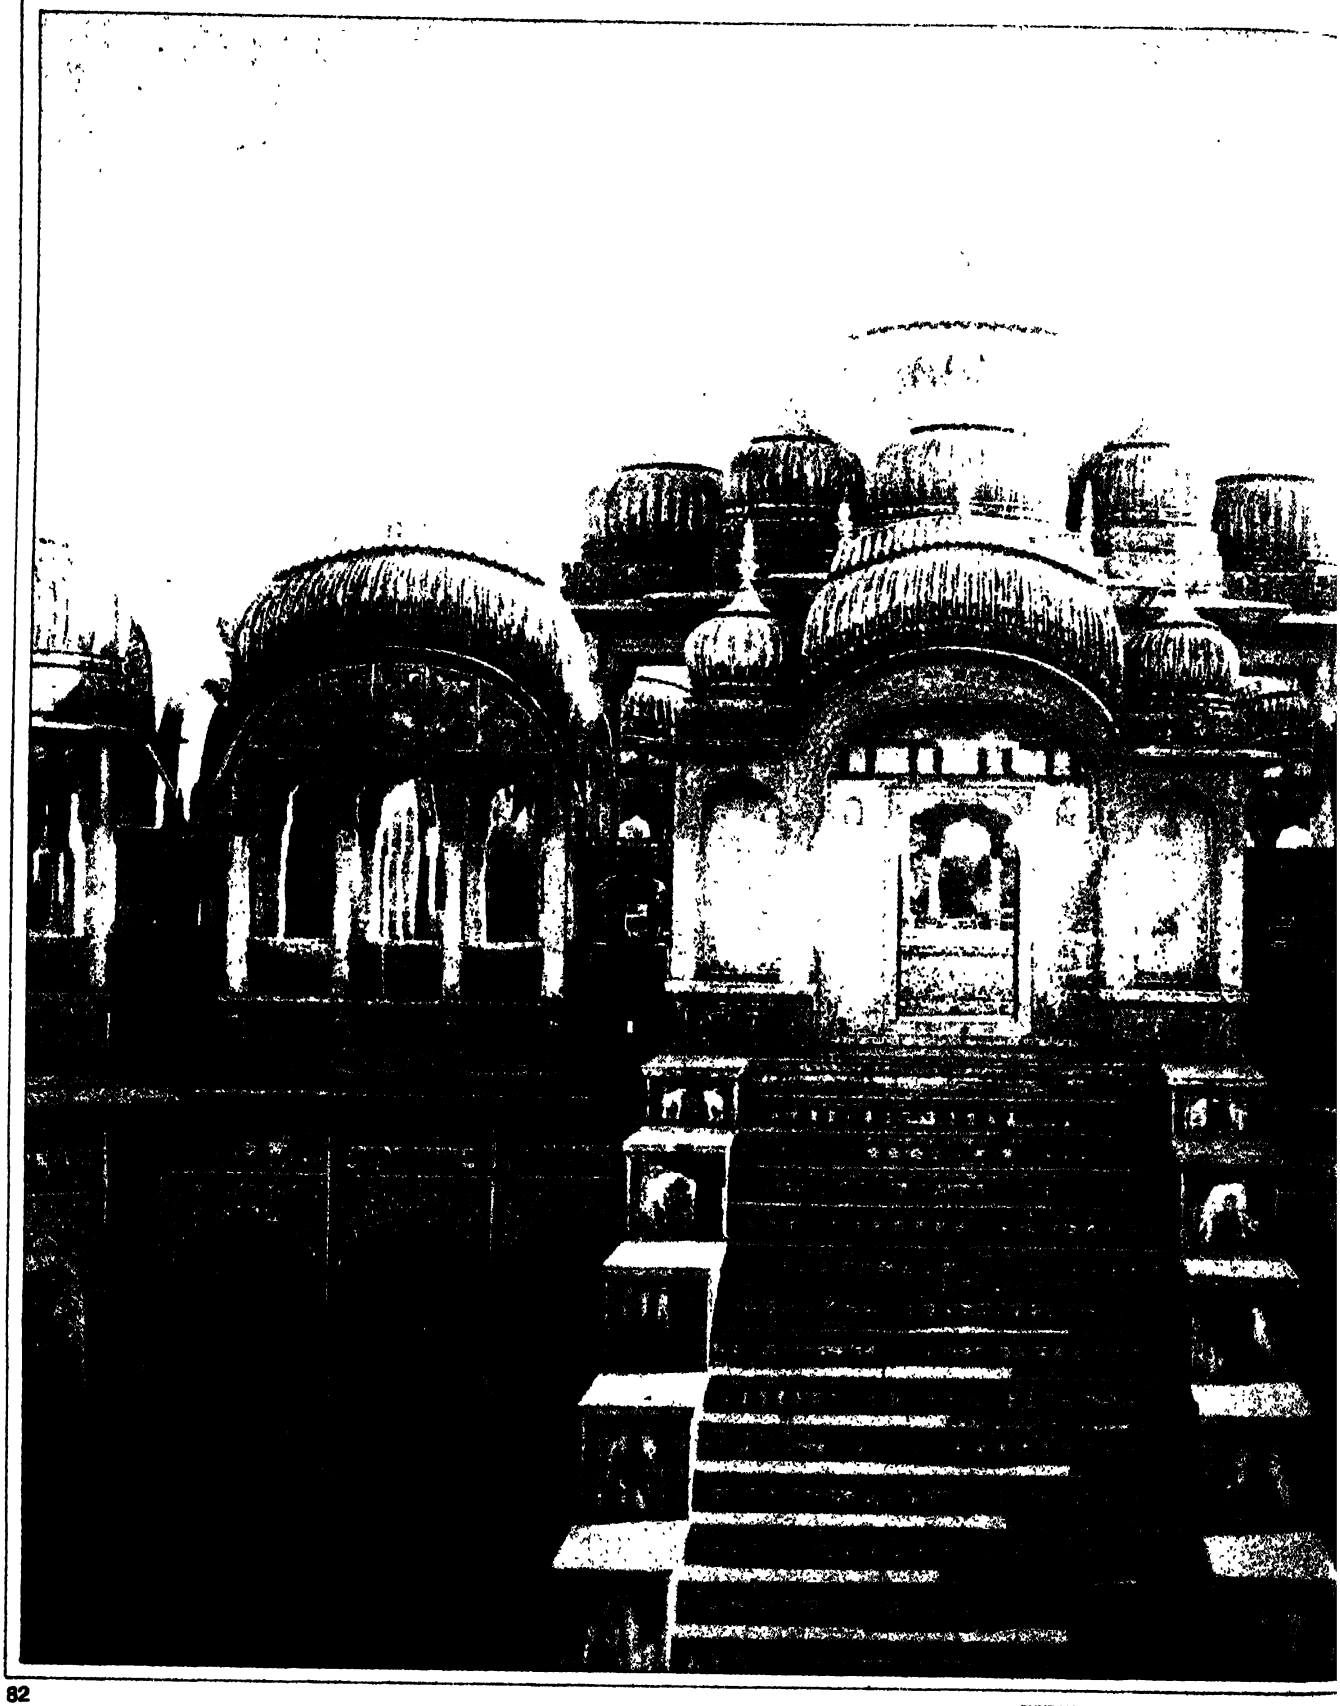
But, in this hour of triumph, clouds of uncertainty have gathered over the future of the sport at the Asian level. South Korea, despite its money-power and influence in the region, failed to get taekwando included in the Beijing Games. And kabaddi, too, does not find a place in the 1994 Asian Games.

The Asian Amateur Kabaddi Federation secretary-general, Achintya Kumar Saha, had made a trip to Hiroshima last year to try and convince the organisers that kabaddi should form a part of the Games there. But several factors have weighed against its inclusion and it does not find a place in the first list of games approved for 1994. However, efforts are on to have it included.

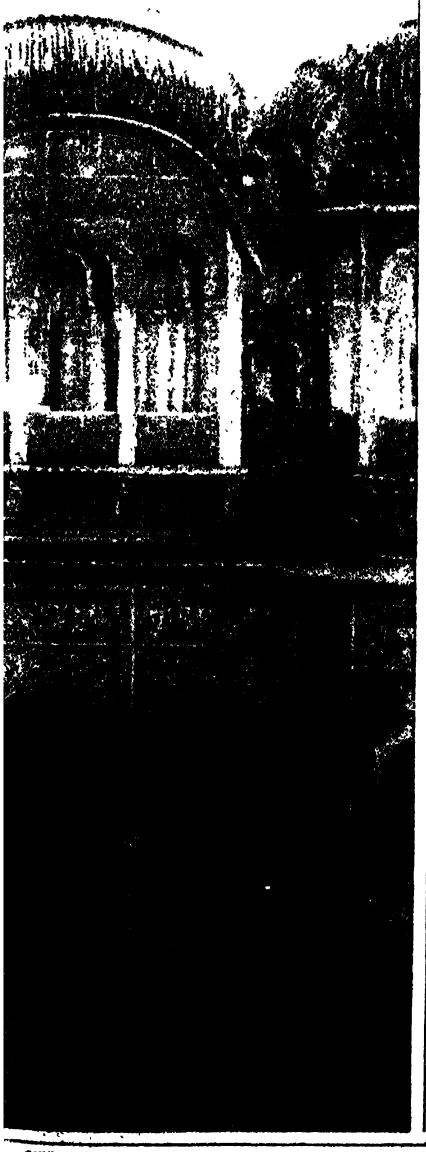
The primary objection was that Hiroshima was a small place and therefore, there wasn't either room or money to include all the games that the Olympic Council of Asia would have liked.

NIKHIL BHATTACHARYA

A tense moment during the India-Bangladesh finals in Beijing



A.K. Saha's argument was that kabaddi personnel would not exceed 150 people - a small fraction of the total number of participants. More important was the cost factor. Saha convinced the organisers that their expenses would not even total one per cent of the total Games cost—an argument that seems to have satisfied the organisers.



The actual problem, however, lies elsewhere. Kabaddi is now being played by India, Bangladesh, Pakistan, Nepal, China, Japan, Bhutan, Sri Lanka, Singapore and Malaysia. The problem is that these national federations—apart from those in Japan, Bangladesh, China and India—are not rich enough to afford frequent foreign trips. That is why lobbying for the game is difficult at the international level. It has become imperative that more Asian countries are introduced to the game to create a mass base.

It is here that kabaddi needs the help of the Indian government. The AKFI has urged the government to include kabaddi in its cultural exchange programme with other Asian countries. The government has already taken steps in this regard, but there is need for more contact. A tour of Japan by junior kabaddi teams has already been approved by the government. So has a trip to Bangladesh for the men's team.

Right now, what is needed is a concerted attempt to get more countries interested in kabaddi. From the Indian point of view, this is essential because, at least for another two Asian Games, we could count on kabaddi fetching the gold medal. With the kind of performance put up by the Indian contingent in Beijing, the government and the Indian Olympic Association should ensure that kabaddi is included in the Hiroshima Asiad, because it is, at the moment the only sport that could ensure a gold. More important, if the game is included in two successive Asiads, it could become a permanent feature of the Games. ●

BIKANER

A celebration of the legendary Rajput kingdom. An extract from Naveen Patnaik's new book

Five hundred years ago, Maharaja Rao Bika founded Bikaner on the borders of the desert in a region called Jangal Pradesh.

Since then, the kingdom has been one of the most colourful in Rajputana. Its kings, palaces and heritage have featured in legends, songs and poems.

In these extracts from his acclaimed study of the traditions of the state Naveen Patnaik captures the flavours of Bikaner.

THE PUJA

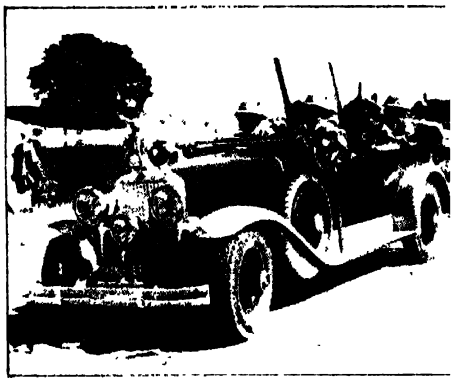
WORSHIP

SOME TWENTY miles outside the city of Bikaner stands a unique temple dedicated to Karniji, a woman who lived five centuries ago and was reputed to possess miraculous powers, such as the gift of prophecy. She is the guardian deity of the Bikaner dynasty because it was her predictions and blessings that guided Bika in the founding of his kingdom.



As a girl Karniji herded cattle and displayed great devotion to animals. In reverence to her memory, to this day any animal that strays into the temple is fed by her devotees. Karniji belonged to a local clan of troubadours, the Charans. According to legend, one of Karniji's clansmen placed the corpse of his only son before her and pleaded with the mystic lady to restore the child to life. Moved by the man's sorrow, Karniji entered into a deep trance in which she confronted Yama, the God of Death, and asked for the boy's soul. Yama did not yield to her appeal, answering that the child's soul had already been reincarnated in another body. An enraged Karniji vowed that none of her clansmen would ever come under Yama's power. She declared that when they died they would inhabit the bodies of rats, and when such rats died they would assume life as Charans once again.

Hundreds of rats scurry over the floors of Karniji's temple eating from huge bowls overflowing with sweetmeats, grain and milk donated by pilgrims. If an unwary visitor kills a rat, he has to donate a silver replica of his victim to the temple.

Other temples and shrines built by the pious abound in Bikaner. The best known amongst them is the Laxmi Narain temple where the Maharaja is considered the main disciple. The city also contains the beautiful Bhandeshwar temple built by those professing the Jain faith. And everywhere outside the places of worship in this pious kingdom, bards once recited ancient histories and sang the legends of religious mythology on holy days.

THE HUNT

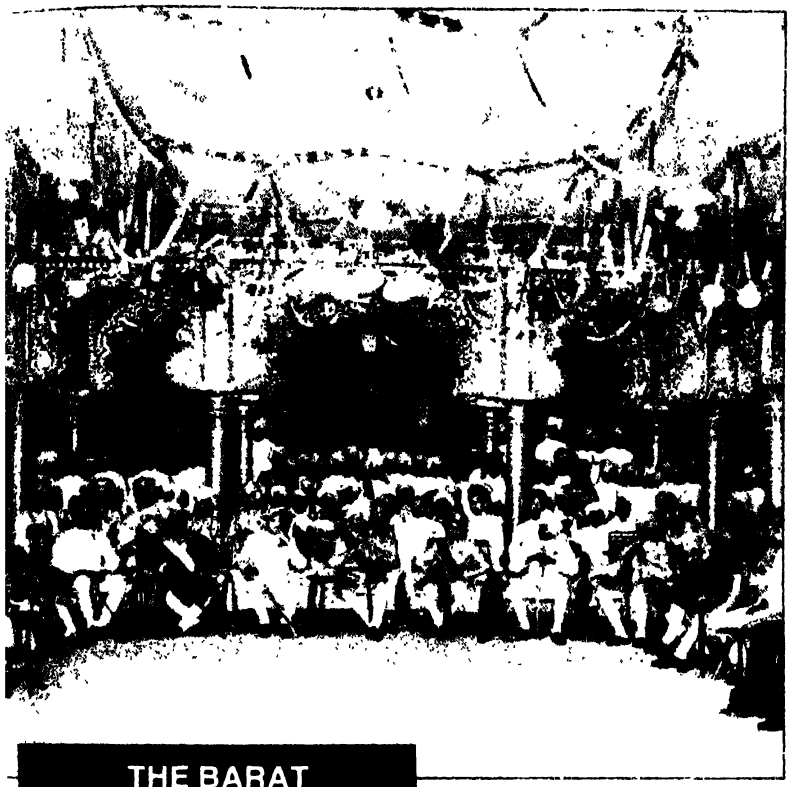
Holy days are celebrated in Bikaner's towns and villages with festivals, other functions and fairs, each having their individual form and rituals. They come with the change of seasons—Basant and Holi during the spring, Teej and Shivbari during the rains and Sharad Purnima and Diwali in autumn.

Many other individual festivals are also celebrated, especially Ganguar, the great folk festival of Rajasthan, when women give thanks for a happy married life, and young girls pray for a good husband. At this festival, idols of the God Shiva and his consort Parvati are worshipped. At dawn maidens bathe idols of the God and Goddess and then decorate them with fresh blossoms, and at sunset place lit lamps in front of them. The Teej of Bhadwa is another important ceremony for the women of Bikaner. Wives fast for their husbands all day and then at night, having donned rich garments, they worship the moon with offerings of water.

The traditional fair of Shivbari remains a popular celebration. A few miles outside the city of Bikaner is a temple dedicated to Shiva, built on the banks of a large reservoir of rain water. In the month of Shrawan, when the moon is full, people come to worship the idol of Lord Shiva at this temple, with its battlements and dome shimmering in the moonlight.

The birthday of Lord Krishna is celebrated with nights of devotional music in the temples and the festival of lights, Diwali, is celebrated throughout Bikaner with fireworks and lit lamps. Holi, the spring festival of colour, is celebrated with great abandon. The revellers spray each other with coloured water well into the night, unlike other places in India, where the festival ends decorously at noon.



SHIKAR

THE ONE relaxation Maharaja Ganga Singh, a crack shot, permitted himself was the pleasure of the hunt—shikar. In the state of Bikaner there was little big game, so for hunting lion, tiger, bear and bison, the Maharaja was the honoured guest of rulers in whose jungles such game abounded, or of other high officials in provinces of British India.

In his own kingdom, Maharaja Ganga Singh made his hunting preserve at Gajner legendary for his Imperial Sand Grouse shoot. The grouse was considered a delicacy, but Gajner also offered wild duck, black buck, chinkara, and wild boar.

During the Christmas season, the Imperial Sand Grouse shoot at Gajner was the most sought-after invitation in the Indian social calender. Heads of state, international royalty, Indian rulers, viceroys, and Ganga Singh's personal friends were entertained at week-long house parties at the beautiful palace in Gajner leading down to the lake on which they spent the day in shikar.

Paradoxically, Ganga Singh, while a keen hunter, was avid about conserving wildlife. He introduced different breeds of deer and birds into the state, wildlife preserves were replanted with trees, bush and grass to provide food and shelter for animals, and wardens were posted to see that no poaching took place in the jungle. There was a ban on the hunting of animals during the breeding season, the killing of female animals and their young was strictly prohibited, and anyone caught trapping was severely punished. Enclaves were constructed to protect the animals in their habitat. An illustration of the care given to animals involved a species of Bikaner deer suffering from mineral deficiency. Royal game wardens were instructed to tie slabs of rock salt to the tree trunks so that the deer could lick it and cure themselves.

THE BARAT

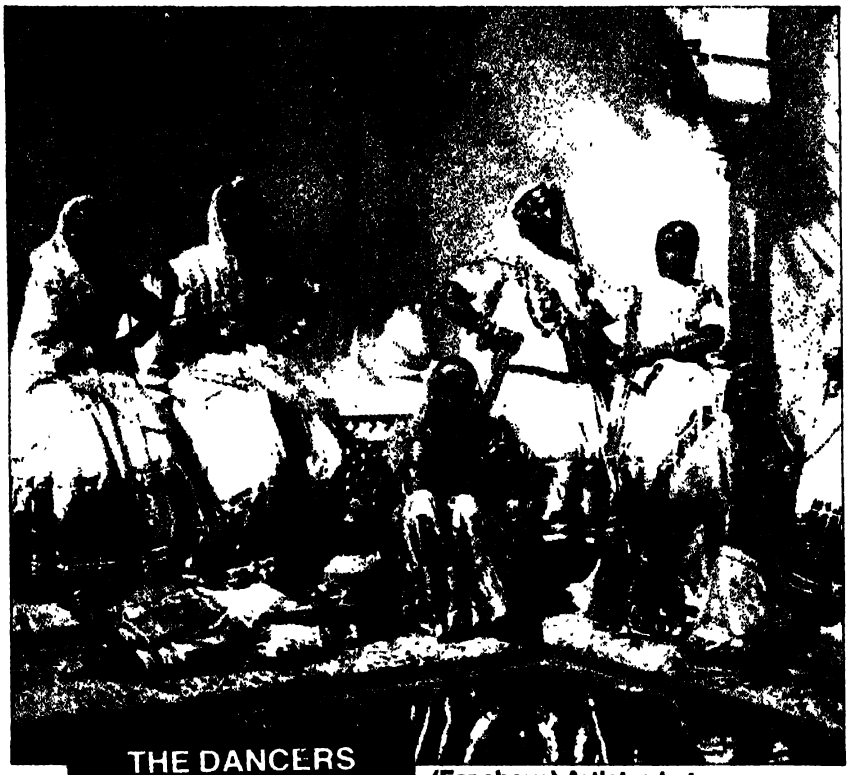
Ganga Singh's grandson, Maharaja Karni Singh, while sharing his grandfather's encyclopedic knowledge of Bikaner's birds and animals as well as his skill at shooting—he represented India in marksmanship at several Olympic Games—abhorred killing. Karni Singh converted the hunting preserves of Gajner into a wildlife sanctuary and now in the Christmas season, hundreds of visitors crowd the grounds of the hunting palace to watch the Imperial Sand Grouse, wild duck and cranes from distant Siberia drink from the waters of the lake, but the glamour of the brilliant hunting season is gone.

ROYAL ALLIANCES

IN THE kingdoms of Rajputana, princes and princesses were generally betrothed as children and married



During the Christmas season, the Imperial Sand Grouse shoot at Gajner—Maharaja Ganga Singh's legendary hunting preserve—was the most sought-after invitation in the Indian social calendar when they had barely entered their teens. Matrimonial alliances were arranged by their elders and the bride and bridegroom saw each other for the first time on their wedding night.

The organisation of such marriages was a lengthy affair. The horoscopes of the boy and girl had to be found compatible. Royal priests from the kingdoms entering into these matrimonial alliances had to discover an auspicious date for the wedding and consult each other on matters of ritual and etiquette, while ministers drove hard bargains on the dowry of the royal bride.

Traditionally, the weddings took place in the bride's kingdom, and during the last century wedding celebrations often took months and necessitated long journeys by caravan to distant kingdoms. In fact, even as late as the 1870s, when Maharaja Dungar Singh married a princess of Kutch, the journey to her state on the coast of the Arabian sea and the subsequent wedding celebrations took six months. A hundred restless young men who had accompanied their ruler to his wedding party suddenly decided to wed 100 young maidens of Kutch on the same evening as their sovereign. When Maharaja Ganga Singh narrated this tale to a visiting viceroy, the Englishman exclaimed, "Phew! What a night."

By the time of Ganga Singh the days of travel by horse, camel and elephant were a thing of the past. Now the barat, or bridegroom's party arrived by private train or in their own aircraft. Having reached the bride's capital the barat would proceed in a grand procession of elephants, troops and bands to the wedding. The bride's palace was always beautifully decorated with flowers and wall paintings, and every tree and arch was outlined with garlands of electric lights. The bridegroom was greeted by the bride's father, watched by a crowd of kinsmen and courtiers. Blessing his future son-in-law with gold coins to remove the evil eye, the father-in-law distributed gold as largesse to the bridegroom's retainers. Then the bridegroom entered the harem quarters alone, where surrounded by giggling ladies he was blessed by the bride's mother. The mother ushered him into a courtyard containing the marriage pavilion curtained with garlands of flowers. In the presence of the royal ladies, with the only men present being the priest, the bride's father and the bride's brother, the groom circled the sacred fire with his veiled bride.

While the wedding ceremony was in progress the bridegroom's party was being lavishly entertained outside the walls of the zenana. At the conclusion of the ceremonies, the bridegroom's party would carry the weeping bride off triumphantly in a doli, or covered palanquin, while the bride's family sang hymns of mourning for the loss of a daughter. ●

ODDS AND TRENDS

From India with love

■ The postal department in London received a shock last month. A giant centipede sent by mail from India to a pet dealer in England escaped from its box and caused panic among the postal workers, until one brave man managed to put a bin over it.

"It's a nightmare because it can move so fast and its venom is worse than a bee sting," said Mathew Robertson of the London zoo's invertebrate house. Meanwhile, the centipede is feasting on crickets and locusts at the zoo, blissfully unaware of the chaos it caused.

The dinosaurs are coming

■ For those interested in primitive life on earth, the Children's Museum in Egmore might just be their hunt. A nine-metre replica of the tyrannosaurus, a pre-historic reptile, will be the major attraction at the museum very soon

Says Keshava Ram, director of the museum, "Although textbooks and relatively older scientific material placed the animal's existence in the Jurassic era (130-150 million years ago), advanced scientific thinking and practical experiments have led to the belief that the animal could have lived even a few thousands of years ago." Another model of a stegosaurus will soon follow the tyrannosaurus.

Ballooning Buddha

■ Don't be surprised if you happen to see a ballooning Buddha. Well-known balloonist, Vishwa Bandhu Gupta, has offered to lift the gigantic statue of Buddha out of Hussain Sagar Lake with the aid of a balloon. The 350-ton statue sank last year while being ferried to the middle for installation.

The 'sky-crane' used will be a hot-air balloon with a volume of over a million cubic feet. The advantage, Gupta insists, will be that the statue could be installed in the middle at the same time. The operation is feasible, according to him, although it will require the building of a record size balloon. The rescue, if successful, will be the first of its kind in the world, and will speak volumes for the Indian imagination

Jai Hanuman!

■ Unusual as it may seem, monekys have hit the headlines at Ayodhya. In a letter to President R Venkataraman, Dr S.M. Mohnot, a scientist, claimed that the primates of the temple town are displeased about the deployment of para-military forces there. Unaccustomed to the presence of so many men in uniform, the monkeys are suffering from trauma, Dr Mohnot insisted. Citing a study by the international unit of the Primate Protection League, he expressed concern about the increased rate of females aborting this breeding season. To further the crisis, hunger and diarrhoea have struck the monkey community. In a frantic bid to save the endangered group of our monkey-brothers, the doctor has called for vanar seva (serve the monkey).

Drown the duo

Even the loss of the prime ministership hasn't taught the Raja any lessons. For, much to the dismay of his party colleagues, he continues to treat the casteist duo of Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav as favoured members of his coterie.

Yadav and Paswan are among the first visitors to 1, Teen Murti Lane every morning. And more often than not they bring along with them an assorted bunch of youngsters, all of whom are made to squat on the lawns while the Raja lectures them on his distinctive brand of secularism and casteism.

Once the morning darshan is over, V.P. Singh sits down to chalk out his tour programme, beginning with a visit to Bihar. Paswan and Yadav stand on either side, while the Raja scribbles down the name of a town or so, and then, suffering second thoughts, promptly erases it.

The Dal workers would rather he blanks out Paswan and Yadav. But the Raja doesn't seem to be in a particularly obliging mood these days.

HEARD AT CHANDRA SHEKHAR'S HOUSE

How could you have expected Routray to have loved nature considering what it had done to him.

A MANEKA GANDHI SUPPORTER

The seating arrangement for the special session of Parliament, even given the short notice, was bizarre to say the least. Yes, Chandra Shekhar occupied the Prime Minister's seat in place of V.P. Singh. But sitting directly opposite him in the seat of leader of the Opposition was none other than Rajiv Gandhi, whose party is propping up the minority Janata Dal (S) regime.

The Raja was put in the uncomfortable position of having to share a bench with BJP president L.K. Advani, who'd unseated him only a couple of weeks ago. The two leaders exchanged slightly frosty greetings and then ignored each other.

Perhaps, what summed up the curious situation best was the point of order raised by a Dal member. How could they vote in favour or against the council of ministers, when the ministry hadn't even been constituted?

THERMOMETER

The anti-Mulayam brigade of the Congress(I)

- Sheila Dixit: Two Assembly segments of her constituency fall within Etawah district. Not surprisingly then, there is no love lost between Dixit and Mulayam. But it was Congressman Darshan Singh Yadav's arrest and the subsequent imprisonment of Dixit herself which increased the lady's animosity. Now leads the anti-Mulayam Singh faction.

- Balram Singh Yadav: He and Mulayam Singh began in politics around the same time; soon finding themselves in opposing camps. Over the years, Balram Singh has tried his best to cut down his rival using his Congress(I) connections. Hence the idea that Mulayam may survive due to Congress support is anathema to him.

- Dinesh Singh: Bears no personal grudge against Mulayam, but going by the feedback he gets from district-level party workers thinks it best that the Congress disscciate itself from Yadav's antics.

- Mahavir Prasad: The AICC(I) general-secretary has spent a lot of time with party workers from eastern UP, particularly from the Gorakhpur division (near Ayodhya). Hence, is aware that anti-Mulayam Singh feelings run high. Prasad, therefore, has thrown in his lot with the anti-Yadav lobby.

- Rajendra Kumari Bajpai: Had nothing against Mulayam Singh initially. But a visit to Ayodhya changed that. Soon after, Bajpai held a press conference to lambast the chief minister for his handling of the situation, which she maintained had heightened communal tension.

Where's the welcome party?

It wasn't much of welcome Shekhar received when he attended Parliament for the first time as Prime Minister. Only a motley group of officials were present on the steps of the House to greet him, with no senior leaders in sight.

But Shekhar had only himself to blame for this. For, the newly-appointed PM had neglected to appoint the minister of parliamentary affairs, or any other, for that matter. And since the Tau was hardly likely to accede to the request that he arrive before the PM to escort him in, Shekhar had to rest content with the usual crowd of bureaucrats.

Ambani can write to me too

The communists can't believe their luck. Soon after their allegation, on the floor of Parliament, that Chandra Shekhar's bid for the prime ministership was financed by the Ambanis and the Hindujas, who should write to the Prime Minister's Office but non-resident Sindhi businessman S.P. Hinduja.

Apparently, Hinduja has been sending letters to Prime Minister Shekhar, suggesting how best to improve the economic situation of the country, when he's not lobbying for auditing of the accounts of political parties.

But, we all know what the Prime Minister will say to that. He sees no reason why any Indian—non-resident or otherwise—can't write to him. So what if his name is Hinduja?

Mine by right

The failure of the Chandra Shekhar-Devi Lal duo to decide on their council of ministers has generated a fair amount of humour in political circles. The latest joke doing the rounds goes like this.

After hours spent negotiating who would get which ministry, the Tau and his Prime Minister were tired of the exercise. The Chaudhary, utilising his rural wisdom, came up with a solution.

"We'll take a walk down Rajpath," said Lal, "and you can take all the ministries on the right, and I'll take the ones on left."

So, Shekhar would get defence, external affairs, industry, environment, while his deputy will have to be satisfied with finance, home, railways, agriculture, information and broadcasting, human resource development, education, and petroleum and chemicals. And both would, presumably, rest content.

All those whom Bommai betrayed

■ R.K. Hegde: Bommai began as a minister in Hegde's Cabinet in Karnataka, but soon upstaged him, by getting himself anointed chief minister. And among the first things he did on assuming office was to speed up the probe into NRIHA., with a view to nailing his predecessor.

■ Devi Lal: When Bommai was wrestling for the Janata Dal presidentship with Jaipal Reddy, the Chaudhary had put his considerable weight behind him. Lal cut short his Beijing visit to ensure that Bommai got the job. But it wasn't long before Bommai was denying that he was Devi's man and siding with V.P Singh on the Meham issue.

■ Chandra Shekhar: Not so long ago, Bommai would spend hours inside Chandra Shekhar's kutiya at 3 South Avenue Lane everytime he visited Delhi. It was on Shekhar's say-so that Om Prakash Chautala lobbied for Bommai during the election to the post of party president But no sooner had the dissident drama begun, with Shekhar in the lead, that Bommai cast his former friend as the villain of the piece.

■ Ajit Singh: Bommai joined up with him to take care of a common enemy: R.K. Hegde, vis-a-vis the telephone-tapping scandal. Soon the duo were meeting regularly over dinner and drinks in Delhi. But when it came to the crunch, Bommai failed his friend. Ajit, with a view to topple the Hukum Singh government in Haryana, coaxed a sufficient number of MLAs on his side and asked Bommai to call a legislature party meeting. Bommai refused.

■ V.P. Singh: Next on the list?

Return of the oddball

Guess who's a close second to Rajiv Gandhi on the comeback trail? None other than Congressman Sitaram Kesri.

At the lunch hosted at Maharashtra Sadan by chief minister Sharad Pawar in honour of Chandra Shekhar, Kesri was in his element. First, came a rousing speech on the virtues of that old Congressman Chandra Shekhar. Rajiv Gandhi had done just the right thing by supporting him in his bid for the prime ministership, Kesri declared.

Sitaram Kesri: back in action

Having done his bit by Shekhar, Sitaram decided to devote his considerable energies to Mulayam Singh Yadav's cause, flying off to Lucknow to persuade Congress MLAs to support the Uttar Pradesh CM's beleaguered government.

The Congress party, however, is less than pleased at this sudden re-emergence of Kesri, just when things are going right for it. The last person they want in the limelight is yet another discredited politico.

The last laugh

The exit of V.P Singh was inevitable as the country cannot have the luxury of a day-dreamer and indecisive person as Prime Minister (The desperate hours, 11—17 November). The unholy alliance that has emerged after V.P. Singh's ouster is even more alarming.

Devi Lal as deputy prime minister, Chandra Shekhar as Prime Minister and the Congress(I) holding the reins of government—all these are examples of political expediency and shows the extent to which our politicians can stoop. Rajiv will gradually edge out Chandra Shekhar and no other party will be able to come to power for another 15 to 20 years. Rajiv Gandhi will control Chandra Shekhar and ask him to hike prices of several items on the plea that V.P. Singh had caused economic chaos. Also, Shekhar on his own will not be able to solve the sensitive problems facing the country. Rajiv will then come to power by branding Chandra Shekhar as an ineffective Prime Minister.

In the scheme of things, Rajiv will have the last laugh.

U.S. Iyer, Bangalore (Karnataka)

■ Rajiv Gandhi had every reason to be happy. For, the Congress president had a score to settle. He did not forget the way the Raja stabbed him in the back. Therefore, when Advani was arrested and the BJP withdrew support, Rajiv was presented with the best possible opportunity to seek revenge. So, 11 months after he was turned out of office, Rajiv is once again back on the centre-stage and ready to call the shots. And this has been possible more due to VP's bungling than due to the machinations of Rajiv.

Aslam Khan, New Delhi

■ Ideologically, Chandra Shekhar and Rajiv Gandhi are poles apart. But in the present context, both of them had an axe to grind. They had a common enemy—the Raja. So, as the saying goes, political adversity makes for strange bedfellows, Shekhar enlisted Rajiv's support to bring about the collapse of V.P. Singh's government. For, Shekhar could never accept the leadership of the Raja, who, according to him is nothing but a manipulator and a blatant opportunist.

Joy Ganguly, Asansol (West Bengal)

■ Eleven months ago, V.P. Singh assumed the prime ministership of the country through intrigue and deception. And he left in utter disgrace. Going by the present circumstances, V.P. Singh seems to be the loser, but the people will surely remember him as the man who bowed out of office for taking a principled stand.

And, Rajiv Gandhi who is the real winner, will forever be remembered as the man who did not forgive the Raja but was quick to grab the opportunity to seek revenge by driving VP out of office. So, it was basically personal animosity which prompted Rajiv to side with Chandra Shekhar, more than anything else.

Rajiv and Shekhar: how long will the smiles last?

Necessity of controls

Dilip Thakore in his column (Boot-lick business, 21—27 October) has gone overboard discussing the pathetic state of the Indian environment for business and industry. Frankly, his article makes no sense at all. Is he having a dig on the government policy, systems and procedures?

All countries, more so the developing ones, have controls. Everywhere it is necessary to fill up certain forms and convince a lot of government officials and financial institutions about the feasibility of one's project. Surely we can't get out of the quagmire by just snapping our fingers. It is necessary to work towards a better system and here all of us need to lend a helping hand.

If there are hurdles then one must realise that it is the basic Indian character which makes most of them. Finally, let us not forget that every country gets the government it deserves.

Krishan Kalra, New Delhi

Brute force

Governor Saxena's claim of success ("There is a definite change of mood," 28 October—3 November) sounds ironical. Massacres of innocents are taking place in the Valley under the very nose of the Governor. The forces deployed are also responsible for several atrocities which have isolated them from the people they are there to protect. The killings of innocents by the security forces should be taken note of by the world and steps should be taken to stop these crimes against humanity.

Bhushan Bazaz, Srinagar (Kashmir)

Saxena: hollow claims

The ad boom

The article on advertising was brilliant (Advantage, 21—27 October). With advertisements and TV commercials becoming slicker and smarter, Indian advertising has come of age. This sudden improvement in the standards of ads is due mainly to the cut-throat competition in the market.The smarter the ad, the more attention it is likely to draw. What with the Indian middle class emerging as the single-largest consumer force in the country, TV commercials are raking it in and the only way to survive in such an atmosphere is to be the best.

Of course, this advertising boom has been to the ad industry's advantage: creative talent is being sought like never before and the admen are obliged to give their very best if they wish to survive in the rat-race.

Amit Mathur, Sindri (Bihar)

A dangerous trend

Mahesh Jethmalani in Fall from grace (4–10 November) brings into focus the many conflicts that afflict India. It is a matter of concern for every secular-minded Indian to see the rapid rise of Hindu fundamentalism in the country. The BJP has tarnished the national image. L.K. Advani claims that Ram is a national hero to be revered by all Indians. In that case, every Indian, regardless of religious beliefs, should be allowed to visit temples. Preach what you practise and practise what you believe.

Lakshman Sharma, Rourkela (Orissa)

Merit or caste?

Jaya Jaitley (In defence of Mandal, 28 October—3 November) has missed the central point of the controversy. The issue is whether positions of public importance should be occupied by people on the basis of merit or caste. The Mandal findings serve to glorify the caste system. This is ridiculous to say the least.

Ashish Dholakia, New Delhi

Rajiv Gandhi on his Sadbhavna Yatra: riding a popular wave

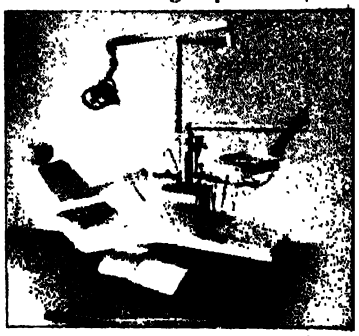
Back to the people

Rajiv Gandhi's Sadbhavna Yatra has drawn large crowds (Wave after wave, 21–27 October). Which means that the Congress president is still a popular figure. There is a noticeable shift to the Congress side, but as always, the political situation remains the same.

A. Jacob Sahayam, Thiruvananthapuram (Kerala)

Courting trouble

The special report on Ayodhya (The battle of Ayodhya, 11–17 November) brought out the inefficiency of the Centre in tackling the Ram Janmabhoomi / Babri Masjid issue. It was a wrong decision on the part of the government to settle the issue through the courts. It is doubtful that the verdict will be acceptable to both Hindus and Muslims.



The best way to solve the problem is by convincing all parties to agree to an amendment of the Constitution. The amendment would give the government full rights to demolish the mandir/masjid. Communal harmony would thus be promoted.

S. Hussain, Dibrugarh (Assam)

No imports, please

The majority of Indian dentists cannot afford to use imported dental equipment (Tooth ache?, 9–15 September). In Calcutta, which is home to the first dental college in the country, no private practitioner has imported equipment of recent vintage. The imported equipment that is generally available are over ten years old or brought back by dentists returning from abroad.

Private dental colleges can use imported equipment as the Indian government allows them duty-free imports. Neither do they pay customs duty or central sales tax. Three years ago, 110 per cent customs duty was payable on such imports and 10 per cent central sales tax was levied. The cost of the equipment comes to around Rs 1.5 lakh. One can imagine the amount of money saved as a result of the exemption. Institutions using imported equipment can also charge higher capitation fees. All imports of dental instruments by colleges and institutions are routed through three traders who are the sole selling agents of foreign manufacturers. Two of the three are dental surgeons and are members of various dental associations. As a result, they are in a position to influence government decisions.

The IDA president's claim that 5,600 sets will be needed in a span of five years is a bit of an exaggeration. Any demand created can be met by domestic producers. At present, the country's entire demand is met by local manufacturers. It is wrong to say that Indian manufacturers can meet only 50 per cent of the requirement.

Paramilitary forces guarding the Babri Masjid: a threatened bastion

The article (Cesspools, 14-20 October) highlighting the alleged harassment/corruption at Sahar Airport, Bombay, is a totally biased and unjustifiable verdict, based on vague and factually incorrect assumptions and perceptions. Upon grievances of a few passengers, a sweeping judgement has been pronounced on the entire Sahar Customs. The article laments that Hasmukh Shah had to pay duty on a VCP little realising that it does not get full exemption and he should instead have opted for the Red Channel. On Sahar's busy days a maximum of ten flights arrive in the space of two hours and not 30/40 as claimed. Only a few hundreds and not thousands of passengers arrive at a time in a module. The three X-ray machines, in both the modules at the Green Channel, do not cater to Red Channel passengers, whose baggage is checked from other machines. Perhaps, better home work and appreciation of the rules were needed while writing such an article. It totally ignores the positive achievements of the Sahar Customs during the previous six months, appreciated by the normal/average passenger - our top priority and not the elite ones. Our thrust area covers passenger facilitation and tightening of controls tempered with courtesy and firmness and accordingly the following steps have been initiated

Passenger facilitation

- The width of the Green Channel, in both the modules, has been doubled with a view to avoiding congestion and promote faster clearance of passengers availing Green Channel facility.
- Installation of three X-ray machines at the Green Channel, in both the modules, which takes hardly a minute per passenger for screening their baggage, ensuring thereby faster clearance. In rush hours, even X-ray is dispensed with at the discretion of the assistant collector on duty. Baggage is opened only on suspicion after X-raying.
- Introduction of two special NRI counters in each modules for providing all customs facilities to the NRIs under a single window concept ensuring their expeditious clearance.
- Placement of only gazetted officers in the Green Channel, thereby raising the level of supervision.
- Diversion of passengers at peak hours to other modules is resorted to for reducing the waiting time of the passengers and ensuring their expeditious clearance.
- The staff is being repeatedly advised to be extra courteous and prompt in clearing the ladies, the old and children.

Tightening of controls

- Visitors in the customs enclosure are not allowed. Normal customs facilitation is offered to all passengers. No special facilitation to anybody.

Strengthening of vigilance and anti-corruption measures at Sahar Airport

- Prompt action is being taken against all erring officers. Shifting to non-sensitive posts and even out of the airport is being done, thereby inculcating a sense of discipline/accountability amongst the staff.
- A complaint box is also placed in the arrival hall, where aggrieved passengers can drop their complaints.
- A notice board is placed before the office of the assistant collector, advising the passengers having grievances to contact him.

We have not been silent on corruption/vigilance and are taking prompt steps when facts come to our notice.

Customs' version

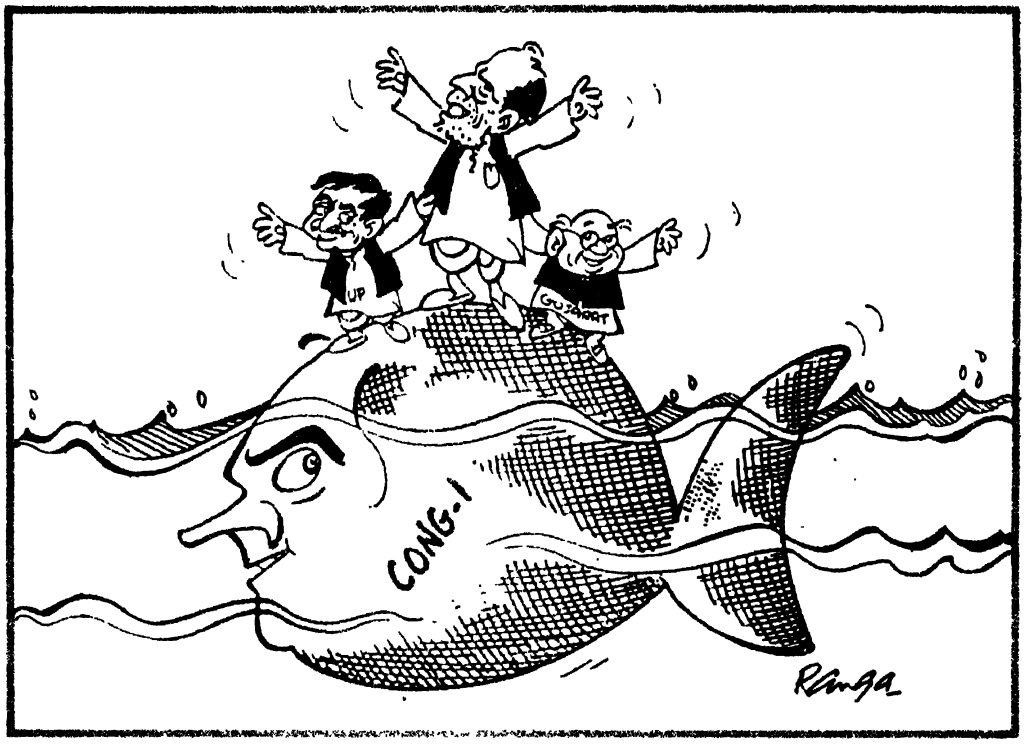
Much improved situation in the customs?

Rise in revenue and seizures

With the tightening of control and strengthening of anti-smuggling machinery, baggage revenue, during the current financial year upto September '90, touched Rs 68.50 crores against Rs 47.37 crores for the similar period in 1989, a hike of Rs 11.30 crores, i.e. 23.5 per cent despite relaxation in the baggage rules and arrival of over 1,15,000 displaced Indians from Amman who availed Green Channel facilities. Similarly seizures between April-September 1990 have touched Rs 64.03 crores against Rs 43.80 crores for the same period in 1989, a hike of Rs 20.23 crores, i.e. 46.18 per cent.

Disposal of confiscated goods

From July 1990 onwards, a special drive for disposal of confiscated goods from the airport is on and over 20,000 packages have been disposed of—a record feat.



Appreciation from the public

We are receiving several letters from the user public appreciating the good conduct of our officers. Even the press has appreciated visible improvements in our functioning. The Sahar Customs rose to the occasion and ensured fast and courteous clearance of over 1,15,000 passengers arriving from Amman. Not a single complaint against Sahar Customs was reported. Rather, they appreciated our courteous behaviour. It was not a mean achievement.

Admittedly, we are extra-harsh to the smuggling type passengers, i.e. carriers. Visit/special facility requests are denied. Accountability is enforced at all levels. A new responsive and vibrant work culture is emerging at Sahar Customs. This policy is paying rich dividends in the shape of faster passenger clearance and also sharp rise in the baggage revenue/seizures. In the process, vested interests are getting hurt and feeling disturbed.

Although, I do not intend to defend the indefensible, the article should have been fair, balanced and a true reflection of correct facts. Our officers are also human beings, with same sentiments like others. It is not fair to condemn the entire Sahar Customs, which is determined to ensure better and faster passenger facilitation. Enforcement of baggage rules is their duty and they can't be condemned for doing their duty.

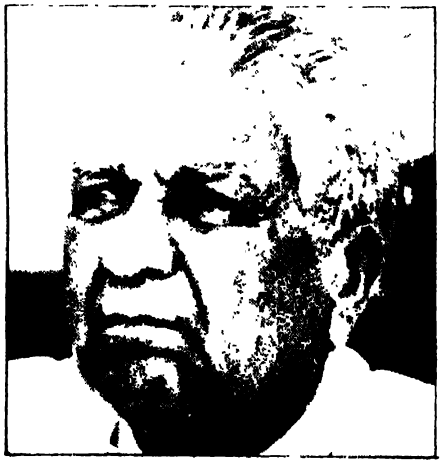
Rogue's gallery?

Shekhar's Cabinet comprises a bunch of lightweight defectors

Families when a child is born,
Want it to be intelligent
I, through intelligence,
Having wrecked my whole life,
Only hope the baby will prove
Ignorant and stupid.
Then he will crown a tranquil life
By becoming a Cabinet Minister.
--Su Tung-P'o (AD 1036-1101)



I wonder if my erudite neighbour in this magazine, who in the past few weeks has been feasting himself on self-congratulation, is familiar with these lines from an obscure Chinese poet reflecting on the birth of his son? Knowing Mani Shankar Aiyar's mental amplitude, the possibility cannot be ruled out. Six weeks ago, I suspect, he would have enthusiastically endorsed the sentiments of the Chinese poet, but today? It would be presumptuous on my part to speculate on the subject of M.S. Aiyar's column in the current issue, but I doubt very much if his fine mind and eloquent pen have been exercised to note the calibre and character of the Chandra Shekhar Cabinet.

Leaderwriters, while reminding us of the Prime Minister's "compulsions", have generally concluded that it is "lacklustre". That surely is the understatement of the year; Rogue's Gallery would be a better description. After all, the most senior and experienced member of the Cabinet is none other than the Emergency-fame V.C. Shukla, who, in the past five years and more, when not switching parties, has been busy playing havoc with Indian sport. Then we have the Prime Minister's prize catch, communication minister Dr Sanjay Singh, a man against whom a murder charge is pending, and who was so overcome by the unexpected elevation in rank that he lost the ability for coherent speech in front of television cameras. The inclusion of Maneka Gandhi who gets independent charge and whose sole contribution to the conduct of public affairs has been bad manners and a foul tongue, means that our front pages will never be dull or deprived of libel writs. In such a Cabinet it is entirely appropriate that Dr Subramanium Swamy should get law and justice and Devi Lal, tourism. Mr Chandra Shekhar, unlike his predecessor, is not a poet (unless the promptings of the muse are tucked away under his pillow) but no one can accuse him of not having a sense of the sardonic.

Congress media luminaries—and their number is legion—will jump up and say: what options did a Prime Minister with a 50 strong (the definitive figure is a matter of furious debate) team have? He had to choose from the talent available to him. Accordingly, this is the first occasion since 1952 that a Prime Minister is carrying three portfolios—home, defence, information and broadcasting—that invariably require independent charge.

Point taken, but with one caveat. Despite Mr Chandra Shekhar's formidable and well-tested manipulative skills, he has not been able to entice away even one senior Janata Dal central minister with the lure of office. (Considerable time and energy was spent in wooing I.K. Gujral and Ajit Singh, without success.) Therefore, this is not quite a Cabinet of defectors, as a Cabinet of lightweight defectors who either held no office in the previous dispensation or were minor players in the V.P. Singh formation.

Thus, it is our dubious privilege to be governed not by a minority but a minuscule government made up of nonentities. Mani Shankar Aiyar and his "I told you so" friends, who with rare prescience predicted the early demise of the V.P. Singh-led National Front because it was being pulled in opposite directions by two allies preferring to stay outside, are deafeningly silent about the durability of a government that has 10 per cent membership in the Lok Sabha. Readers will note that I have not invoked moral or legal electoral legitimacy as worthwhile

Tourism minister Devi Lal is going to remain permanently estranged. He has so many sons and followers that to accommodate all would be impossible

The most senior and experienced member of the Cabinet is V.C. Shukla, who when not switching parties has been playing havoc with Indian sport concerns because these days we are all "grown men", especially Mani Shankar Aiyar who could conceivably fill one whole issue of SUNDAY—with a few French bon mots and Hindi lyrics thrown in—having fun with such trifling issues. Yet, 11 months ago, V.P Singh had to bear the full brunt of lofty Congress indignation about a government conceived in sin and delivered in treachery. If the BJP and communist support for the departing dispensation was 'immoral', how about Congress assistance for Janata Dal (S) or, more properly, Janata Dal (R)—R standing for Rajiv?

One possible justification could be the need-of-the-hour thesis. Since the received wisdom precluded general elections, the Congress patriotically responded to the President's call as it shared Mr Venkataraman's resolve to avoid an immediate poll. It is a good alibi, but fatally flawed. If Rajiv Gandhi and his party were so agitated about the state of the nation, they should have joined hands with Chandra Shekhar and become partners in a coalition. We would then have got a stable grouping from which an acceptable and experienced team of ministers could have emerged. Instead, what the Congress has gifted the nation for purely selfish and short-term considerations is a government with neither the will nor the capacity to govern at a time when by common consensus, the country is on the precipice of anarchy.

Unfortunately, the best laid plans of mice and men can go awry. In the original scenario, Rajiv was going to decide the date of the next general election. Six, nine, 12 or 18 months relief depended on the Congress President's mood and perception of party preparedness to do battle. Alas, the 'internal contradictions' (where have we heard the phrase before?) in the Janata Dal (S) are likely to upset Rajiv's time-table.

The internal contradicter, of course, is none other than our champion from Haryana Mr Chandra Shekhar may be the Prime Minister for the record, but real power lies in the hands of Devi Lal who believes with ferocious conviction that he single-handedly made the MP from Ballia Prime Minister, just as he fashioned the brief glory of the MP from Fatehpur. Or, at least, that is the way the Tau perceived it to be before the Cabinet was announced. Now that it has, all hell has broken loose. With only four berths for Devi Lal's men, out of which there has already been one resignation, Chandra Shekhar has made himself a new and reckless enemy.

It is not clear what and how much the deputy PM expected. Clearly what has hurt him is numbers, and also the manner in which he was excluded from the selection process. Understandably, the Tau feels both betrayed and insulted, slights which his followers emphasise have been delivered so early in the recently forged relationship. These followers will doubtless encourage Devi Lal to seek full and proper revenge regardless of the goodies dished out in the promised second expansion. There has also been a neat reversal of roles in the status of the feuding sons. Chautala is currently ensconced with the Prime Minister, while Ranjit Singh has emerged as key advisor to his father and principal strategist in the forthcoming Chandra Shekhar-Devi Lal war.

Another disgruntled chieftan is marking time in Lucknow. If there is one man Shekhar is petrified of, it is Mulayam Singh Yadav. The day before the Cabinet was announced, the PM was closeted in Gujarat Bhavan with Chimanbhai, Chautala and Yashwant Sinha, awaiting the arrival of Yadav. He failed to show up at the appointed hour. Trunk and lightning calls ensued, but they were of no avail as the CM was absconding. Absolute panic prevailed over the next two hours. Had he gone over to the other camp? Was he up to some trick? Mulayam Singh Yadav turned up eventually apologising for the delay due to aircraft problems. However, the consternation his delay caused reflects how critical the UP chief minister is to Chandra Shekhar's continued survival.

Between the two dangermen, Devi Lal and Mulayam Singh Yadav, it is the Tau who is likely to turn on the Prime Minister first. He has so many close aides, so many sons, so many followers that to accomodate them all would be impossible. He is, therefore, going to remain permanently estranged. When and how he publicly unfurls the banner of revolt is difficult to forecast, but it won't take long for the bickering to reach Rashtrapati Bhawan.

Since these days no politician, media pundit or taxi driver travels without his very own crystal ball and his own calendar circling the longevity of the present regime, here is mine. Devi Lal will resign before the end of the year, the Janata Dal (S) will split soon after, and Mr Chandra Shekhar will lose his majority by February or March 1991. Remember: You read it here first! ●

Former Prime Minister V.P. Singh on the Chandra Shekhar government, the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid issue, the BJP and more

V.P. Singh is back at 1 Teen Murti Marg, the residence he occupied when he was defence minister under Rajiv Gandhi. This is also the house from where he launched the Jan Morcha and his fight against the Congress. He still holds evening darshans but the crowds have thinned perceptibly. "I will talk frankly about my policies, but you'll get little from me about the behind-the-scene moves," the Raja cautioned before he began this interview. Indeed it was difficult to get V.P. Singh talking on who were responsible for the downfall of the National Front government. Excerpts:

SUNDAY: Which of the two was a greater hindrance to the smooth functioning of your government—Devi Lal or the Bharatiya Janata Party(BJP).

V.P. Singh: It will not be fair for me to comment on a particular party or on someone who has worked closely with me.

Q: What was your experience with the BJP and the Congress(I), both of which contributed to the downfall of your government?

A: There are much larger issues before the country. That is where we are addressing ourselves. There are, of course, the issues of Kashmir, Punjab, Assam and Ram Janmabhoomi and also the changes that are happening in the world. If we do not respond to the fast-changing economic and political environment, India will suffer. Therefore, we need to think about these issues and rise above partisan matters. So, instead of playing games we should help the country to pull out of these problems. It is not so much this party or that party but the love of the country which should come first.

So, when the Prime Minister came to see me after the swearing-in, I told him that he will always have my cooperation and I will not be playing any games.

If you look at the newspapers you will see we are getting lost in smaller matters and this makes me very sad. There are also other challenges: like, what will be the shape of the Indian state? That is a very basic question that has cropped up. So, in all this casualness, the main issues get left behind.

Then, will religion be above the state? Should religion and politics be mixed? Should religious polarisation be allowed? The country's emotional and cultural unity is at stake today. The third important issue is that of equity. There are economic and social disparities and they have persisted despite 43 years of Independence. I am not taking any dogmatic stance but what is more important is to recognise and to put on the national agenda that there is an inequitous social and economic situation. Almost half a century has passed and we have not made any effort to solve this problem. If we do not address ourselves to it then we will be inviting a greater danger to the unity and integrity of the country and it will express itself in a more violent form than ever before.

I have always tried to address myself to these problems and as a family, everybody should have a share and the elder brother always makes sacrifices for the younger brother.

Q Why do you think you lost the support of the people? On the day you lost the confidence motion, crackers were burst...

A This does not bother me. I know what I was doing was right. I was prepared to make sacrifices...

break the Congress"

Q: Was it a happy relationship with the BJP?
A: I think you cannot take the BJP alone because it came along the way. You have to go back to what was the thinking behind the formation of the National Front. I had clearly stated that since Independence, the Congress party was the largest political organisation. Maybe, after Independence a developing country needed stability in the form of the Congress and it was after all, a product of the freedom movement.

But over the years, it became necessary for other political alternatives to emerge so that people would have some choice. People did not want a bonded democracy. You might remember that three years ago in December 1987, I had said that there was a need for a second centrist party. But if there is no other option available then people will stick to the Congress even if they do not want to.

And forming this second political option was more important than the formation or a change of government. In December, therefore, I had spelt out the need for the centrist parties to merge together and form an alliance with regional parties. That was the federative character of the National Front which also allowed the regional parties to play a useful role at the national level.

Then, to dislodge the Congress there was need of seat adjustments. Not alliance. I never said we will enter into an alliance with the BJP and you might recall I have never appeared on their platforms during the election campaign. So it was the right course.

If you remember that after the election I had said there will come a period of disequilibrium and there will be a recrystallisation of forces. What had happened was that the Congress had cracked My very sentence after the elections was: a few governments might be put in the melting pot and the country should have the courage because the central government is not the country.

This process of recrystallisation has come about now and I think it is not a one-time act. It will continue for some time and maybe it will take two years or more for a stable equilibrium to emerge. But we should not lose heart as a nation because something good for democracy is happening. The so-called stability of the Congress had become a dead and counter productive stability. The five years of a stable Congress government was a disappointment for the people.

Q: On the day you lost majority in Parliament, you gave a call for the formation of a national government but clearly branded the BJP as a communal party. Weren't their intentions clear to you from the very beginning?
A: We had questioned the BJP at the time of the formulation of the National Front manifesto itself. Much before the seat adjustments. We had asked them: 'What would be your position on Ram Janmabhoomi?' They said it is not an election issue for us. We lend moral support but we are not involved in the movement of the VHP. And they maintained that position during the elections and thereafter. The BJP did not raise the Ram Janmabhoomi issue during their poll campaign.

At no stage had the BJP told us that this (the Ram Janmabhoomi) was their own movement or that support to the government was dependent on this issue or even that this was above the court. All this was a sudden development, a radical shift from the stand taken by the BJP in the past. This led to a parting of ways.

Q: Did you misunderstand the intentions of the BJP? Did you feel cheated by them?
A: I never use derogatory words but I feel that there was a major shift of stance by the BJP. We had made ourselves clear that while the BJP may give us support from outside we will not deviate from our position. That this matter (Ram Janmabhoomi) could be sorted out either through an amicable settlement or through the court.

The posers before us were whether religion was above the state? Will we concede that we were laying the foundations of a theocratic state? Can we give legitimacy to religious polarisation? If that was true than how do we hold people together who belong to so many religions?

The rath yatra was embarked upon obviously with elections in mind and now Advaniji has practically said it was a political campaign. So there were much bigger issues than merely mandir and masjid. The foundation of the whole state of India was in question and therefore we took a conscious decision that between this choice and maintaining the government, we will stick to the broader principles. I had said so many times that if it came to upholding a democratic norm and a government we will always uphold democracy and we had to prove ourselves when faced with such a situation. And by this sacrifice I think we have earned something for the country. Today you can go anywhere and see that India has credibility only because we are a secular nation.

Q: The question that many people are asking is: why did you allow the BJP's rath yatra in the first place?
A: They never said earlier that they were getting involved in it. The rath yatra was a sudden decision and there was no prior information about it.

You will remember that at that time I had called a meeting of religious leaders and another of the National Integration Council (NIC). In fact, at that time there was pressure from the NIC so that the BJP attends the all-party meeting. Everyone wants to be wiser afterwards but you see the trend that was developing. That the BJP did not attend the NIC was recorded by all the parties who may be pointing fingers at us today. So, while there were efforts going on for taking out the rath yatra, at the same time there were efforts to involve the BJP and to try and find a solution. And there were well-meaning people from both sides.

Q: Later, there were allegations about some double-dealing on the issue. What really happened?
A: The point was that all along there was hope of a solution. We felt that the various people involved in the negotiations would succeed in persuading the BJP hardliners. A lot of time was spent on finding a solution; otherwise the matter would have blown up right at the beginning. When you find that the country is on the verge of a bloodbath, isn't it sagacious to find a solution?

People are forgetting dates today. People are choosy about facts. All these efforts were going on simultaneously and we hoped that the final talks would take place in Delhi. But finally, the hardliners took over and they never gave up the position that this issue was beyond the courts and that they would build the temple in the disputed area.

Q: Is it that once the BJP started the campaign, it could not give it up midway?
A: Whatever be their compulsions, it was a position which we could not reconcile to. And then, the rath yatra was passing through BJP-ruled states— Madhya Pradesh and Rajasthan, except for a brief run in Gujarat. Finally we said Advani would be coming to Delhi and let us have a 'yes' or 'no' from him because it should not be said later that we did not make any effort.

Q Will the Mandal recommendations be implemented now that you are no longer in power?

A All state governments will have to accept these recommendations. Already, Maharashtra and UP have done it. The others will have to do it too

Q Why did you allow L.K. Advani's rath yatra? You could have stopped it at the beginning

A We were not even aware of the BJP's programme. Moreover, we were always hopeful that we would be able to persuade Advani to call it off during his break in Delhi. But unfortunately, the BJP hardliners took over

Q: What was the package you offered to the BJP?
A: Basically, I said you can start work in the undisputed area but I am not agreeable to any activity within the disputed place. And I said I will have a special bench which will do no other work but this. After all, the temple cannot be built overnight but will take at least 5-6 years and if the bench declares the structure a mosque then it is over. And if it is declared the Ram Janmabhoomi then you could take it but you wait for the court judgement. But we could not concede to anything like breaking the mosque or violating the court injunction. But they were not agreeable to all this.

Q: At what stage did you tell L.K. Advani that you were prepared to go along with him for the kar seva? This is what he had said in Parliament...
A: I said the same thing in the House also and I will say it again: that if they accept the court judgement and don't go into the disputed area there was no problem. It is in that context I had said it. And no Muslim has come even today to say that they are against the temple in Ayodhya.

Q: Were there pressures from within the Cabinet not to arrest Advani because with the decision, the fall of the government was imminent?

A: You have to take a decision based on a principle. After all, for me this was nothing new. In the past I had resigned as chief minister of UP and there was no question of feeling then. I was also shifted from the finance ministry and when I decided to resign as defence minister there was no sentimentality about it. The issues at stake this time were clearly bigger than the country we were running.

Q: You say the BJP's was actually a political yatra meant to gain political mileage. Have they achieved that?
A: One person came to meet me from Hardwar. He said he was a devout Hindu, he bathes in the Ganges every day but how can he accept all this from the BJP? They were, he said, in power in 1979 and before that and have run state governments also. At that time they conveniently forgot history, that Babar had come and demolished the temple. When they are out of power, when it suits them, they start raising the issue.

Q: So, do you think the BJP will be isolated in the next general elections? Or will they, as they claim, be able to increase their strength in Parliament?
A: I have faith in the people of India. Their emotions can be aroused on certain issues but when it finally comes to voting they have a lot of common sense.

I don't think the BJP can increase its strength because in many states like Himachal, Delhi and Madhya Pradesh there is no possibility of the party increasing its seats. The BJP can be a loser in the battle.

Q: In north India, will the fight really be between the BJP and the Janata Dal? The Janata Dal seems to have won over the Muslims and the backward classes...
A: It can also be between the Janata Dal and the Congress because what the BJP does not realise is that many of the issues they are counting on may not get them votes. In Bihar, 15 of the BJP MLAs walked out. This is virtually a split in the party in Bihar. You see the issues that we have raised will also force a recrystallisation in the BJP as well as in the Congress. If not among the known leaders, at least at the base level. At the base level there will be a realignment of forces though maybe not of the kind that the press is speculating about.

Q: After the BJP withdrew support, did some of your ministers, including Arun Nehru and Arif Mohammad Khan, demand that you should step down immediately and not wait for the confidence vote in Parliament?
A: Except for one or two, a majority of them wanted the issue to be taken before Parliament.

Q: Who are these one or two members?
A: I should not name them. Only one member of the Cabinet did not want to wait till Parliament was convened. Also, Bommai had held a meeting of senior leaders. Everyone felt that I should not put in my resignation.

It was never a question of prolonging the life of the government. If that was the case, then we could always have made a compromise with the BJP. It was a question of projecting the issue and so the political line taken by the party was that we have to project the issue, not prolong the government.

Even before going to the President, I asked whether I should put in my papers immediately. I was given clear instructions not to do so. The President also said the test of majority should be on the floor of the House. This was also the line of the left parties and the National Front and I carried out their directive. In fact, even in between, I gave a letter to Bommai saying that he may do what he wanted to

Q: Your idea was to start a national debate on the Ram Janmabhoomi issue. Have you succeeded in doing that?
A: Yes, I think so. It has got a place in people's mind.

Q: Even when your government was formed, there were complaints from among a section of the Janata Dal that you had unfairly edged out Chandra Shekhar. Do you think he was plotting to overthrow you from then on?
A: Till recently he was in my party and it does not behove me to make personal remarks.

Q: Was there, according to you, any real evidence about the role of moneybags in sponsoring Chandra Shekhar as Prime Minister?
A: What better evidence can you get than from their own camp—that is from Bhagey Govardhan. He had said that he was offered Rs 50 lakhs and a berth in the ministry and yet he did not go. Of course, later he moved over.

I have been trying to break the nexus between businessmen and politicians but unfortunately, I think we are going to see evidence of it more and more now. Though money has been contributed for election campaigns earlier, I don't remember it being used to bribe MPs to oust a Prime Minister.

Q: What about the role of the Reliance Industries?

A: I see this as a great danger to Indian democracy and I fear it will grow. I will not take names but broadly speaking, there will be more and more interference from big business houses in politics now. First, they used to be interested only in their own licences and quotas; then they started exerting influence over politicians; now they have even started meddling in the formation of the government itself.

I have always said that the crown of Delhi is not in Delhi but in the treasure chests in Bombay and Calcutta. You see when there are big investments—thousands and thousands of crores—even a small variation of a rule can affect an industrialist by hundreds of crores. When the stakes are so high they have a compulsion to see that a government is favourable to them.

Q: What in your opinion are the drawbacks of the present government?

A: The major drawback is, of course, its dependency on the Congress and the relationship is so skewed that on one side is the government which barely has the strength of quorum while on the other side the support is four times larger. Politically it is an incongruous situation. Chandra Shekhar will certainly have to take the concurrence of the Congress on all major political and policy decisions.

Q: How will this be different from your government? After all, you too took the support of the BJP...

A: But we were the largest party. The relationship was entirely different because we had 144 seats. If you add the left we were about 200. And they were below 100. So it was a natural alliance while this one is an unnatural, odd one. Had the Congress formed the government and they were supporting it, they would have the mandate, the endorsement of the people.

The present government is being run by a splinter group of the Janata Dal which calls itself the Janata Dal (S). It did not exist and does not have the support or the mandate of the people. And if for any reason they had parted company with us, it would have been better if they had supported the Congress.

Q: Why didn't Rajiv Gandhi agree to form a government?

A: I said this in the House also—that what has happened is not fair to the country. I think either the Congress(I) does not have the guts to take responsibility or they want to enjoy power without accountability which is not fair to the country. And it is setting a dangerous precedent. On all accounts it does not enhance the image of the party.

Q: So, what according to you is the gameplan of the Congress?

A: Their plan is very simple and can be stated in one sentence. a successful Chandra Shekhar means oblivion for Rajiv Gandhi. The Congress will do everything to discredit Chandra Shekhar.

Q: Does Chandra Shekhar have the ability to break the Congress?

A: Yes, Chandra Shekhar can break the Congress. If this government succeedes, then certainly it is not in the interest of Rajiv Gandhi. It will hurt him more. As far as Chandra Shekhar is concerned, nobody wants to be unsuccessful and unhappy and he will try his best to succeed. At the same time he knows any signs of success will be an invitation for the Congress to pull the rug away. So he will try and hedge himself and also try to create another power centre in the Congress and try to split the party.

Or alternatively, if he had reconciled himself totally to the Congress, then he can join the Congress. But already there are rumblings of discontent within the Janata Dal (S). I am told that on the day of the swearing-in some dissident MPs in the Chandra Shekhar camp met at Chand Ram's place. So it has all begun.

Q:What is the likely scenario in the next few months? What will the government do if the Congress(I) calls for elections within six months?

A: Actually, all this is speculation. But the basic thing is that up to a certain level they have the same interests. But after a point they have contradictory interests. The longevity of the government depends upon the will of Rajiv Gandhi who is the real owner of this government.

Q: Why do you think Chandra Shekhar delayed forming the Cabinet?

A: There were internal problems. For 11 days the Prime Minister was unable to form his team and he even went to Parliament without a Cabinet. This is only due to internal contradictions and problems.

Q: Did your government make any progress on the Bofors investigations in the past 11 months? Why haven't the papers been laid before Parliament?

A: Our stand has been consistent; that we will pursue the investigations and the law will run its course. We had a big success because on the same papers which Rajiv Gandhi had we could freeze the accounts. That exposes the fact that the previous government de-

Q What is the likely scenario in the next few months? How long will this government last?

A If this government succeeds, it will be against the interests of Rajiv Gandhi... The life of the government depends upon the will of Rajiv Gandhi. He is the real owner of the government liberately did not perform its duty on this case and the reasons for this are best known to them

Also we succeeded in the federal court regarding AE Services and orders are there in handing over the papers I am told (I don't know the exact details) even in the Marcos case the government was able to achieve such success

Q: Is it just that laundering money has become so legitimate that the Bofors investigations have not been clinched?
A: No, no The papers will be handed over to the CBI In such transactions the money is handed over to a chain of people There are several transfers to bury the money deep From there the lead will have to be investigated further In AE Services, I am told the persons behind the operation have not come forward before the court They want to conceal their identities while in the other companies which were in the Geneva court the person behind the accounts have sent their attorneys and are willing to come forward But the AE Services seems to be a very sensitive account and it was opened perhaps, a few weeks after Olof Palme met Rajiv Gandhi

Then the contract of AE Services with Bofors was that it would be signed before 30 March, 1986 So the theory about the winding-up charges and all that have been totally disproven with this The point was that we did not go very high-profile in publicising the Bofors investigations and that is why people got the impression that we did not do much Had we been high-profile, the defence would have taken this as political vendetta and so we allowed the law to run its own course

We also managed to extract the secret part of the Audit Bureau report of Sweden Why did the previous government not get it? Why didn't they blacklist Bofors?

Q: Now that the Congress(I) is running the government by proxy, do you think the Bofors investigations will go under the wraps again?
A: I think all the papers should be put in safe custody But the thing is that many people have given evidence in confidence during the investigations and if you make them public and expose them you are drying up your sources and the Swedish government will stop giving us information

Unless you achieve a certain amount of success your enemy can take counter measures Instead it can help the adversaries much more This is a sure way of killing the investigations

Q: To sum up, why do you think you lost the support of the people of India, who gave you such overwhelming support only a year ago? You must have heard about the sticker campaign against you and the bursting of crackers etc. on the night you lost the vote of confidence in Parliament?
A: This did not bother me because I knew what I was doing was right I knew when I was the finance minister that everybody was not going to be happy with my actions I knew I was annoying one section I knew I challenged the economic status When I was in the defence ministry and I ordered the enquiry into the HDW deal, I knew some people in government were going to be terribly angry with me It was a challenge for me and them Similarly, when I took positive actions on behalf of the weaker sections and the deprived I was clear I will be subjected to some sacrifices for the younger brother and if the inequities are not removed then they will express themselves in more violent forms

Q Did your government make any progress on the Bofors front?

A We had a big success. Because, with the same papers which Rajiv Gandhi had, we could freeze the accounts

Q: Has the issue of the Mandal report come to stay? How will this and successive governments grapple with the issue of reservations?
A: I tell you whatever may be said against me all state governments will have to accept these recommendations Already, Maharashtra and UP have done it The others will have to do it also So however cursed I may be the path that has now been opened will be accepted by most (state governments) And if I had not shown the path some day it would have been because the inequities are embedded deep in our system The inequitous power structure supports the inequitous social structure and vice versa To have an equitous social structure you have to have an equitous power structure

Q: Several times in the past you had said that you will not accept any office, but you rose to become the Prime Minister of the country. Will you accept this high office again?
A: I will not speculate on that At that time the consensus in our party and the two supporting parties was that we should assume office The other option was to allow the Congress to form the government which we had campaigned against

Q: What if such a situation arises again?
A: Why should I talk about that now? Let us wait and see what happens •

TRIBES AND DIATRIBES

The infiltration of Bangladeshi nationals worries the natives of Tripura

In Tripura, the 839-km long international border with Bangladesh exists only in theory. Hundreds of people from both sides cross over every day and there are few official agencies to stop this traffic. The emigration from Bangladesh over the decades had caused serious ethnic strife in the past, culminating in the violence let loose by the Tripura National Volunteers (TNV), a militant tribal outfit determined to drive out non-tribal settlers from Tripura. After the TNV laid down arms in 1988, following an understanding with the Centre, the interest of the tribals took a backseat in the state's politics for some time. But now the tribals are beginning to assert themselves once again.

There are fresh rumblings of discontent among them over the continuous flow of Bangladeshis into the state. The tribals today constitute barely 28.44 per cent of the state's population, which swelled from about 5,13,000 in 1941 to around 20,53,000 in 1981. At the time of Independence, the tribals comprised a little less than 50 per cent of the population. But since then they have consistently lost out in the numbers game.

The events in Ayodhya and the rest of northern India, have in a way made the Tripura tribals more apprehensive. The attempted kar seva in Ayodhya on 30 October and its backlash in Bangladesh, where temples were attacked, only made the fear of an exodus of Bengali Hindus real. In the first few days of violence in Dhaka, Chittagong and other towns across the border, a few Bangladeshi families did seek shelter in Tripura and the feeling was that a new diaspora had begun. Fortunately, however, the inflow petered off with the return of normalcy in Bangladesh and, according to the police, 12 out of the 35 families who had crossed over have already returned home. The others have stayed on with their relatives.

Though a crisis of sorts was averted, the fear persisted. And the tribals have renewed their campaign against the infiltration that takes place on a slow but steady pace everyday. If the state and the central governments fail to take preventive steps within the next few months, ethnic relations in this border state might be irreparably damaged, feel prominent tribal leaders.

The official figures of immigration from Bangladesh do not give a clear picture of the enormity of the problem. According to the police, the number of Bangladeshis driven back in 1987, 1988 and 1989 were 7,846, 3,542 and 3,843 respectively. And the number of Muslims crossing over was significantly higher than those of Hindus.

But both police and Border Security Force (BSF) sources admit that this may be a middling few who are detected and, moreover, there is no guarantee that they have not re-infiltrated. "The problem is that there are no natural impediments to act as barriers," explains the state's director general of police, R.P. Sharma. Says a BSF officer: "They look the same, they speak the same language and it is almost impossible for BSF jawans, who come from outside the state, to differentiate between Indians and Bangladeshis."

A BSF jawan in a border village near Agartala: baffled, is he?

Today, the question of infiltration and the resultant uneasiness among the tribals have suddenly become a major political issue in Tripura and most political parties and ethnic formations are busy shaping their strategies to gain mileage out of it.

And if the problem snowballs—which in all likelihood it will—the ruling Congress(I)-TUJS (Tripura Upajati Juba Samity) will be at the receiving end. The coalition, which is already facing problems on several fronts and is tainted by charges of abusing power, hinges on a slender majority. The alliance has 34 seats in the 60-member state Assembly, of which the Congress(I) accounts for 26 and the TUJS, a party committed to championing tribal interests, 8. And since the state government is doing precious little to stop infiltrations, the TUJS is certainly on a sticky wicket.

And the one party which is making capital out of the TUJS discomfiture is the CPI(M), which has been virtually on the run since the Congress(I) staged an electoral coup in 1988 and unleashed a fierce onslaught against the Marxists. For nearly two years, the CPI(M) was down and almost out. But towards the middle of last month the party decided to play the tribal card and spring back into the reckoning.

On 20 November, former chief minister and CPI(M) central committee member Nripen Chakraborty wrote to Governor K.V. Raghunath Reddy demanding the introduction of the inner-line permit, which restricts the entry of non-tribals into notified areas. Chakraborty feels that by this move he will be able to shake the foundation of the ruling coalition by destabilising the TUJS, which is growing increasingly disillusioned about the government's inability to improve the lot of the tribals.

Chakraborty's detractors are, however, criticising the former chief minister for staging a volte-face. When in power, the CPI(M)-led Left Front had vehemently opposed the TUJS demands for restrictive measures in the tribal areas, saying that they smacked of secessionism. Now, the reversal of roles have led to switching of demands, and for expedient reasons largely.

The CPI(M)'s demand for the introduction of the inner-line permit and the growing disaffection among a section of the tribal population has placed the TUJS in a delicate situation. The Tribal Students Federation (TSF), which has about 50,000 members and is emerging as an opinion-moulder in tribal society, has already criticised the Congress-TUJS alliance for having failed on "all fronts" and has accused the government of being indifferent towards the threat posed by the influx of Bangladeshi nationals.

In the very first issue of The Tripura Students' Voice, the TSF mouthpiece that began publication from 1 November, the student body said: "It is a pity that the TUJS, which was at the forefront of the militant anti-foreigner agitation in the early Eighties in the state, did not issue any strongly-worded statement against infiltration. As a result, the illegal foreign nationals feel encouraged. It is strongly felt that if the state administration does not go ahead with necessary steps to prevent continued influx, the state of Tripura will be heading for another outbreak of ethnic violence sooner or later..."

TSF vice-president M.L. Koloi and the federation's finance secretary S.C. Jamatia told SUNDAY that the maximum infiltration was taking place at Kailasaha, Khowai, Sonamura and Belonia and accused the government of encouraging the inflow. "Corrupt ruling party leaders and MLAs are giving false certificates to the foreigners and passing them off as Indian citizens," said Koloi. The TSF is not yet certain about what measures were necessary to check the infiltration, but Koloi said that a central team must come down to assess the problem and take appropriate action. The students are so suspicious of the ruling coalition that they are even opposed to the idea of involving state government officials in any census work. The TSF fears that the real population figures would not emerge in that case.

The TNV supremo, Bijoy Kumar Hrankhawl, is a settled man today, holding a cosy job as the chairman of the Tripura Rehabilitation Plantation Corporation. For almost a decade, Hrankhawl was the most dreaded man in the state. He led a band of about 80 trained guerrillas who professedly fought for a 'free' Tripura and struck with deadly precision from their jungle hideouts. Apparently, in the end, the TNV entered into a secret understanding with the Congress(I) well before the Assembly elections in 1988 and stepped up its murderous raids on the eve of the polls. The TNV virtually turned Tripura into a slaughterhouse, shook the people's confidence in the Left Front government and helped the Congress(I)-TUJS alliance come to power. A few months later, Hrankhawl signed an accord with the Rajiv Gandhi government at the Centre, bade farewell to arms and decided to back the coalition in the state on being promised that he and his associates would be rehabilitated.

But today Hrankhawl is not happy with the government he chose to support. "No action has been taken to correct the demographic imbalance and a deep-rooted misunderstanding may crop up again," fears the former militant. Both Hrankhawl and the TSF leaders point to the plight of 55,000 Chakma refugees who have fled the troubled Chittagong Hill Tracts and are housed in refugee camps near the India-Bangladesh border in South Tripura. "We the tribals have never demanded their resettlement in India, but the government has gone about freely settling the non-tribals from Bangladesh," laments Hrankhawl. In the 40 years since Independence, he says, never has the government—even for once—been firm on solving the problem. And the regime of chief minister Sudhir Ranjan Mazumdar has so far given no indication to suggest that it will act differently.

The state's deputy chief minister and senior TUJS leader Nagendra Jamatiya is also a worried man, but is reluctant to commit himself on the measures that he would like the government to take. The demands for inner-line permits are not without basis, he concedes, but chooses to take a broader view of the problem. "We need a national plan," he says, and emphasises that it is the economic backwardness of Bangladesh that is causing the migrations. The TUJS had ridden to power by promising the tribals a better deal, but the 31 months of the coalition has not improved matters. And Jamatiya, with the enormous task of settling 20,000 families of shifting cultivators on his hand, is in an unenviable position. "We have about one lakh landless tribals and about a lakh unemployed tribal youths, but we have no land and employment potentials are saturated," he admits.

Jamatiya: worried, but helpless

Hrankhawl: dreams die fast

What is significant is that while Jamatiya confesses that there is little land left where shifting cultivators can be settled—about 60 per cent of the land in the state falls under reserve forests and proposed reserve forests—Sriram Debbarma, a former general-secretary of the TSF and presently an executive member of the Autonomous District Council (ADC), says that tribals continue to suffer land-alienation even in the ADC areas where non-tribals are not entitled to acquire plots.

The TUJS is obviously caught in a dilemma between its allegiance to the tribal cause and having to share power with the Congress(I), which feels it can solve the infiltration and land-alienation problems by issuing identity cards to the people of the state. Radhika Ranjan Gupta, former chief minister and the present Pradesh Congress(I) Committee president, feels that the inner-line demand being raised by the CPI(M) is politically motivated and will create more problems than it would solve. "We often have to pass through more than one ADC area when going from one non-tribal area to another. The inner-line system would make movement impossible," he explains.

But Nripen Chakraborty views it differently. "Identity cards alone will not protect the ADC from encroachment by non-tribals. Actually, the Congress(I) is determined to change the very composition of the tribal compacts by letting the non-tribals settle there. At this rate, some of the present tribal areas will change their character altogether," says Chakraborty.

Politics in Tripura had always been sharply polarised between the CPI(M) and the Congress(I) with the former firmly entrenched among the tribals and the Bengalis going with the Congress(I). It is only recently that the purely tribal outfits like the TUJS, TNV and the TSF, preaching a pan-tribal philosophy, have emerged as important players in the state's politics. It is in the interest of both the Congress(I) and the CPI(M) to woo these forces, and they too are becoming increasingly aware of their ability to tilt the electoral balance. By highlighting the problem of infiltration and demanding the introduction of the inner-line permit, the CPI(M) has for the time being touched the right chord and may put the Congress(I) in trouble, depending on whether it manages to win over the tribals outside its fold.

The only deterrent that can nullify the CPI(M)'s efforts to forge an alliance with the smaller tribal parties is their rabid anti-communism. As long as they spurn the CPI(M)'s overtures, the Congress(I) will have little cause for worry. But there is no guarantee that the pawns will sacrifice themselves for the sake of the king. "We are not aligned to any political party, but would support any organisation that supports the TSF's demands," disclosed federation vice-president Koloi. And added: "If a resolution is passed, we may even join hands with the CPI(M)."

That certainly isn't good news for the Congress(I). •

Pride and prejudices

Where there is pride of birth there are seeds of prejudice against those born of different racial or religious parentage. If you subscribe to the slogan Gaurav say kaho hum Hindu hain—say with pride I am a Hindu—you undoubtedly also feel that those who are not Hindus have less to be proud of than you. The same applies to a Muslim saying "I am proud of being a Muslim", or a Sikh boasting of his Khalsa heritage. The fact that one's religion is almost entirely the one into which one was born and therefore an accident of birth should make us ponder whether or not such pride is misplaced and what its consequences are in a multi-racial, multi-religious society.

Prejudice of any kind racial, religious or linguistic does not become an educated person with pretension of being civilised. Nevertheless, it exists in most so-called civilised and advanced nations of the world. The classic example is the all-pervasive prejudice against Jews in Western Europe, the Middle East, the United States and Canada. Even in the erstwhile Soviet Union, committed to Marxism (Karl Marx himself being part-Jewish) which abominated racial prejudice,the Jews continued to be discriminated against. The defeat of fascism in Hitlerite Germany did not kill anti-Semitism. Nor in self-proclaimed tolerant France. In both countries, Jewish synagogues and cemetries were desecrated in recent months.

England has largely got over its anti-Semitism but even there many aristocratic families and the lunatic left-overs of Oswald Mosley make no secret of their dislike for Jews. In Canada and the United States they still have their exclusive country clubs and resorts which refuse admittance to Jews. This, despite the fact that many of the best brains, best musicians, artists, writers, industrialists an philanthropes are Jewish. Albert Einstein put it succinctly in his address to Sorbonne University in Paris: "If my theory of relativity is proved successful Germany will calim me as a German and France will declare that I am a citizen of the world. Should my theory prove untrue, France will say I am a German and Germany will declare I am a Jew."

We have no anti-Jewish prejudice in India for the simple reason we have hardly any Jews. But we have plenty of prejudice when it comes to our relations with each other. And all based on stereotypes none of which are true. Most Hindus believe Muslims and Sikhs are fanatics and not to be relied on. Most Muslims and Sikhs believe that Hindus are cunning and shifty and should never be trusted. We have given offensive names to each other. Maharashtra,which has all our communities well-represented,has its own brand of nomenclature for the communities: a Muslim is a Mian Bhai, Parsee a Bawaji, Christian a Makapaon (bread-eater), Sikh a Surdee, Gujarati Hindus are Gujjoos, Marathas are Ghaatees. And so on.

"A prejudice is" as Ambrose Bierce in his The Devil's Dictionary describes "a vagrant opinion without visible means of support." It tries to find reasons to shore it but never finds any. "A great many people think they are thinking when they are merely re-arranging their prejudices," wrote William James.

With the resurgence of fundamentalism in our three major religious communities, Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs (the Christians have so far remained uncontaminated),the problem of pride in one's faith and prejudice against others is no longer academic. We can see evidence of their resurgence in menacing proportions.

Does your office remind you of a match factory?

Fire !

The atmosphere fraught with endless possibilities. And the guilt sneaking up, knowing that the partitions and the ceiling can only fuel it.

It's amazing how many offices still work under threat.

The '90s office of Noorani Biswas & Kumar Associates, Bombay, fabricated with Gypboard

The world over, offices are being designed around the sophistication, durability, and economy of Gypsum board partitions and ceilings.

Because Gypsum boards are fire resistant, besides offering greater flexibility in workmanship, making it easy to make your office partitions and ceilings.

Gypsum boards are extremely lightweight, yet solid — of course, if you insist, you can have hollow Gypboard partitions too !

And Gypsum boards allow you to control the noise level in your office because they provide sound insulation.

It's superior, smooth and seamless finish lets you dress it up — with paint, wallpaper, even ceramic tiles !

To put the icing on the cake, you save 20% on Gypboard ceilings and 30% on partitions, over most other materials.

So make yours a Gypboard office. And go ahead—strike that match !

Farewell to arms

The two superpowers take a bold step towards disarmament

There can be no two opinions that the treaty for an across-the-board reduction in conventional arms signed by the heads of government of NATO and Warsaw Pact nations in Paris on 10 November—coinciding, incidentally, with Indira Gandhi's birth anniversary—is truly historic. Indeed, never before has mankind taken so sweeping and stupendous a leap towards disarmament and that, too, in peacetime, not at the end of a disastrous war.

Europe, the focus of two catastrophic World Wars during the first half of the twentieth century, has at last turned its back on the Cold War and heated contention that have been raging, with some ups and downs, since 1945. It has chosen instead peace and cooperation, as is underscored by the Paris Charter,the NATO-Warsaw summit's concluding document. But that is by no means all. What has happened also marks a major turning point in human thought.

Karl Marx is not the only prophet to have been discredited and disowned. The same fate has befallen Von Clausewitz, the author of the celebrated theory that war was "continuation of politics by other means". For, if the agreements reached in the French capital have any meaning at all, it is that the two superpowers and their allies have realised that war can no longer be an instrument of policy and politics. It is not merely nuclear war that is unthinkable; this is equally true of conventional wars, at any rate, in the European context.

The reason for this is not far to seek. On both sides of the previous divide in Europe, though not necessarily in many other parts of the world which remain underdeveloped, both the concentration and character of industries is such that anything like conventional hostilities on the scale of the Second World War would instantly unleash environmental disaster of a dimension that would put to shame a lakh of Bhopals. Such is the accuracy and lethality of sophisticated conventional weaponry that a few hits on nuclear power reactors, without any resort to nuclear missiles, would replicate Chernobyl all over Europe, with consequences too terrible to contemplate.

K. Subrahmanyam, the country's leading writer on strategy and defence, has drawn attention to another pertinent fact which Clausewitz and other thinkers of his time had not perhaps contemplated. It is the staggering increase in civilian casualties as the technology of war has improved and tactics of war have become increasingly indiscriminate. From one to 20 during the First World War, the ratio between civilian and military casualties shot up to 20 to one in Vietnam!

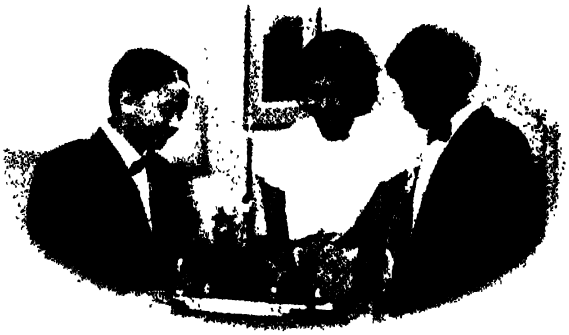
Gorbachev was the first statesman to come to terms with these rude realities of life. This indeed formed the basis of his New Thinking and eventually persuaded him, despite visible opposition at home, to accept an arrangement under which Eastern and Western Europe would have more or less equal conventional capability—forsaking the overwhelming Soviet superiority of the last four decades.



However, rare is a moment in life when there is no irony in the affairs of men and nations. What a paradox it is that the stride towards peace in Europe should have coincided with a clear slide towards war in the Gulf. Interestingly, it was at Paris that the Soviet foreign minister, Eduard Shevardnadze, spoke out that the UN Security Council should meet soon to review its previous resolutions on the demand for unconditional Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait and to take "more effective" action to enforce these resolutions. This clearly indicates that the Soviet Union has begun to acknowledge that its earlier stand of opposing any military action against Saddam Hussain would not work. Such is the Iraqi dictator's intransigence and so dishonest are his ploys to use foreign nationals in his clutches as pawns to buy time that even those anxious to avoid military conflict in the Gulf are beginning to give up. Even so, like the Russians, they want all the procedures of the UN to be followed scrupulously before any precipitate action is taken. The matter is too serious to be left to the unilateral initiative of the United States which the rest of the world is then asked to endorse, if not applaud.

Merely to state this is to stress that whatever arrangement is arrived at by the Big Two, in the context of Europe, cannot be automatically extended to other parts of the world. One has to deal with Saddam Hussains of almost every region.

Unfortunately, during the days when crucial developments have been taking place in the world, India has had no government worth the name, and and no foreign minister at all, even to take stock of these, leave alone formulating a coherent Indian policy in relation to them.

Since, to his great credit, Inder Gujral courteously declined Chandra Shekhar's persistent requests to stay on as the foreign minister, Vidya Charan Shukla has succeeded him. What this would mean in terms of foreign policy remains to be seen. For the present, one of the Emergency's main victims and principal hatchet men have jointly left for the Maldives.

Behind the act

Amnesty accuses the former VP regime of violating human rights

When the National Front wrested power from the Congress(I) last December, human rights organisations, including Amnesty International, had every reason to welcome the change. After all, the Rajiv regime's track record on the human rights front was not too impressive. The new set-up, in contrast, was packed with ardent advocates of civil liberties. In fact, Amnesty International had fought for the rights of many of the National Front ministers when they were thrown behind bars by Indira Gandhi during the Emergency.

But sadly enough, once in power, the National Front government proved no better than its predecessors. At least, that's what Amnesty International feels. A recent report released by the London-based agency says that things got worse on the human rights front during V.P. Singh's short but eventful tenure.

Initially, of course, the Raja and his colleagues started off on a promising note. Soon after taking over, the government repealed the notorious 59th Amendment Act, which was passed by the Rajiv regime ostensibly to curb terrorism in Punjab but ended up taking away some of the fundamental rights of the citizens. Then, it ordered the review of the cases of at least 1,400 political detenus in Punjab, leading to the release of 600 prisoners. But that was all. Faced with mounting extremism in Punjab and Kashmir, the VP government said goodbye to civil liberties and resorted to repressive measures to contain the deteriorating situation in the two states.

Although many detenus in Kashmir have been released during the 11-month period this year, several thousands are still said to be languishing in jails throughout the country. And, most of them without valid reasons or a fair trial, says Amnesty International. The agency is especially concerned about the Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Prevention) Act (TADA), 1985, and the National Security Act—these two legislations have been frequently used by successive governments whenever trouble has broken out—because they do not contain even the minimum safeguards against their abuse. The TADA, which is in force in both Punjab and Kashmir, provides the authorities with the power to detain anyone for a period of one year without trial. Many times, the Act has been misused as in Gujarat, where the legislation was promulgated to tackle a farmers' agitation.

There are other such draconian legislations as well. Like the Armed Forces Special Powers Act, which was so long used only in the north-east to counter insurgency. But recently, the Act has been extended to Kashmir as well, where security forces are torching entire villages and settlements in the name of destroying militant hideouts. And, under the Act, the security forces enjoy legal immunity. Amnesty International believes that such measures give the administration powers to harass anyone found opposing the government.

There is yet another cause for concern for Amnesty International. Indian courts have rarely granted compensation to victims of human rights violations. In fact, the judiciary has taken an inordinately long time to settle such cases. Which gives enough time to the administration and the police to harass and wean away witnesses. What is more, in many instances, again in Punjab and Kashmir, the security forces have not even responded to court notices. And in the troubled Valley, violence has severely affected the functioning of the courts. In September, a lawyer of the Srinagar High Court reported that around 3,000 habeas corpus petitions were pending, but there was no progress in the hearings as the courts were "near defunct".

There are plenty of such instances in Amnesty International's report. Though written in the agency's typically guarded style, the report nevertheless is a severe indictment of the previous National Front government. Amnesty also notes that whenever instances of human rights violations were brought to the notice of the government, it dismissed them saying that the allegations were made to discredit the administration and the security forces. ●

The two Pawars

But there is really only one

There are two Sharad Pawars. The first is the dashing figure so beloved of the Bombay press. He is independent, super-competent and a powerful mover and shaker. He made Chandra Shekhar Prime Minister, turned down the home ministry and flew off to solve the Kashmir problem on a day-trip to Vaishno Devi. Not only is he a fellow with enormous self-respect, but he is also his own man. Three months ago, he was discussing the possibility of toppling Rajiv Gandhi with Veerendra Patil and Chenna Reddy. And now, he might well link up with Chandra Shekhar and consign Rajiv to the dustbin of history.

Then, there is the second Pawar: the man who presents himself to his leader at 10 Janpath. This Pawar is an able lieutenant. Should Rajiv give him a job, it will be done. When Veerendra Patil steps out of line, it is Pawar who flies off to rap him on the knuckles. If messages have to be conveyed to Shekhar, Sharad will rush off to deliver them. Not only is he quietly competent, but he knows how to tug at the forelock. His Delhi representative Suresh Kalmadi is always wining and dining those close to 'the high command'. And should the likes of Satish Sharma come to Bombay, then Sharad will be in attendance every night: going along to parties in Juhu, at the Taj poolside and even, the Nineteen Hundred.

Most politicians have more than one face, but what makes Pawar's dual personas intriguing is that they are totally irreconcilable. The Pawar who sets the press corps oohing and ahing at Bombay's Mantralaya is unrecognisable when he squats in the reception room at 10 Janpath, waiting for George to tell him that Sahib will see him now.

NOR HAS the contrast gone unnoticed. These days, Pawar is not short of enemies in the Congress. Already, the likes of A.R. Antulay stand on tip-toe to whisper into Rajiv's ear that Sharad is a dangerous, conspiratorial type who is not to be trusted. Others point to his close friendships with industrialists (of whom, Nusli Wadia is unacceptable at 10 Janpath, but at least Rajen Pillai seems set to become a Club Class version of Lalit Suri) and his readiness to run down such Congress favourites as Dhirubhai Ambani in private conversations with the media.

Two weeks ago, Pawar's detractors found new ammunition. Sharad had told Rajiv that George Fernandes had approached him to see if the Congress would support V.P. Singh in the no-confidence motion. During the parliamentary debate, Rajiv rose to his feet once V.P. Singh had berated Chandra Shekhar for seeking Congress(I) backing to point out that Fernandes had gone the same route unsuccessfully.

This was enough for Fernandes to intervene and to deny that he'd ever made such a move. Yes, he said, he had met Pawar, but Rajiv would have to hang his head in shame if he repeated what Pawar had said about Rajiv and the Congress(I)!

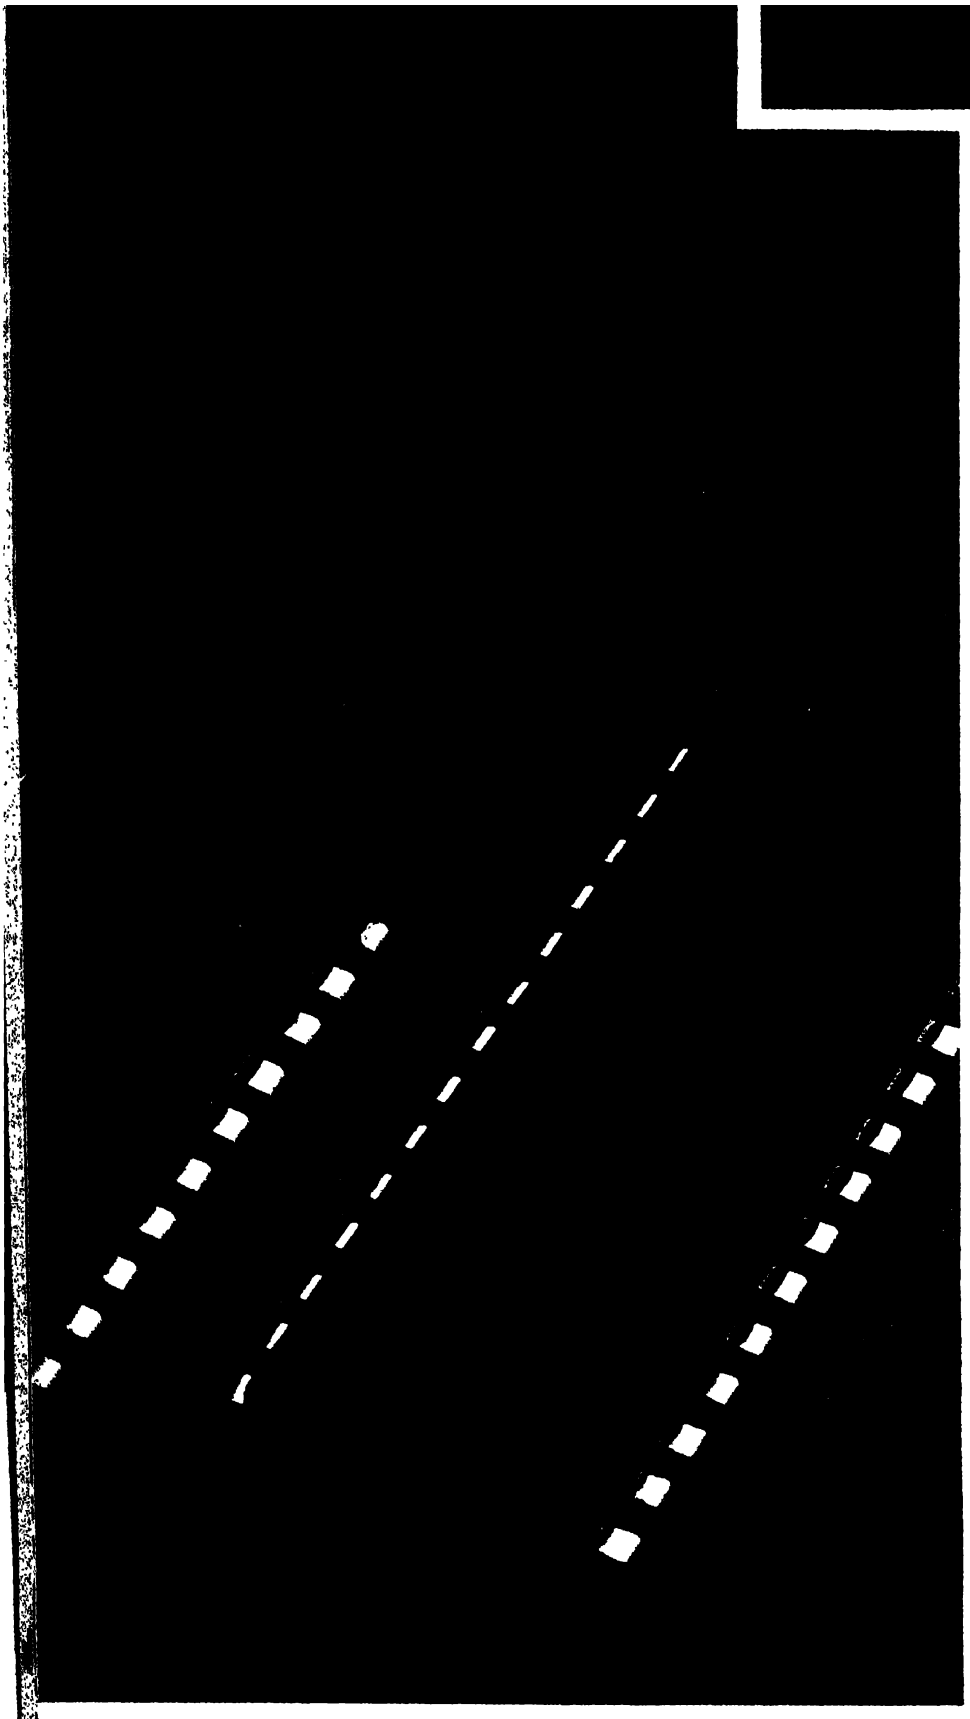
Rajiv let the matter drop and an embarrassed Pawar, while sticking to his original story, told The Sunday Observer, "I cannot divulge all that transpired in our meeting. I want to close this chapter."

As far as Pawar's critics were concerned, this was final proof of the chief minister's disloyalty.

THE PROBLEM with the disloyal-Pawar theory is that it greatly overestimates Sharad's power. Most versions of this hypothesis posit that he is a powerful regional leader who could easily win an election were he to dump Rajiv.

In fact, without Rajiv's support, Pawar would spend his whole life in Opposition. In 1980, his party contested the Assembly elections against the Congress and lost. In 1984, his version of the Congress lost in the Lok Sabha polls in Maharashtra and in 1985, the Congress(I) won a majority in the Assembly despite Pawar's opposition. The only time Pawar has led the Congress into an Assembly election was 1990—and it marked the first time in history that an undivided Congress failed to get a majority in the House and formed the government with the support of Independents.

So even if Pawar is conspiring against Rajiv, so what? He is shrewd enough to recognise that outside the Congress(I), he would be no more than a moderately powerful local leader. And Rajiv, in turn, is consequently not worried by reports of his disloyalty.



Why then does the press persist in seeing him as the leader of some new Syndicate, as a man Rajiv must kowtow to? Largely, one suspects because of the chief minister's own grasp of public relations. However much he tugs his forelock in Delhi and dances attendance on Satish Sharma, Pawar knows how to convey a different impression to the media back home.

Two celebrated instances:

1) When Kirti Ambani was arrested for the attempted murder of Nusli Wadia, Pawar's acolytes put it about that the chief minister had defied Rajiv Gandhi. In fact, Pawar had disregarded an instruction from Buta Singh, but the moment the Prime Minister's House got in on the act, he happily handed the enquiry over to the CBI. His purpose had been served: he had made a show of independence without really stepping out of line.

2) These days, Pawar has earned much publicity by claiming to have arranged the Congress-Shekhar marriage. In fact, he had little to do with it: R.K. Dhawan was the mastermind and Shekhar's link with Rajiv was Subramaniam Swamy, a veteran Pawar-baiter. Nor was Sharad ever offered the home ministry or asked to solve the Kashmir problem. But by leaking such stories and sticking close to Shekhar when the PM visited Bombay, he fostered this impression. More perceptive observers noted that when Pawar threw a party for Shekhar in Delhi, Rajiv Gandhi stayed away.

There may be two Pawars. But the first exists only in the newspapers. It is the second forelock-tugging persona that comes closest to reality. •

JAGDISH YADAV

THE FIRES OF RAM

As a Hindu wave sweeps India, the BJP stands to gain

"I am proud to be a Hindu," declares Lal Krishna Advani, the president of the second largest political party in the Indian Parliament, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). And the response is resounding. Millions of Hindus across the country are cheering him on. The new ideology is Hindu revivalism. The martial symbols of Aryan mythology and the strident calls to restore the glory of Hinduism have replaced the secular monotones of the past few decades.

There is no attempt even to mute the evocations to base obscurantism. There is only pride. And leading the new revival is the BJP, riding on the Hindu chariot. The immediate goal is Ayodhya, the ancient capital of the mythical warrior god, Lord Ram. The masjid erected over the spot where Lord Ram was supposedly born is to be moved and a magnificent temple built in its place. The objective is to redress a historical injustice perpetrated by a long dead Muslim emperor and to prove to the world that the flame of Hinduism burns eternal and ever more glorious.

The preserver of the Hindu tradition is the sangha parivar, the family of organisations that share the goal of Hindu revivalism. This family, consisting of outfits like the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), the BJP, the Akhil Bharatiya Vidhyarthi Parishad (ABVP) and the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), is the vanguard of the new order. The membership, appeal and raw political power of these organisations are increasing at a formidable rate—faster, in fact, than any other group or political party in recent times. The old equations, the old vote-banks and the comfortable notions of the Indian polity are fast giving way. It is the age of the angry trident.

Till very recently, Hindu revivalism was just one minor note in the composite hubbub of Indian politics. Today, it has become the theme of national politics. And the transformation is astonishingly recent. Just how powerful the current upsurge is can be gauged from the fact that every major political party in the country is currently being ruled by the dynamics of resurgent Hinduism.

The fall of Vishwanath Pratap Singh is, of course the most dramatic example. He tumbled out of office not because of political machinations by his rival colleague, Chandra Shekhar, but because he failed to resolve the crisis thrown up by the assertive Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) and its ally, the BJP (see accompanying piece 'Closet communalist?'). Singh was clearly the victim of communal politics. The VHP had started its strident campaign during the early years of the Rajiv Gandhi regime and had got a tremendous fillip when the Congress(I) government at the Centre allowed the reopening of the disputed Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid in February 1986.

The VHP, and subsequently the BJP, discovered that they now possessed a powerful instrument for achieving their long-cherished aim: polarising the Hindus and using them as a political force to grab power at the Centre. The moment the gates of the Ayodhya mandir/masjid were opened, the VHP let loose a propaganda campaign, the likes of which have not been seen very often in the country. Sammelans, yagnas, video-tape shows and public meetings were held to drive home the solitary point: it was time for Hindus to rise up and redress the historical injustices perpetrated by the Muslims.

Specifically, the agenda called for the shifting of the dome-like structures over the building known as the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid and the construction of a magnificent, brand new temple on that site (see box). This was an emotive issue and the Hindu leadership knew it could exploit it to the hilt. To bring about mass involvement in their programme, the VHP leaders organised shila (brick) pujas all over the country and in Hindu communities all over the world. These shila pujas also helped in the collection of funds for temple construction. By the beginning of last year, Ram Janmabhoomi had become a major national political issue, which no political party could afford to ignore.

The Congress(I) most acutely felt the need to adapt to the changing equations and, in a somewhat desperate bid, allowed the VHP to perform the foundation-laying ceremony (shilanyas) for the proposed temple at Ayodhya. It is said that former Union home minister Buta Singh, who was contesting from Jalore in Rajasthan, a constituency dominated by militant Hindus, convinced Rajiv Gandhi to allow the shilanyas. It was a triumph for the Hindus. And the Muslims, perturbed and agitated, shifted their loyalty to V.P. Singh's Janata Dal.

The traditional champion of secularism, the Congress(I), had abdicated its responsibility. With 12 per cent of the population—that is, the Muslim segment of the population—alienated, the Congress(I) could never win, but neither could V.P. Singh's Janata Dal. For, now the country was hopelessly divided. On one side were the Muslims, another the Hindu revivalists and the progressive, mainstream vote was split along partisan lines. V.P. Singh was handicapped right from the start and knew he would have to play footsie with the BJP if he wanted the country's top job. Singh compromised but publicly acted the secular virgin, refusing to share a common platform and swearing that he would uphold the rights of all communities.

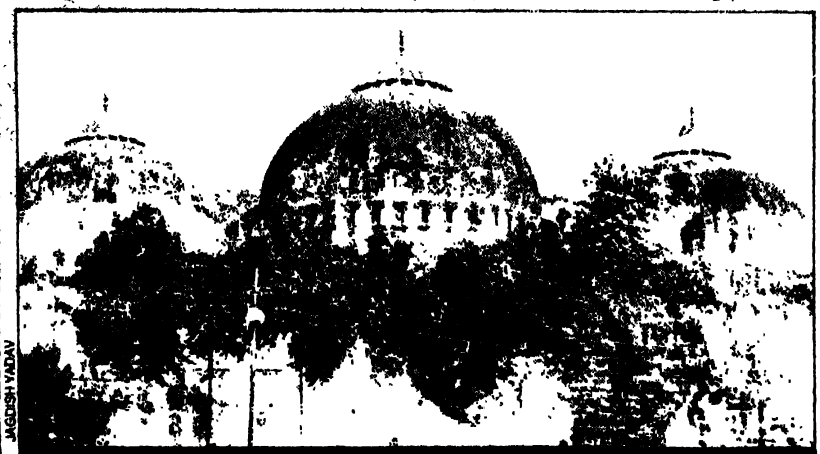
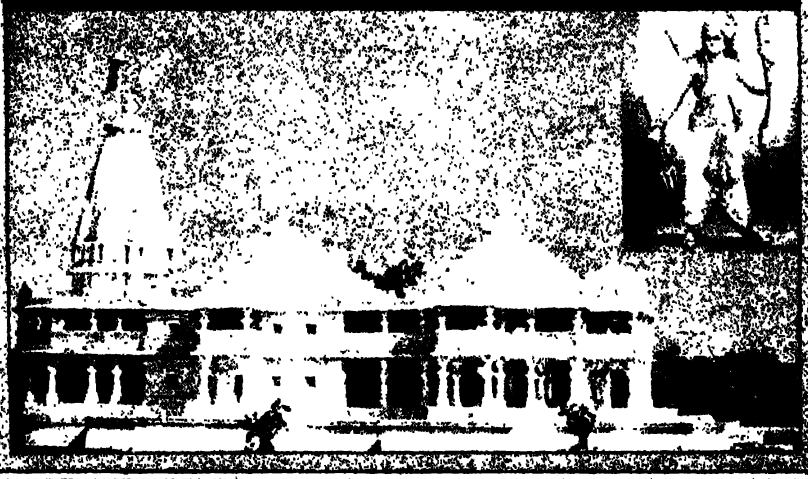
The temple of doom



A layman's guide to the Babri Masjid/Ram Janmabhoomi dispute

AYODHYA: A small town in the Faizabad district of Uttar Pradesh, where the mythical Hindu warrior god, Lord Ram, is said to have been born. This town has once again become famous because of a campaign launched by Hindu organisations, which believe that the exact spot where Lord Ram was born is located inside a structure which the Muslims call Babri Masjid.

RAM JANMABHOOMI: Hindu organisations, the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) in particular, believe that the structure known as the Babri Masjid was orginally a temple built to mark the spot where Lord Ram was born. Hence the structure should not be called Babri Masjid but Sri Ram Janmabhoomi Mandir.



HISTORIC DISPUTE: The Hindus believe that the Moghul emperor Babar had, as was the practice of Muslim rulers in those times, demolished part of the original temple and put up three domes over the original pillars. Archaeological evidence suggests that the domes and the pillars that support them belong to two different periods and are made of different basic materials. Historical records show that various Hindu rulers had unsuccessfully fought the Moghuls over the Ayodhya structure.

REOPENING: The British had kept the mandir/masjid locked for the greater part of their rule. But pujas had been permitted from time to time. In 1949, an idol of Lord Ram was placed inside the sanctum sanctorum, but Nehru ordered the site to be closed. The controversial building's gates were reopened in 1986 following a court

The Hindu fundamentalists plan to demolish the three domes and build a magnificent Sri Ram Temple, three times the size of the existing structure had not gauged the extent of the groundswell in favour of the BJP and were astounded when that party secured as many as 88 Lok Sabha seats in the 1989 November general elections. Hinduism was clearly on the ascent. At that point, Singh could have declared that he would not form a government with BJP support. Devi Lal or Chandra Shekhar might have been less restrained and would, in all probability, have done in December 1989 what they did in October 1990.

Singh, at any rate, seems to have decided it would be politically shrewder to go along with the BJP, which at that time was taking pains to prove that it was a sober, mainstream party. Together with the left and the BJP, V P. Singh forged a minimum common programme and the government was formed. But for the first time in the history of the country, a blatantly pro-Hindu organisation, one that favoured a theocratic state, had got its foot into the portals of power.

"Vishwanath Pratap Singh compromised with the Hindu communalists at every stage," avers Shahid Siddiqui, editor of the Urdu daily Nai Duniya. "What Buta Singh had done shamelessly and blatantly, VP was doing covertly and with great finesse." The BJP soon made it clear that it was not prepared to be a mere bystander and forced V.P. Singh to rubberstamp many of its decisions, including the posting of Jagmohan as Governor of Jammu & Kashmir, the sacking of the income-tax official, Vishwabandhu Gupta, who had asked the VHP to submit its accounts, and the appointment of a few key people in critical posts.

In November 1989, the Congress(I) government allowed the VHP to perform shilanyas or foundation-laying ceremony for the proposed temple order and since then the entire nation has been split on communal lines. The question—who will eventually get ownership of the structure—has become a prestige issue for both the Hindus and the Muslims.

VHP PLANS: The VHP has drawn up ambitious plans to build a magnificent Sri Ram Temple over the existing structure. It wants the three domes built over the old pillars to be removed by any possible means. The new temple will be constructed by incorporating the old pillars and the sanctum sanctorum where Lord Ram's idol is currently placed. The new temple (estimated cost: Rs 25 crores to Rs 35 crores) will be almost three times the size of the existing structure. The actual construction work will be supervised by the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagna Committee.

MUSLIM STAND: They claim that the structure is a masjid and cannot be touched. The bit about shifting the three domes is totally unacceptable. At best, the Muslims say that the new Ram Temple can be built adjacent to the Babri Masjid. Currently, there are court cases pending in the Allahabad and Kanpur High Courts regarding the legal ownership of the existing structure and its adjoining plots.

GOVERNMENT OF FORCE: The VHP points out that the courts can [illegible] and that the matter can be settled only in [illegible] and that the [illegible] structure [illegible] the shilanyas [illegible] temple structure [illegible]

The VHP, therefore, is bent on executing its plans with the help of force if need be and disregarding the verdict of the courts.

SHILANYAS: Shila (brick) pujas were organised all over the country by the VHP to raise funds for the temple. Hindus from all over the country and abroad contributed over Rs 8 crores. These contributions, along with the symbolic bricks, were preserved by the VHP. On 10 November, 1989, the Congress(I) government allowed the VHP to perform shilanyas, or foundation-laying ceremony, for the proposed temple. The precise spot where the foundation was laid (using the holy bricks sent by Hindu contributors) is 197 feet away from the sanctum sanctorum of the disputed structure. The shilanyas site is where the main gate of the proposed temple is to come up.

WARPATH: After the shilanyas success, the VHP believed that pressure tactics would compel the government to allow them to begin construction of the temple. 30 October was the day the construction work was to begin. It ended in a bloodbath. But the VHP programme shows no sign of letting up. [illegible]

Nineteen ninety was really the year of the sangha parivar—the family of organisations that pay homage to the concept of Hindu revivalism. At the core of this family is the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), a non-political Hindu organisation that believes in the ideas propounded by great Hindu thinkers like Swami Vivekananda and Aurobindo Ghose. Vivekananda had established the connection between Hinduism and nationalism with his famous declaration that the "true believer" demonstrates faith "when the distress of every other man bearing the name Hindu comes to your heart and makes you feel as if your own son were in distress". Sri Aurobindo had reinforced the concept by holding that "all great awakenings in India, all her periods of mightiest and most varied vigour have drawn their vitality from the fountainhead of some deep religious awakening".

These concepts were translated into politics by Balgangadhar Tilak, who maintained that Hinduism advocated action, social involvement and even violence to achieve just ends. Revivalists of the early 20th century opposed Mahatma Gandhi's idea of ahimsa, arguing that passive and non-resisting sufferance is a Christian, and not Aryan, principle.

The Hindu revivalist school of thought was pushed to the fringes by the resounding success of Gandhian politics, which had at its core the belief that Indian culture was essentially composite and not exclusively shaped by any one ethnic or religious community. Gandhi's ideas worked, despite the creation of Pakistan, and it was accepted that the basis of Indian polity had to be kept secular and non-theocratic. India's Constitution-framers understood that a democracy, made up of an overwhelming Hindu majority, could perpetrate the worst kind of discrimination against minorities. And it is from these basic principles that the idea of special protection to the minorities was evolved.

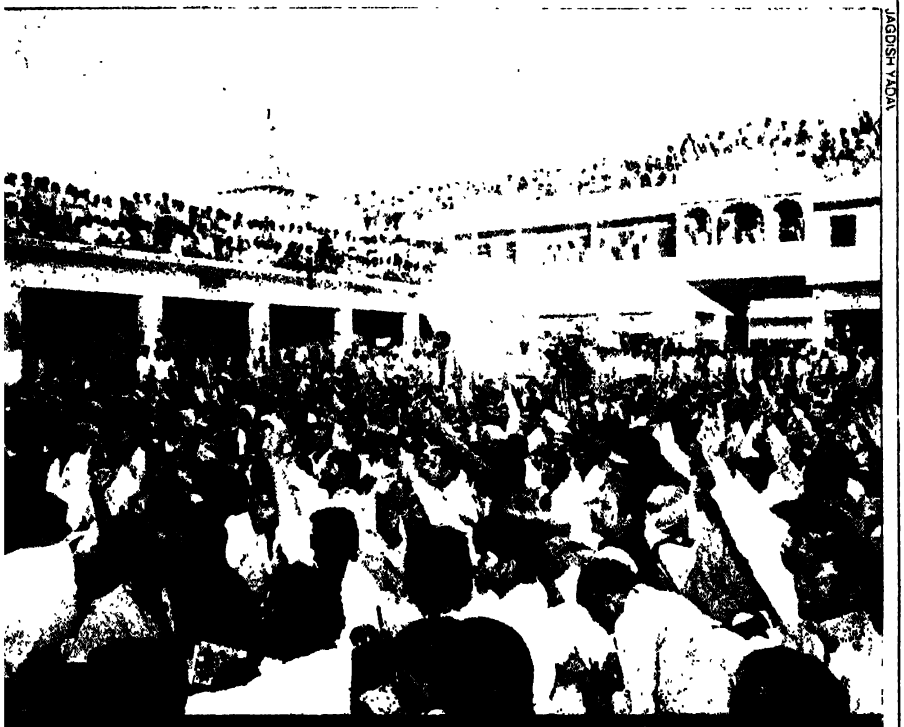
The sangha parivar, however, continued to be blindly opposed to Gandhian ideology. It believed that Gandhi's ideas had failed: Muslims had walked away with a massive chunk of the country and a continued adherence to "pseudo-secularism" would only further weaken the country. It decided to fight it out until the Hindu view finally prevailed in Hindusthan. The revivalists had a long wait. As long as secularism and socialism worked, Hindu revivalistic forces remained in the background.

From the mid-1980s, all that started changing. The revivalist upsurge stemmed not from any intrinsic increase in Hindu fervour, but from the growing failure of the system. After 43 years of Independence, political stability and sustained, equitable economic growth remain distant dreams. This, compounded with the propaganda of Hindu fundamentalist organisations, has given birth to the notion that a liberal, secular state might not be the answer to this country's problems. Half-truths have consequently begun to sound authentic to the Hindu ear.

Organisations like the BJP and the VHP have of late been making heavy weather of how minorities have supposedly been pampered by the Indian state. The insinuation is that the cause of all national ills lies in the policy of appeasement. The fact that Muslims can have four wives somehow bothers the average Hindu, who believes (quite erroneously) that the Muslim population growth is fast outstripping Hindu growth. Therefore, even liberal Hindus cannot understand what is wrong with the demand for a uniform civil code. They nod in solemn assent when Hindu fundamentalists point out that for Muslims, Islam comes first and then nationality. They agree that the government is being iniquitous by taxing Hindu religious organisations and exempting their Muslim counterparts. The point is not that all these notions are debatable but that they reflect the current psyche of the long-suffering common man, who, unable to satisfy his basic wants, is viewing the goings-on around him with increasing distaste and intolerance.

The revivalists have exploited such sentiments by insinuating that Muslims are essentially alien descendants of barbarous, anti-Hindu invaders and that their religion places Islam above the nation. Such pernicious views have unfortunately struck a sympathetic chord in Hindus chiefly because of the behaviour of a section of Muslims. In April 1987, for instance, a riot broke out in the small Gujarat town of Virpur after Muslims burst crackers to celebrate the Pakistani cricket team's victory over India at Sharjah. Members of the local VHP, the Bajrang Dal and a local outfit called the Hindu Suraksha Samiti sprang into action and for two days paralysed the entire Kheda district surrounding Virpur. By the time passions cooled, at least four people had been killed in communal clashes.

Indian Muslims celebrating Pakistani sports victories is not terribly uncommon and this phenomenon has



L.K. Advani boasts that the fervour created by Ram Janmabhoomi will not subside in a hurry. India's golden age of secularism is clearly on the wane quite naturally bred suspicions about their nationalistic affiliations. Islam is seen to be on the ascendant. The Meenakshipuram conversions of Harijans into Muslims (1981) had fuelled countrywide hysteria. Hindu religious leaders complain that their attempts to spread Hindu education are being stifled by the government, which encourages and even funds Islamic educational institutions. Hindus are even more concerned about the flow of Arab petrodollars into India to spread the word of Islam.

All these things, coupled with the killing of Hindus in Punjab and the exodus of Kashmiri pundits from the Srinagar Valley, have created a siege mentality among the Hindu community. What it would not have accepted even five years ago meets with grave approval today. Some fundamental equation has changed. And the Hindu revivalists know it.

Advani, at a recent news conference, boasted that the fervour created by the Ram Janmabhoomi issue would not subside in a hurry. He hinted that the change in the Hindu psyche was permanent. India's golden age of secularism is clearly on the wane.

JAGDISH YADAV

30 October was the day the construction work on the Ram Temple was to begin. Kar sevaks gathered in Ayodhya in thousands before D-Day

The new Prime Minister, Chandra Shekhar, believes that he can succeed where V.P. Singh had so ignominiously failed. He believes he can resolve the contentious Ram Janmabhoomi issue, soothe communal passions and take the sting out of the BJP's sure-fire campaign. This is the primary item on his agenda. If he flounders, he will go the way his predecessor went.

By the last week of November, it was clear that the Congress(I), which had helped Chandra Shekhar become Prime Minister, will not allow him to do just as he pleases. Already, UP Congress(I) president Rajendra Kumari Bajpai is demanding that her party put pressure on the state's chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav. Bajpai speaks for a major chunk of the UP Congress(I) which wants Yadav to ease up on his offensive against supporters of Hindu revivalism. UP Congressmen point out that they had criticised Mulayam for being unduly harsh on the kar sevaks and for his attempts to gag the local press. Now, they can hardly support him without conditions.

Chandra Shekhar, however, is in no hurry to oblige the Congress(I). He knows that the Congress(I) is mortally afraid of the BJP's growing electoral prowess and, for the moment, is only too glad to leave the task of tackling the Hindu revivalists to him. For the moment, Shekhar wants to deal with the revivalists, the BJP included, in his own way. Subodh Kant Sahay, the minister of state for home affairs, who already has considerable knowledge of the vexatious Ram Janmabhoomi issue, has been asked to mediate between the Hindu and Muslim communities. Mulayam Singh Yadav too is to be involved—one of Chandra Shekhar's chief complaints against his predecessor is regarding the manner in which the UP chief minister was ignored in the kar seva affair.

But all this does not add up to a solution. Chandra Shekhar is attempting the impossible. He maintains that the entire issue can be resolved through amicable talks and mutual respect. But all that died a long time ago. Shekhar says he wants a solution under which the VHP's Ram Temple will be built, but the sanctum sanctorum of the Babri Masjid and the domes above it will not be touched. This might sound good, but if such a solution was acceptable to the VHP, V.P. Singh would not have had to go.

Singh was also trying for a similar compromise. The VHP, however, was adamant. The VHP and the BJP refused to budge on three points: firstly, they said that the sanctum sanctorum of the new temple must be where the idol of Lord Ram is currently located inside the existing structure; secondly, the architectural plan for the temple drawn up by the VHP could not be altered in the slightest; and thirdly, there could be no postponement of the kar seva. Singh fell because he could not persuade the Muslim leadership to accept the VHP's conditions.

The BJP knows it has a great issue in the Ram Janmabhoomi temple and it also realises that no secular government can possibly allow the shifting of the Babri Masjid without the concurrence of the Muslims. At another level, the BJP and the RSS leaderships despise Chandra Shekhar and will try their utmost to make life extremely difficult for him. The BJP's aim is to consolidate its electoral gains and to appear even more distinctively Hindu. It is convinced that glory and electoral victory is assured to those who have the courage to hitch a ride on the chariot of the Hindu warrior god. •

CLOSET COMMUNALIST?

Did V.P. Singh make a secret deal with the BJP?

The simple answer, of course, is no. For, as BJP leader Atal Behari Vajpayee has since clarified, there was no 'deal'; there was only an 'understanding'. But that clearly is not saying very much. For what, anyway, is the big difference between a 'deal' and an 'understanding'? The semantics, after all, are hardly important. What is, is the ethical question: did former Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh wear one hat for the Muslims and another for the Hindus?

The Congress(I), quite clearly, feels tha V.P. Singh did precisely that. In a statement issued by 50 Congress(I) MPs on 27 October, Singh was charged of indulging in "sheer deceit" by entering into a "secret pact" to ensure BJP president L.K. Advani's safe journey to Ayodhya. According to another accusation, Singh had apparently even agreed to perform kar seva at the site of the proposed Ram Temple at Ayodhya. The Congress(I) statement read: "Mr Singh's hurriedly planted secular mask now lies in tatters...It exposes the true nature of Mr Singh as a man who will sell anything and anyone in order to protect his kursi."

Singh, on the other hand, has adopted an equally moralistic defence. He has claimed time and again that far from being deceitful or manipulative, he has even sacrificed his government to uphold the secular basis of the Indian polity. Singh has justified his support to the BJP on two grounds: one, that at the time of the elections and prior to the formation of the National Front government, the BJP had not talked about making the Ram Janmabhoomi temple the basis of its support. At that time, both the BJP and the left had said they would support the government on the basis of a common minimum programme.

Secondly, V.P. Singh has argued that till the end he was trying to find a solution to the emotive Ram Janmabhoomi issue and cracked down on the BJP only when it became obvious that it could not possibly be resolved. It was apparent that the Hindu and the Muslim communities in the country were on a collision course. There could be only two solutions: either the Muslims would have to be persuaded to give up their rights to the disputed mandir/masjid or else the Hindu organisations, the BJP included, would have to be talked into compromising their rigid stance. From the beginning, Singh tried both approaches, explain the Raja's supporters, and what is so diabolical about that?

What remains obscure and more than a little intriguing, however, is the precise nature of the 'understanding' V.P. Singh had arrived at with the BJP leadership. If the matter was so straightforward, why the need for an 'understanding' with the BJP? And what precisely had been promised? And to what end?

THE 'UNDERSTANDING'

Contrary to popular impressions, the BJP leadership too was in a bind over the Ayodhya issue. It did not want the V.P. Singh government to collapse at that juncture. At the same time, it could not climb down from its avowed stand on the construction of a new temple at the Babri Masjid site. The BJP, consequently, convinced V.P. Singh that he could, if he tried hard enough, get the Muslim leadership to accept the shifting of the Babri Masjid domes to a different site and allow the construction of the Ram Temple.

V.P. Singh failed to persuade the Hindu organisations to climb down from their avowed stand on the construction of a new temple at the site of the Babri Masjid

If anybody could achieve this, it was V.P. Singh, who had cultivated excellent relations with the top Muslim leadership in the country. The essence of the plan was that the government would acquire the disputed structure and its adjoining lands, thus nullifying the various related cases pending in the Allahabad and Lucknow High Courts; next, the Supreme Court would be asked to examine whether the masjid domes were built over an older structure; once it was proved that the domes were later additions (implying that there had originally been a temple at the site), the structure, including the adjoining lands, would be handed over to the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagna Samiti. The domes would be shifted and a new mosque built at a different site. The Muslim leadership was also to be promised that the 3,000-odd similar mandir/masjid disputes pending in courts all over the country would be frozen by appropriate legislation.

The Muslims would, therefore, have a new Babri Masjid and legislative protection against similar disputes in the future, while the Hindus would have their Ram Temple. It looked like a very neat solution and the BJP convinced V.P. Singh to plug away at it. In the meantime, it was understood that Advani should be allowed to proceed with his rath yatra till 28 October, ie, two days before the kar seva date. Till that time, Singh was to continue to look for a solution. According to the spirit of the understanding, "all avenues were to be kept open for a negotiated settlement and no party should attempt a showdown in haste". This, in a nutshell, was the big 'deal'.

The BJP's Govind Acharya says that the party knew all along it had a ruthless adversary in V.P. Singh, but did not believe he was basically dishonest or a two-timing schemer

THE BREAKDOWN

Sources in the Union home ministry suggest that V.P. Singh might just have pulled it off. Several Muslim leaders had been informally sounded out and had agreed to go along with the plan. As far as the Muslim leadership was concerned, Singh was the best bet. The BJP was too dangerous to be allowed to grow by cashing in on religious indignation and the Congress(I) was not to be trusted, especially considering that it was the Congress that had opened up the Ayodhya Pandora's box. Moreover, key members of the Babri Masjid Action Committee (BMAC), a Muslim organisation that had been resisting the idea of shifting the mosque, had been given Rajya Sabha seats and other important appointments by V.P. Singh. If the BMAC and a few key Muslim leaders okayed the plan, Singh would be through.

Ideally, the BJP wanted the matter to be settled by Diwali, 18 October. On that date, the Muslim leadership was expected to renounce its claims to the non-mosque part of the disputed Ayodhya structure. But V.P. Singh got the first shock on 17 October, at the all-party meeting held in New Delhi, where the CPI(M) pointed out that the plan would not work, that it would amount to a total sell-out to Hindu fundamentalists. The BJP too put its foot down and on that very day, Advani announced that his party would withdraw support to the government if his rath yatra or the 30 October kar seva was stopped.

V.P. Singh was cornered, but nevertheless made a last-ditch attempt to salvage the situation. On 19 October, he put the first part of the plan into action by issuing an ordinance taking over the disputed structure along with the adjoining lands and enforcing a constitutional provision to refer all disputes over the site to the Supreme Court. This last attempt, however, ended up in disaster. The VHP and the BJP were troubled because the ordinance did not go the whole hog. They, nevertheless, agreed that it could be the starting point for subsequent negotiations. The real problem was the fierce reaction of a section of the Muslim leadership, which felt that the ordinance would set a precedent and ultimately endanger the fundamental right of worship. This argument forced the other leaders, who had agreed to the plan originally, to reject the ordinance as well.

On 21 October, representatives of Hindu and Muslim organisations were brought to Delhi in a last attempt at resolving the dispute through negotiations. The meeting turned out to be a fiasco. The Muslims were furious because the dispute had effectively been taken out of the purview of the courts and had been handed over to the executive, which could act arbitrarily. The Hindus were equally incensed because the ordinance, equivocal as it was on the questions of ownership and the nature of the structure, did not touch the "core of the problem". In the end, everybody walked out of the meeting, leaving Singh holding the baby.

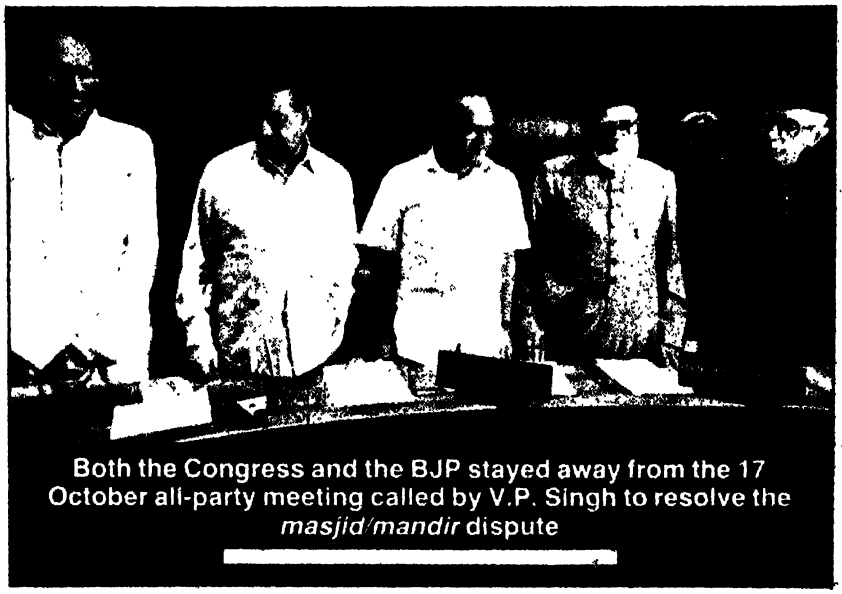
THE END

22 October must have been a long day for V.P. Singh. Both approaches had failed. Now he had to make the hardest choice of his career: give up the country's top job or else side with the Hindu fundamentalists. In the end, he chose to sacrifice his government. That very day, he withdrew the ordinance and late at night, instructed Bihar chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav to arrest Advani.

At that stage, the Mulayam Singh Yadav factor came into play. V.P. Singh's silent struggle with the Uttar Pradesh chief minister had all along been a suspenseful sub-plot. Mulayam never trusted Singh, who he believed was constantly plotting his ouster. Moreover, Mulayam Singh Yadav, who has always championed secular politics, never really believed in V.P. Singh's secular credentials. Ambition also played a major part. Mulayam felt the Ayodhya and the Mandal issues offered a great opportunity for his securing an important place in national politics. He wanted to play a key role in the negotiations on the communal question.

But V.P. Singh would not have that. He wanted to make sure that Mulayam remained a two-bit, state-level player. He alienated the UP CM by keeping him in the dark regarding the home ministry's covert negotiations. Mulayam, on his part, after coming to know of VP's understanding with the BJP, tried his best to sabotage it. And that too quite openly. During a meeting of chief ministers, Mulayam stomped out, declaring that he would not be party to any understanding with the BJP and would arrest Advani at the first opportunity.



The day the ordinance was promulgated, Mulayam planned to arrest Advani, by stopping the Rajdhani Express carrying him to Patna. The train was to be stopped at a place called Rarah, between Itawah and Kanpur, in UP. A helicopter was kept ready. But at the last moment, senior state officials persuaded Mulayam against doing anything so drastic, especially since the PM had specifically instructed him not to do so.

At any rate, on 22 October, V.P. Singh knew that Mulayam was waiting to arrest Advani as soon as he crossed into UP from Bihar. Laloo Prasad Yadav helped out by arresting Advani on 23 October morning just before he was scheduled to cross over. The 'understanding' or 'deal' fell through.

THE WINNER?

As far as V.P. Singh was concerned, he had made the best of a terrible situation. When he had to go, he made sure he went like a hero, waving his secular credentials. Shahid Siddique, editor of the Urdu weekly Nai Duniya and one of VP's bitter critics, admits: "V.P. Singh has become the hero of the Muslims, who view him as a man who gave up his chair in his fight against Hindu communalists." Despite the question marks over the 'deal' and Mulayam Singh Yadav's recent tirades against V.P. Singh for his closet communalism, the former PM retains his credibility. Yadav's exposés on how key VHP activists were whisked away from UP in special aircraft and then allowed to disappear have not cut much ice with the Muslim population, which is more inclined to believe VP's admission that he was—till the last moment—attempting to find a negotiated settlement to avert communal warfare.

Arun Shourie's controversial 'Arey bhai masjid hai hi kahaan?' story, for instance, oddly enough, has not been taken seriously either by the Muslim or the Hindu leadership. Syed Yusuf, secretary of the influential Muslim organisation, the Jamait-e-Islami Hind, says that the article was "mischievous and designed to create confusion amongst Muslims". Yusuf, who was present during discussions with V.P. Singh on the Babri Masjid issue, feels that Shourie deliberately placed the former Prime Minister's remarks on the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid question out of context. "Vishwanath Pratap Singh talks like that, it is his style...he would even ask laughingly, what is this mosque and temple all about? But that does not mean he was insincere." says Yusuf.

Both the Congress and the BJP stayed away from the 17 October all-party meeting called by V.P. Singh to resolve the masjid/mandir dispute

Surprisingly, Govind Acharya, the BJP's influential national executive member and special assistant to party president L.K. Advani, holds a similar view on the Shourie article. "Shourie did not do the correct thing by selectively quoting V.P. Singh," he feels. Acharya says that the BJP knew all along that it had a ruthless adversary in Singh, who was using every stratagem to outwit it. But at no point in time did the BJP leadership seriously believe that V.P. Singh was basically dishonest or a two-timing schemer. "In my opinion, V.P. Singh's real problem was that he underestimated his own clout with the Muslim leadership and when he found nothing was working out, he panicked and, in his typically impulsive way, decided it was time for a showdown with the BJP," says Acharya. ●

Nowhere near the summit

The Fifth SAARC meeting in the Maldives achieves little

It was Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar's maiden appearance on the international stage, and he performed remarkably well. At a time when the region they represent was experiencing widespread political turmoil, it seemed strange, even hypocritical, that the heads of the seven member countries of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) should meet on an idyllic island in the Indian Ocean and talk only of economic and cultural cooperation. Only the Indian premier made a valiant bid to include bilateral talks as a crucial part of the Fifth SAARC Summit held in the Republic of Maldives on 21-23 November.

The meeting was especially significant because four heads of state—those of India, Pakistan, Nepal and Sri Lanka—were meeting jointly for the first time. In his statement at the opening session of the Summit, Chandra Shekhar departed from convention to add an impassioned plea that the occasion be used to sort out the internal conflict that was plaguing at least six of the seven participating countries. "Let us exploit nature for the benefit of the toiling masses and the workers in the fields," he said, to thunderous applause. To spend this time on "mere formalities when there could be more fruitful discussion on issues agitating the minds of the people" would be a waste, he added. "May I know Mr Chairman," Shekhar asked, "why we are not addressing ourselves to the hard realities of life?"

Then, Chandra Shekhar blamed Nepal for affecting the environment of India, and said India was not giving advice but seeking help from that country to curb the detrimental effects of deforestation. For the Indian side, of course, the most crucial aspect was whether the two new leaders of India and Pakistan would get along, meeting each other for the first time since they assumed office only recently, both amidst uncertainty and violence.

At the opening ceremony, both leaders behaved like strangers even though they were seated next to each other. Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif, however, got up and congratulated Chandra Shekhar for his brilliant speech. But as the Summit progressed, it became abundantly clear that unless there was a political will to resolve bilateral disputes among the member countries, there would be no question of fruitful economic cooperation. It was felt that the resolutions adopted at earlier meetings were taking too long to be implemented, and the whole exercise was pointless unless the entire structure of the Summit was changed.

Never before has there been so much regional tension to contend with. India has problems with all the SAARC countries, except, perhaps the Maldives. Bangladesh has experienced bloody anti-government riots in recent weeks, and Bhutan is in the throes of political unrest. Sri Lanka's President Ranasinghe Premadasa did not attend the SAARC meet since he has sworn not to leave the island until the ethnic strife ends there, and in Nepal the transition from monarchy to democracy is proving to be difficult.

The region's economic problems are compounded by the crisis in the Gulf—many of the SAARC countries have to deal with the problem of vast numbers of their citizens returning home penniless. More important, the oil crunch has affected most of the SAARC nations.

Therefore, it was absolutely essential to abandon SAARC's earlier overcautious approach to the inclusion of bilateral issues in the Summit proceedings. "This Summit has been important, because it has set in motion a new mode of thinking, which will make economic and trade cooperation much simpler to achieve," explains

Mohan Kashikar, an academic from Nagpur University working on a paper on SAARC." But like the European Economic Community (EEC), the basis of this Summit will remain trade, industry and finance," he adds.

Two years ago, the idea to introduce visa-free travel between SAARC countries for Supreme Court judges and heads of national academic institutions was mooted, it has only just been implemented. Besides, there was also a proposal to allow limited convertibility of the currencies of SAARC countries, which would enable tourists to use their own currency in the region. This time, to give an added impetus to tourism in the area, it was decided that a scheme for the promotion of organised tourism would be launched. The SAARC convention on narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances was also signed—members felt it would go a long way in curbing drug peddling and smuggling in the area.

Joint ventures were initiated in the field of cottage industries and handicrafts with the aim of promoting collective self-reliance in the region. The national studies on trade, manufactures and services has been concluded, and a regional study was now being undertaken.

The seven heads of state or government also decided to share information and exchange reports, studies and publications with the European Community and the Association of South-

East Asian Nations (ASEAN). After all, the region could not ignore the increasing international trend towards the opening up of global economies and the increasing integration of the pattern of global production, consumption and trade, and the growing multi-polarity of the world economic structure. "We are moving towards cooperation in core economic areas, and the establishment of a regional fund will be a major step," says Rajnikant Verma, joint secretary, SAARC. The regional fund would make available credit on easy terms for the identification and development of regional projects, though there is some conflict between the member nations as to which projects fall within the ambit of this fund. India would host a meeting in February 1991 to work out the modalities of the fund. Before that, the foreign ministers of member countries would meet in Islamabad from 18 December this year.

Recognising that environment is a major global concern, it was decided to observe 1992 as the SAARC Year of Environment. The region was prone to floods and tidal waves, and would also be affected by the greenhouse effect, and a regional study on the causes and consequences of natural disasters and the protection and preservation of the environemnt was being undertaken to see what could be done about curbing the disastrous effects of the destruction of rainforests. Keeping the vital importance of biotechnology for the long-term food security of developing countries in mind, an exchange of expertise in genetic conservation and the maintenance of germplasm banks was also finalised. It was decided that the SAARC countries would contribute to the establishment of a gene bank for developing countries by the Group of Fifteen developing countries (G-15).

Reaffirming their support to the UN Security Council resolutions on the Gulf crisis, the SAARC countries emphasised the need for a peaceful solution to the problem. They even went a step further, calling for the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait. The Gulf crisis had dealt a severe blow to the economies of the SAARC countries, and the leaders stressed that they needed massive international assistance to compensate the loss suffered by them due to a sharp decline in remittances, a cutback in their exports and a severe strain on their balance of payments position imposed by increased oil prices.

It seemed strange that at a time when there was widespread turmoil in the region, the heads of the seven SAARC nations should meet in an idyllic island and talk of only economic and cultural cooperation

The business of the Summit over, the leaders—Hussain Muhammad Ershad, the President of the People's Republic of Bangladesh, the King of Bhutan, Jigme Singye Wangchuck, Indian Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar, Maumoon Abdul Gayoom, the President of the Republic of Maldives, Krishna Prasad Bhattarai, the Prime Minister of Nepal, Mohammed Nawaz Sharif, the Pakistani Prime Minister and Dingiri Banda Wijetunga, Prime Minister of Sri Lanka—participated in a retreat on the picturesque island of Giraavaru. Here, the atmosphere allowed for holding informal talks on bilateral problems and initiating steps to resolve them. "These are exercises in confidence-building," said a top aide of the Pakistani PM. The talks between Chandra Shekhar and Nawaz Sharif were naturally the most crucial in the Summit—the region's tensions would ease considerably if the two countries managed to establish durable peace.

At earlier summits, India had been criticised for playing the role of Big Chandra Shekhar and Nawaz Sharif stress the need to improve Indo-Pak relations

Chandra Shekhar and Nawaz Sharif: beginning of a new era?

There was none of the excitement that marked the meeting of the young, high-profile leaders, Rajiv Gandhi and Benazir Bhutto in Islamabad at the fourth SAARC summit two years back. And yet, there was hope that Chandra Shekhar and Mohammed Nawaz Sharif will hit it off better than their predecessors.

No two leaders could be more different in terms of personality and yet both have a common interest to establish peace between India and Pakistan, which in turn, is the key to the easing of tensions in the region. The Pakistani Prime Minister is a businessman to the core, and may put economic considerations before everything else—Chandra Shekhar still clings on to his socialist image. The only common factor between the two is that both lead extremely shaky governments, which is another reason why they may not attempt something adventurous.

After ignoring each other at the opening session of the Fifth SAARC Summit, the two leaders met in Kurumbha, where the SAARC deliberations were held, and later at the Giraavaru island resort for the retreat following the Summit on 22 November. The two leaders met with aides for 45 minutes, followed by another session of 30 minutes. When asked at an informal press conference whether the talks would result in the easing of tension along the Indo-Pak border, Chandra Shekhar replied that not only would the tension decrease, they were working towards removing it completely. "The meeting was held in a cordial atmosphere," corroborated foreign secretary Shaharyar Khan. "The war clouds have finally gone away."

The two Prime Ministers decided that all the differences between the two countries would be resolved "peacefully and through dialogue". But on the contentious Kashmir issue, neither side agreed to budge an inch from their positions.

There was no specific proposal for the two Prime Ministers to meet in the near future again. "But there was no hesitation on that account. I think if you touch the right chord, the response is bound to be positive," claimed Chandra Shekhar." Everybody agrees, including Nawaz Sharif and myself, that we should not have any tension between us, and we will work towards that end."

Expressing satisfaction at the progress at the Summit, Chandra Shekhar said, "I was literally scared when I came here, but soon I felt very much at home, like part of the family."

Brother in the region. "SAARC is necessarily Indo-centric," explains Rajnikant Verma. No other country has borders with all the six countries. Obviously, Bhutan and the Maldives would have no tension with each other, since they are so far away."

In this context, Chandra Shekhar's initiative to build goodwill will go a long way in establishing peace in the region. After his rousing speech at the opening session, he decided to dump his prepared concluding address and gave an emotional extempore speech instead. He slipped into Hindi in which he was far more comfortable. Except for the Pakistanis and some of the Nepalis, other foreign delegations are unlikely to have understood the language, but the Indian leader was in his element when he spoke the language he was most fluent in. Besides, the speech—his first from an international forum—was being televised live to the audience back home. "If there were doubts that the Summit would achieve little, and that there would only be confrontation among the leaders, these have been belied," he said, stealing the show. "I did not feel I was among the people of alien nations, but among a family. We may have poverty, and fewer resources than the rest of the world, but we have the strength and goodwill of our people, and we can overcome these problems together. As I went down the streets of Malé, I could not help noticing all the smiling children. It is to these children, who are our future, that we have a responsibility. Our hearts beat as one and there should be no differences between us, only goodwill, affection and harmony. We part with this confidence," he concluded.

There couldn't have been a more emotionally-charged speech, and the message that India intended to hold out the olive branch was loud and clear. It was decided that less time would be spent in future on time-consuming protocol and formalities, and that more effective steps would be taken to implement the decisions made.

In many ways, it was Chandra Shekhar's initiative that saved the SAARC show, which began amidst apprehensions that the Summit would achieve very little. And though fewer expectations were raised than when Rajiv Gandhi and Benazir Bhutto met in Islamabad for the Fourth SAARC Summit in 1988, there may be more tangible results from this one. ●

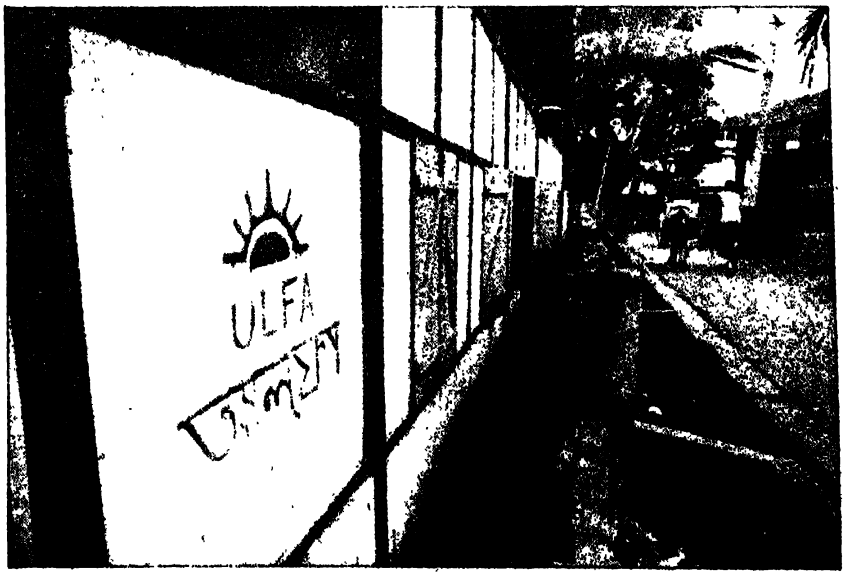
Towards anarchy

Elections or no elections, Assam is going the Punjab way

The year: 1985. The venue: Guwahati Stadium. The occasion: the swearing-in ceremony of the Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) ministry headed by Prafulla Kumar Mahanta. A capacity crowd of around 55,000 lustily cheered as Mahanta and his colleagues, who had led a violent agitation for six long years, took the oath of office. Hope was in the air.

But times have changed. And though five years may be a small time in politics, it was enough to shatter the dreams of the AGP and the people of Assam. Ironically, wherever Prafulla Mahanta goes nowadays he is greeted with black flags. And the cheers of yesteryears have turned to angry voices.



The situation in Assam today is indeed grim. Perhaps even worse than the agitation days of 1983, when the All Assam Students Union (AASU) and the All Assam Gana Sangram Parishad (AAGSP) raised the battle-cry against what they called "foreign nationals". Nowadays, the cry is one of secession with the dreaded United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA) leading the way. And with the extortion money going up by the day, the state's tea industry— which churns out about 60 per cent of the country's produce and rakes in precious foreign exchange—has taken a severe knocking. The flight of capital from the state is also alarming. As if that is not enough, the Assamese society today is divided and sub-divided along caste, ethnic and tribal lines with each community up in arms against the other. And the less said about the state's law and order situation the better. Fears Nandeswar Talukdar, secretary of the state's CPI(M) unit: "The unity of Assam is in danger."

Not just the unity, but the economy as well. If there is one industry that means a great deal to the state—in terms of revenue and employment—it is tea. But ULFA activists have virtually overrun the tea gardens in Upper Assam, intimidating senior tea executives, demanding money and even threatening them of dire consequences . All because they "haven't done enough for the development of the state". Many tea companies paid up quietly, without even informing the police. Some however, resisted. But the ULFA made its intentions clear by gunning down Surrendra Paul, owner of the Assam Frontier Tea Company near Tinsukia on 9 April. Today, no one is willing to take risks and the exodus of tea executives from the state began. In June, five senior officers of Jokai India Limited, a company having ten gardens in Dibrugarh, left Assam. Soon, the Bodo militants followed the path shown by ULFA. And on 19 October, Bodo extremists stormed the Borsola Tea Club at Tinkhora Tea Estate, near Dhekiajuli in Sonitpur district, and looted valuables from tea executives who were celebrating Diwali. Before leaving, they sprayed bullets at Jawaharlal Jain, manager of the Diroi Tea Estate, killing him on the spot. It was perhaps time for the central government to step in.

It did on 8 November when the Government of India, with the help of the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW), the Air Force, army and Indian Airlines, airlifted managerial staff and their families from the distant reaches of Upper Assam and Guwahati and flew them down to Calcutta. The state government was kept in the dark about the operation. These executives worked for Doom Dooma India Limited, Brooke Bond and Lipton (all member companies of the Unilever group) and were facing threats to their lives. The ULFA activists had actually demanded Rs 35 lakhs (Rs five lakhs from each of Doom Dooma's seven tea gardens in the state) way back in May. The deadline was to expire on 8 November. Similarly, both Brooke Bond and Lipton were asked to surrender five per cent of their net profits, which works out to a few crores. But none of the companies buckled under the threats. Instead, they decided to evacuate their senior staff from the state and suspend operations in the tea gardens. The decision has left over 40,000 labourers without jobs. The Unilever group, which even complained to the Indian high commissioner in London, justified its action on the grounds that the danger to the life of its staff in the tea gardens was enormous and the security arrangements were not foolproof.

The Doom Dooma incident had its fallout in the Guwahati Tea Auction Centre (GTAC). Over the last 20 years, the GTAC has become the largest CTC auction centre in the world. The local people have benefitted enormously from the centre, both directly and indirectly. And the

"We could have a Punjab-type situation"

If polls are not held on time, says Assam chief minister Prafulla Mahanta

SUNDAY: Do you think that elections in the state will be held on time?
Prafulla Kumar Mahanta: I think elections can be held and we have made this clear to the election commission also. We will extend all possible help for the holding of free and fair polls and are trying to mobilise public opinion to this end.

I have met Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar and former PM V.P. Singh in Delhi and told them that despite the opposition from some of the political parties in the state—Congress(I), Janata Dal and the Congress(S)—elections should be held. The democratic process should not be stopped, otherwise we could have a similar situation like Kashmir and Punjab.

Q: What about the law and order situation? Is it conducive for holding polls?
A: We have received complaints of violence from certain areas like Darrang, Dibrugarh and Lakhimpur. But we are doing our level best to set things right.

Q: Recently Rajiv Gandhi said that he is opposed to the holding of elections in the state
A: The Congress(I) is not ready for elections. Moreover, the people of Assam do not by and large support the party. Therefore, the party is not willing enough.

Q: Which are the parties in the state that are in favour of elections?
A: The left parties including the CPI(M), CPI and the RCPI prefer polls. It is the Congress(I), Janata Dal and the Congress(S) which are opposed to this. These parties have indirectly talked of imposing President's Rule in the state. What is, however, ironical is that in such an eventuality these same parties will say that it is the AGP government headed by P.K. Mahanta which is responsible for such a situation.

Q: What if there is President's Rule?
A: Things will get even worse. The law and order situation might deteriorate further. There could be more bomb blasts. Besides, people of Assam are strongly against such coercive measures.

Q: Your government is accused of having failed to contain the ULFA menace. Are you taking measures to tackle this problem?
A: Yes, both politically and administratively. We have also requested the Centre to do something to bring back the ULFA activists to mainstream politics. The members of this outfit feel that the Centre has neglected them for the past 30-40 years. They feel that the Centre has not utilised the state's resources, has not done any development work and has exploited the people. It has not even done anything to control the floods that ravages cultivation so many times a year. So, unless the Centre does anything to assuage their hurt feelings, nothing much can be achieved.

Q: There has been reports and allegations that the ULFA has links with the AGP
A: That is not correct. Besides, our ideologies are also different. But I must admit that some of the boys of the Assam agitation have [illegible]

Assam government nets in around Rs 14 crores in sales tax directly from the G TAC without even spending a rupee or employing a single hand. But the sudden withdrawal of Brooke Bond. Lipton and J.V. Gokul—these three companies buy about 50 per cent of the total offerings—has adversely affected the auction.

For example, as many as 50,000 packages of tea worth over Rs 14 crores remained unsold at the auction held on 13 and 14 November. The small tea companies can in no way fill the void created by the three giants. Though the price of tea has not really dipped —it has dropped by Rs one to Rs two per kg—the sales have. And, officials of the GTAC have informed the state government about the crisis. Explains Naresh Rajkhawa, a veteran journalist who looks after the publicity of the Assam Branch Indian Tea Association (ABITA): "Assam's economy is based on tea. But if so many packages of tea remain unsold, it could set off a chain of adverse reactions. The unsold packages will have to be taken back to the warehouses which will, in turn, raise the warehouse charges. Then, the labourers won't get their wages on time—this could be the beginning of one of the biggest threats."

Rows of empty seats at the Guwahati Tea Auction Centre: hard times

The tea personnel are not the only ones to feel panicky. The common man too feels threatened. And with reason. The ULFA had killed five people in 1987. In 1988, the death toll rose to 24 and the following year the figure stood at 28. And till August this year the ULFA had gunned down 36 people. Explains a rather defensive director general of police (DGP) B.D. Kharkwal: "We haven't given up. We are trying our best to contain the situation." But the influence of the ULFA has spread far and wide across the state. "Nowadays it is respectable to be a member of this outfit," explains the state Janata Dal chief, Golap Borbora. And at some places like Lakhimpur and Dhemaji it is the writ of the ULFA that matters. The organisation may be doing commendable developmental work in the villages like building roads and running schools, but it is their terror tactics which is isolating them from the masses. "In Upper Assam businessman used to keep their shops open till midnight. But now you will find shops closing down after sunset. It is all because of these extortion threats," says Borbora. Even the state capital, Guwahati, is not free from the ULFA joined the rebel outfit.

Q: It has been further alleged that the ULFA might have a say in the selection of AGP candidates for the forthcoming Assembly polls.
A: The ULFA activists do not believe in either the Indian Constitution or democracy. So, if they give up violence and join mainstream politics and start participating in the democratic process, it will be a good thing for all of us.

Q: What is the state of the tea industry?
A: Our problem is that these tea people did not inform us—the police or the district administration—about the ULFA threats before. It is when the ULFA has increased the extortion money that they are coming to us for help and protection, which we are giving. But it is a law and order problem and they should have informed us earlier.

Q: What about the evacuation of some top tea executives of the Unilever group from the Doom Dooma tea gardens? Consequently two of the major companies, Brooke Bond and Lipton, have stopped operations in the state which have left at least 40,000 labourers unemployed.
A: We had no knowledge of the evacuation. I think that a central agency was involved in the act. Besides, these two companies have also stopped functioning without even informing us. We have requested these companies to resume work and have also assured the industry of providing security.

Q: Is it true that you have failed to provide adequate security to the state's businessmen?
A: We provide security to those who are asking for it. But the trouble is that we can't provide security to those who do not want it.

Q: How is the morale of the state police?
A: The death of Negi (SP of Dibrugarh) was a setback for the Assam Police... Negi was a courageous officer. The state police should nevertheless work fearlessly. After all, it is their duty to protect the life and property of civilians. So, if they become conscious of their own safety, then how can they work?

Q: How do you assess your performance in the last five years?
A: We have mainly concentrated on development work. We have decentralised planning upto the subdivisional level. Construction of primary school buildings in rural areas have been another achievement. Besides, we have built village roads and tanks and opened primary health centres. But there is still room for improvement in the agricultural sector.

threat. Border Security Force (BSF) jawans have been deployed in the city's main shopping area, Fancy Bazar. The shop-owners of this area are mostly Marwaris and have been asked to contribute to the ULFA fund. Says Rajkhawa: "One day three ULFA terrorists came up to my house and asked for my rifle. But I didn't give it to them. They can't demand anything like that. Today they are asking for my rifle. Tomorrow they will want the TV and then probably my daughter ...what will I do then?" But not many people had the guts to offer resistance. They just gave them what they wanted: money, rifles or even their Maruti Gypsies—the favourite vehicle of the ULFA.

However, ULFA is not Assam's only problem. The clout of the ULFA in Upper Assam, particularly in the northern bank of the Brahmaputra, is being challenged by the tribals and the Ahoms who have set up the URMCA (United Reservation Movement Council of Assam). This outfit is slowly gearing up to take on the might of the ULFA. "The ULFA is a secret police force of the AGP government," points out Ranauj Pegu, president of the URMCA. Clashes have already taken place between the two outfits. Moveover, the Bodo tribals along with the Karbis and Missings are also arming themselves for any confrontation. What is more, Bengali Muslims, who constitute 40 per cent of the population of the state, are also collecting arms, to avoid a repeat of the 1983 massacre. So where does this all lead to: battle, elections or President's Rule?

The AGP, which did precious little during its five-year rule did achieve something tangible for the state during V.P. Singh's brief tenure as Prime Minister. A friendly National Front government conceded to certain long-standing demands like an increase in oil royalty for the state, besides promising to set up another oil refinery, two central universities and an Indian Institute of Technology (IIT) in Assam. The previous government even sanctioned a gas cracker unit. Besides, the Centre also agreed to include Assam among the Special Category States which are entitled to central funding in the ratio of 90 per cent by way of grants and ten per cent as loan. The Centre also invested substantially in the state's oil industry. But these were small gains and there was no denying the fact that the AGP's support base had withered considerably. The tribals have become vehemently anti-AGP. The various ethnic groups like the Karbis and Missings too do not view the AGP favourably.

The severe criticism of the revised voters' list by the AASU is certainly a big blow for the state government. AASU members have been constantly demanding that the people who settled in Assam between 1966 and 1971 should be detected and their voting rights scrapped for ten years (1985-1995). But AASU office-bearers are extremely unhappy with the revised voters' list prepared in February, 1990, and they believe that false documents of citizenships were accepted by the administration. Meanwhile, the Janata Dal and the Congress(S) led by former chief minister Sarat Chandra Sinha—who has a sizeable following in the state—are going all out to take on the AGP. Besides, the fall of the National Front government at the Centre has made the state Janata Dal more militant. Golap Borbora is almost unequivocal about his party's stand: "The National Front (AGP is a constituent member of the Front) cannot compel us to do anything. The law and order situation in the state is bad. And unless the AGP does something to improve this condition, elections will be held at gunpoint...There will be mass rigging." Moreover, with Rajiv Gandhi once again becoming a key figure in central politics, the state Congress(I) is also making a serious bid for power. "In between 1986 and 1990, 51 Congress workers were killed in the state. But no inquiry had been ordered because the AGP and the ULFA were behind the killings," points out the APCC(I) chief, Hiteswar Saikia.

For the average Assamese it has been a long, long story of deprivation, despair and neglect. And even today he doesn't know how to get out of the trap. ●

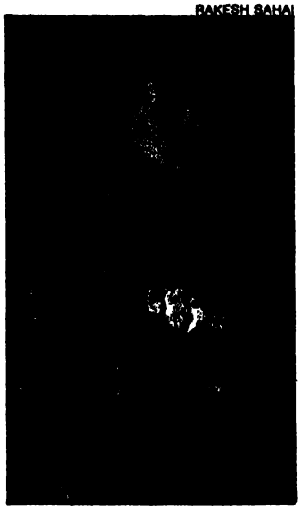
A WEEK TOO LATE



[redacted] The last time she held an exhibition, the media ignored the paintings and concentrated on the guest list. But that was when husband Satish was the Prime Minister's right-hand man.

Last month, Sterre Sharma, the attractive, unaffected, Dutch wife of the man whose swimming pool once enthralled an entire nation, held another exhibition at Bombay's Taj Art Gallery.

She had hoped that V.P. Singh would still be Prime Minister so that her work would not be seen as having benefitted from Satish's influence. Unfortunately, the government fell a week before the show opened and the good captain was once again the new heart-throb of the fat cat.

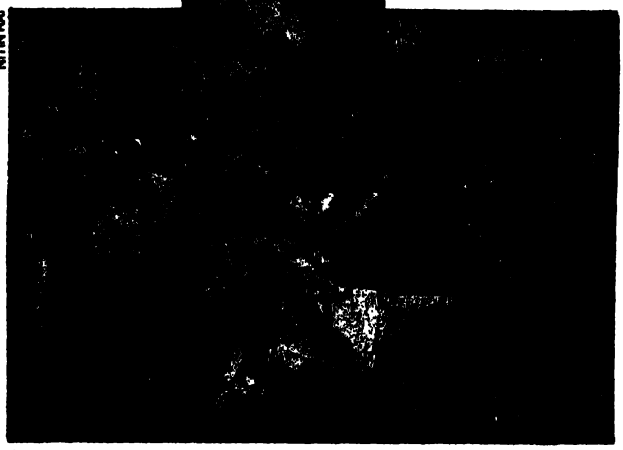
Despite the guest list, the exhibition was an artistic success, garnering good reviews from the normally cynical Bombay press and this time Sterre took no chances: she made it clear that the proceeds would go to charity, lest the papers repeat that old taunt about profiting from Satish's success. And the quality of the paintings spoke for itself.



BACK TO THE GRIND

Now that mid-term polls seem inevitable, never mind the timing, N.T. Rama Rao has begun working on his mythological magnum opus, Vishwamitra, yet again.

Last year, the National Front chairman had been gearing up towards a December release, in the hope that general elections would be held around that time, and he could build his campaign around the film. But Rajiv Gandhi took care of that one, announcing polls in November. NTR promptly put the movie on the back-burner, where it remained until recently.

But now that elections aren't too far away, or so the former Andhra Pradesh CM believes, he's resumed work on Vishwamitra. And once the film is complete, with NTR playing the sage to Meenakshi Seshadri's Menaka, it will form the cornerstone of the Telugu Desam Party's (TDP) campaign.

WE LOVE YOU, KULDIP

He's got his fair share of flak. But Kuldip Nayar will leave England in a blaze of glory, if the move to table an all-party motion in the House of Commons, lauding his performance as the Indian High Commissioner to London, works out.

The motion, expressing the appreciation of the British people for Nayar's efforts to improve Indo-British relations and his work for the Indian community in Britain, would be the first such ever moved in the Commons.

Said MP Keith Vaz, "Many members from all parties have already expressed support for the motion," adding that Nayar's resignation was a "very, very, sad decision," and a "terrible event" for the Indian community in Britain.

But unfortunately for the former envoy, Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar has his own views on the matter.

PLATINUM IS BEST

His songs play at every street corner in north India: he stars in Pop Time as the representative of Punjabi music: his albums, more often than not, break all sales records as far as the regional music market goes.

That should be enough to satisfy most people.

But Gurdas Maan is not one to rest on past laurels, even if they include two platinum discs (for Akhiyan Udeekdiyan and Mohabbat Zindabad). And he's proved that yet again with his new album, Dil Da Badshaah, released by sarod maestro Amjad Ali Khan at a function in New Delhi.

Maan has another treat in store for his fans, his forthcoming film currently under production and directed by that failed actress of Hindi cinema, Preeti Sapru.

And guess who his co-star is going to be?

"I have no desire to run the country"

Industrialist Rahul Bajaj on his aspirations, the government, his companies and the future

He does not pull his punches. He thinks straight. He is brutally frank for a businessman. And he admits his failures. Rahul Bajaj is also India's scooter—and fast-emerging motorcycle—king, presiding over an empire, that brings in Rs 1,600 crores a year in sales.

Bajaj met SUNDAY s Godfrey Pereira over two interview sessions—once in Pune, while the Raja sti!" reigned, and later in Bombay after Chandra Shekhar took over. To speak his mind about a wide range of subjects. Excerpts from the interview:

SUNDAY: What is it that you have got that puts you where you are?

Rahul Bajaj: Well...it is just hard and sincere work, with a lot of planning. In 1968, the annual turnover of Bajaj Auto was around Rs 72 million. Today, for 1989-90, the annual turnover is Rs 10,640 million. Well, its simple, really. I lead from the front. If I do not put my back and mind to a certain problem, I certainly cannot expect anyone to join me. And, I think all the time. In my mind production never stops.

Q: Did you get socked on the field because the tough guys in class considered you a sissy?

A: (Laughs) See, I went to Cathedral High School in Bombay. I was always a first class first student, always. And no one dared to 'sock' me as you put it because I was the school's boxing captain. I was pretty good in the gloves department. I had a natural talent for keeping away the knocks, watching for the other guy's guard to move and then, WHAM. I was prefect of 'Savage' house, and also was the table tennis champion. And if anybody called me a 'sissy' they certainly did it where I could not hear them (smiles).

Q: Did your late father, Kamalnayan

Bajaj, inspire you? He was a tough, no nonsense man.
A: Oh, he was tough all right What impressed me—and still does—was my father's integrity. See, he might have not been the most popular man, because he was straightforward. He simply liked to call a spade a spade. Sure, he also had a lot of friends who knew what he was all about, and they respected him for that.

Q: Did you want to get into the family business?
A: I don't think that I wanted to do anything but join the family business. At dinner it was always business talk, so I guess...well, it's like osmosis, it just seeped in. Looking back, I guess I began getting interested and involved in the family business when I was 14. And today, here I am.

Q: After you finished law college what made you want to go to Harvard University?
A: Simple. Because it is the best business school in the world.

Q: Did you have to compromise on much that you learnt at Harvard?
A: It is not a question of compromise. Where marketing is concerned, its importance is only just being felt. But here in India, a clearance form can take six months to be passed. There is nothing much you can do about that, but work hard at it and save your own time.

Q: You have had problems with the tax man. Have the government's attitude and policies hampered the growth of Bajaj Auto?
A: No, not really. I must say that I have had no problem with the government. They have been fair to me, and well, I have just been putting my head down and working.

Q: You are perceived as Mr Clean, so why the tax raids?
A: You are asking the wrong man. In 1985, V.P. Singh raided me when he was the finance minister. They got some information, which they made a complete mess of. They came to Bajaj Auto and took the register. But eventually, they could not do anything.

Q: How would you like the government to behave towards business houses?
A: We want the government off our backs. All this talk of de-regulations is just hot air. The fact is that we are regulated. See, in business, nobody is a saint, but when you have to run to the government for every little thing, then there is bound to be frustration, and this later manifests itself in various ways.

Q: How do you view the present government?
A: Which government?

Q: The government of Chandra Shekhar supported by the Congress(I).
A: (Laughs) We were talking just a couple of days before and it was a different government. Today it is Chandra Shekhar. Tomorrow, who knows? Journalists keep on changing the government.

Q: What kind of a government are you looking for?
A: I want a government that will provide stability to this government (and) country. A government that will be able to take care of the law and order problem. Which can maintain a check on the prices, and at least, keep inflation from soaring, which today is easier said than done—partly due to the Gulf crisis. And a government which, over a period of time solves problems like the Mandal Commission, Ayodhya, Punjab, Kashmir. A government which encourages growth of industry, entrepreneurship, de-regulation. That is the kind of government that I would support.

I want the poor to rise. Once they have money they have purchasing power, their lives are better, because they work for their living. And they will also be able to afford things like my scooters and motor cycles. If there is no purchasing power in the country how will I grow?

Q: Many of your contemporaries are very close to Delhi and the powers that be—to diversify, to obtain licences...
A: I cannot talk for others. They do it for their reasons. Obviously, no one does something to harm themselves. I have never had the desire or the inclination to take that road. My relationship to people in New Delhi is as good as anybody else's. When you want undue favours, you have to pay for it with undue favours. I do not want to build my business on undue favours, so I simply don't ask for these favours. And I have no desire to run the country. If I had that desire then I would run for Parliament and run for Prime Minister. But I definitely do not want to run this country as an industrialist.

As an industrialist I believe that I have the right to influence people, be they ministers or Parliament members. I think that it is justified if I think on industrial and economic policy matters—if the government is doing the right thing or, if the policies are going to harm business. But the problem is that industry is not always united. If industry were, we could influence in a big way the opinions that matter. But I am not personally (doing that). And I am not passing value judgement on others, but it is not fair (that) everybody is in a different position.

Q: Where management is concerned, how do you handle your executives?
A: I have always led by example. And let us look at it this way. Why did I decide to set up shop in Pune in the '60s? Why not Bombay? Why not New Delhi, where the powers that be sit? When I came to Akurdi in Pune, people said that I was crazy. It was deserted, and there were snakes around, plenty of them, but I had to be where my work was.

Q: Still, people wonder. With all your money why stay in a factory complex?
A: Look, I live like a top executive and not like a top industrialist. That is the Bajaj way. That is the way I was brought up. I told myself that I was not going to be an absentee landlord. I am not like many of my contemporaries. We do not believe in an ostentatious display of wealth. I do not think that is in good taste. Just look at how

"I would rather be the best than the biggest. Our aim was to be the biggest in India, which two years ago, we achieved" some of the industrialists live.

Q: Well, could you name a few?
A: Oh no! They are known to me and it will cause unnecessary trouble.

Q: Today, it is widely known that many top industrialists, many of them well known to you, have profited by leaning towards politicians.
A: What you are asking is have I ever gone to politicians for help regarding Bajaj Auto. The answer is NO. I do not need any complications and I do not want to run the country. I want to do my work, in which I am totally involved.

Earlier I had said that I do not lead a life that many of my contemporaries lead. I have never felt the need for a diversion, or hobby, or whatever. Sure, I know that I need exercise, I know that I am not getting any younger, but then there is so much of work to do. Even if I go to a party, and the conversation does not interest me, I switch off, and automatically think of work plans. For me it is an ongoing process. I have to make Bajaj Auto an international success.

Q: Where growth is concerned you have not gone through the acquisition route. The Ambanis have tried it, R.P. Goenka, Vijay Mallya and Manu Chhabria have done it.
A: I would prefer to stick to my knitting. I have a dream for Bajaj Auto, to make it number one in the world, and that is what I am concentrating on. Yes, there have been pressures to diversify, but I have stuck to my guns. The Bajaj group is a family that has over 25 businesses, but Bajaj Auto is where my energy goes, and it excites me tremendously. For me it is the flagship, and I am going to steer it to international success. We have a record of a vehicle produced every 35 seconds, and I must say that I am proud of that. My dream is to produce one million vehicles a year by 1990-91 and a turnover that will cross the Rs 10 billion mark. It is possible and I am going to do it.

GAUTAM PATOLE

"If the country is doing well, then Bajaj Auto will do well. Then obviously, Rahul Bajaj will not be doing too badly"

Q: What were the business strategies and policies that went into making Bajaj Auto what it is today? And have those policies changed with time?
A: I can give a two hour answer to this question. Well, let's see, how would I put it? Quite frankly, what goes into the making of any successful company? Team work, hard work, leadership. No one man can bring a company up, it has to be team work. And this team work, how does it come about? Good management. How does good management come about? There has to be a leader.

Q: Well, but what were the strategies used by you at Bajaj Auto?
A: Now strategies were some of the things where we have been different at Bajaj Auto from some other large groups. There are various routes by which you can reach New Delhi. I am not saying that the route that we followed is the only route. But till now, the route that Bajaj Auto has taken seems to have paid dividends. For example, we have had no diversification. With our resources, our cash flow, our profitability—for the last 20 years, for the last ten years, for the last five years, for the last two years—I can easily set up a Rs 2,000 crore petrochemical or fertilizer complex which half a dozen of the large groups are doing. They are doing a good job. And before you ask, yes maybe I am wrong in not doing it.

But at Bajaj Auto I said we will stick to our knitting, and if at all, we will expand in the motorised two and three wheeler field. If we can diversify, keeping in mind Government of India's regulations, and the market of this country, we will go into related fields. For example, like some years ago we were looking at the possibility of making cars. For various reasons it did not materialise. We were thinking of acquisitioning, sorry not acquisitioning, because I do not believe in hostile takeovers, but for buying Ashok Leyland, because it was along similar lines we made a bid (in 1987). We did not get it, so fair enough.

Q: What went wrong?
A: The government did not permit it at that time.

Q: Getting back to your work...
A: Stick to your knitting. Which means: do not diversify into unrelated fields. I would rather be the best than the biggest. So our aim was to be the biggest in India, which two years ago, fortunately we achieved. And (we are) till today. We do not know what will happen tomorrow, we hope we will retain our leadership position. Now, the dream is that in a few years we will become an international player, and we want to now diversify, not in terms of products in other fields, but with the same products we want to diversify geographically, selling to other countries. But that will take time because there are lots of problems, vis a vis cost, quality, technology.

Q: Let's get back to takeovers. Would you still rule it out, if it was not in your words, 'a hostile takeover'?
A: Well, if the owner for some reason wants to get out, if I consider it a worthwhile company to add to our group, and an amicable deal can be arrived at, I would not rule that out. But we have built our own plants, we have employed our people and that is the way we intend to grow.

Q: What do you think has made you into a manager that people talk about? And what are your weaknesses?
A: Everybody has weaknesses. People always underestimate their weaknesses. I think from the feedback that I have got, my weaknesses are that I do not delegate, I am too aggressive, I try to get people involved but maybe because of my aggressiveness I shut people off. I don't think that these are serious weaknesses, but this is what I have heard. So I am mentioning them. My over-confidence, I am told, is the third. I am sure that there are many others but you must talk to people who don't like me.

Q: What is the best way of conducting business in India?
A: See, because of the regulated economy, yes the environment is different. And these are obstacles for doing certain things that you want to do for being internationally competitive. But otherwise, where work is concerned, the aspect that must be stressed is, not making a lot of noise, certainly not being flamboyant. As I have always said, leadership is not charisma, leadership is not public relations. Leadership is performance, leadership is credit-worthiness, leadership is the bottom line. With leadership, the other factors fall into place. What use will it serve if I have great marketing strategies and my product does not measure up to the promises made? If you create a good product that is cost-worthy, backed by solid marketing and technology, I don't see how it will fail. But I can say with pride, without sounding like a saint, that we have tried to follow business ethics.

"Do I live as a poor man lives, as my grandfather lived or Gandhi lived? My answer is no. But do I live as some other rich people live? Again my answer is no "

Q: You sound a little self-righteous...
A: See, I am not here to make a confession on the one hand, and I am not here to show off on the other. And you are not trying to be clever and neither am I. For example, if somebody said are you a trustee for your wealth, in the sense (Mahatma) Gandhi said one should be, my answer is no. Do I live as a poor man lives, as my grandfather lived or Gandhi lived? My answer is no. But do I live as some other rich people live? Again, my answer is no.

Q: What path should India follow where business management is concerned? The American, Japanese or German?
A: Here, we only talk of our rights, we do not talk about our obligations and duties, and I am not trying to be a saint again, I am not a saint myself. But like John Kennedy said, 'Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country'. And that is precisely the kind of thing which we don't have. While hard work is common, technology and R and D is common to all these countries, but... we have maximum to gain from the Japanese.

Q: What about Bajaj Auto? Have you tried to incorporate the Japanese system?
A: What we are trying, and what we have not succeeded in, is the Japanese system of concensus working... I do not believe that a committee can take a major decision. Sure, committees have a role to play, but not this. You have to delegate with accountability, you have to motivate your people, you have to make your senior executives feel that they are entrepreneurs, you have to get them to work together. It is easier said than done. I must confess that they are not working together at Bajaj Auto to the extent that they should be, and that is my failure.

Q: Do you view this as one of your weaknesses, this inability to get your senior executives to work together?
A: It is not a weakness...I have some others, I don't know. We are bad people, otherwise they would not be there. But the Indians do not work together like the Japanese do. It is the Indian culture, the Indian individuality, it is the Indian tradition. It is not my failure, it is a national situation. It will take time and you are not God to do this overnight.

Q: I heard that you have not been keeping too well recently?
A: You heard? Not true. You want to go a round, or a couple of them? I was the school boxing champion, remember? Well, I had a heart problem in 1984, nothing after that, nothing before that. So what you heard is not true. The rest is up to Him (points upwards).

Q: How do you view the competition that you have been facing from Kinetic Honda scooters?
A: Not only Kinetic Honda, but also LML (Lohia Machines Ltd). The market is very very competitive and the best guy is going to win. If I have the larger market share it is left to see if we can retain it. We will be fighting our competitors with quality, technology, marketing, better designs from our R and D experts. We will give it everything that is there to give, and we will not do anything underhand, and I guess so will they. But we will give no quarter and we expect no quarter. Each will, and should, want a larger and larger share. Now for scooters, I have a 70 per cent market share, and I want a larger market share. Why not? Bajaj Kawasaki (motor cycles) which was the lowest has now reached 25 per cent where market share is concerned.

Q: Do you feel that the monopoly that you once had is now coming to an end?
A: Very beautiful question. But there was never a monopoly because there was never a single manufacturer. Others could not compete strongly, well, it is their problem. We just happen to be a little better and till yesterday our market share has not fallen.

"Sure they (his children) are interested in the family business, but first, they will have to learn the ropes at the workshop level"

Q: Considering the gas crunch, what are your plans for the future?
A: First let me make this clear. Our R and D people must be given credit for creating India's very first totally indigenous motorcycle. It was the Bajaj M50, which was later powered (up) and is now known as the Bajaj M80. Presently R and D is also working on various fuel-efficient two and three wheelers, and of course, we have the Kawasaki Bajaj KB 100. Our R and D people are busy working on various plans and designs. We have over 15,000 employees who will translate these plans into reality.

Q: Do you feel that you should step up the pace if you want to beat Honda in the auto game internationally?
A: Well, Honda spends more on R and D in one year than is possible for us right now. Their expense on R and D is more than double our annual turnover. Still, we lead the world market in three wheelers, and that is not bad.

Q: Is that the reason you began advertising in Time magazine. What was the feedback like?
A: Well, I was not looking for sales feedback. That was corporate advertising. Then at that time we were exporting to Indonesia and Japan, but the Time magazine Bajaj Auto ads were not meant to make the sales graph jump.

Q: How do you view Indian consumerism? Do you consider current trends good or bad?
A: Where I am concerned, where industry goes, bad quality and irresponsible manufacturing should be curbed.

Q: Why did you take on the chairmanship of Indian Airlines, between 1986-89?
A: Simply because they asked me.

Q: Well, I'm sure that was not the only consideration.
A: See, there were so many top industrialists around. Why did they ask me? They believed in my managerial skills, and in my ability. I am sure that many were considered, but the fact remains that they still chose me. I am not trying to sound pompous, I am simply stating what happened.

Q: What's it like living within the factory complex?
A: It is like living in a glass house. When you stay in a factory complex, you cannot have orgies. And you are there, right on the spot to tackle anything at any part of the day or night. For me there are no disadvantages. Sure, I have my privacy and I am right at the centre of everything.

Q: You have two sons and a daughter. Are they actively involved with Bajaj Auto?
A: Well, right now Rajiv, my eldest son, is coming up through the ranks. Sanjiv, my second son, is studying and so is my daughter Sunaina. Sure they are interested in the family business, but first, they will have to learn the ropes at workshop level and then move on.

Q: How do you see the future of Bajaj Auto? And what about yourself?
A: Forget myself. Well, for Bajaj Auto I see a very rosy picture, I see a tough fight ahead but then that is what good managers, good leaders are there for. If the country is doing well, then Bajaj Auto will do well. Then obviously, Rahul Bajaj will not be doing too badly. ●

ECONOMY

Walking the plank

As India moves along the path to economic hara-kiri, the new team has its hands full trying to cope

When V. P. Singh reigned, money matters were at such a low ebb that it scared the living daylights out of India. The Raja is gone, but he has left behind such a policy mess that things are going to get scarier.

The new team is in, and learning the ropes. Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar and his money men have their work cut out for them. It is unlikely that any major policy decision will be taken in the next two weeks. Ministers are still being briefed by their secretaries, lobbyists are crowding the capital- both to kowtow to the new ministers and to air their views, grievances and needs. And the economic nightmare- initiated by Rajiv Gandhi, perpetuated by V. P. Singh and exacerbated by Saddam Hussain- has yet to be absorbed by the new team.

Most of the ministers are past masters at politics, but have little or no knowledge of economics and finance. To top this, there is the ever-present scare that the PM will do a hatchet job on liberalisation and consumerism, despite his claims to the contrary. And that the Gulf crisis is going to be India's undoing.

For Chandra Shekhar and his team, it could be the worst of times, and yes, even the best of times—provided they can reverse just about anything that is wrong with economic policy-making.

Which is very unlikely. What follows is a round-up of how new equations and policies are taking shape.

Chandra Shekhar: has his work cut out for him

JAGDISH YADAV

MINISTRY OF FINANCE

You have got to hand it to finance minister Yashwant Sinha, the man works hard. He spends close to seven hours a day just getting briefed. Then, paper and political work.

Sinha will have to work harder. The deficit could touch Rs 14,000 crores, almost double of what the Raja's regime had estimated for 1990-91. Foreign exchange reserves are at Rs 3,200 crores, enough for just one month's imports. Even government officials admit that inflation is close to ten per cent, and if the Gulf crisis persists, it could go higher.

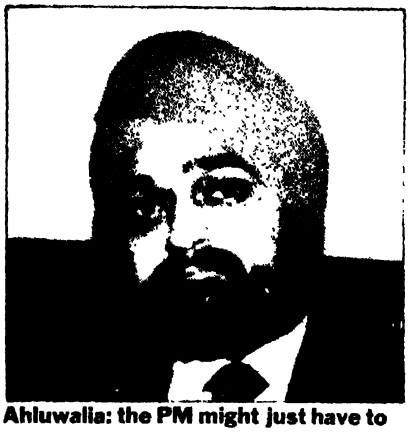
"We have to cut unnecessary expenditure," says deputy finance minister Digvijay Singh. "For example, I was looking through files and I saw that Rs 1 crore was allocated for each foundation stone-laying ceremony (for public sector enterprises). This is useless. It has to stop." He adds: "Chandra Shekharji has reduced the PM's convoy from nine cars to three. Ministers had two official cars, now they have one. We have to show by example. India's finances are in a big mess."

"We're hoping that by end-December, the Gulf situation will even out," says a senior finance ministry official, "and oil prices stabilise at US $24 a barrel." Otherwise, he adds, "Unscrambling the situation will be very difficult."

The good thing is that ministry bureaucrats feel that Yashwant Sinha is a solid man and can understand problems. And as Sinha is an ex-Indian Administrative Services officer, they can trust him (Sinha and finance secretary Bimal Jalan worked together at the industry ministry for a while).

But it will take more than trust to get the economy back on the rails.

Yashwant Sinha: challenging task ahead



While on their way to brief Sinha yet again, last week, a visitor wished Jalan and chief economic adviser Deepak Nayyar, luck. The response: wan smiles.

MINISTRY OF INDUSTRY

The PM's portfolio, and that is the problem. Chandra Shekhar is keeping his cards close to his chest and there is not a word about what will happen to former minister Ajit Singh's still-doomed new industrial policy proposals.

However, the PM has hinted that liberalisation will continue. And his right-hand man, Union commerce minister Subramaniam Swamy, has said that procedures will be simplified. Much the same as the previous government's plans. But direct foreign investment is still a grey area, and the ministry is mum about it.

The bad thing is, unless India unveils its liberalisation plan quickly, the International Monetary Fund is likely to delay its official sanction for a US

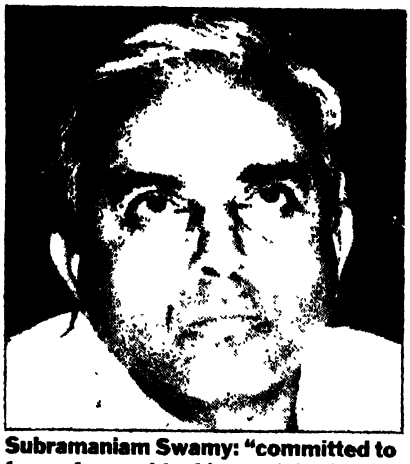
Ahluwalia: the PM might just have to follow the policies that he championed

$450 million (Rs 810 crores) contingency loan package to India. "After all," says a key government policymaker, "you have to give them some indication that you can pay them back. For that, the economy has to do well."

A bit of good news. Industry will carry on. And as SUNDAY goes to press, Montek Singh Ahluwalia, the brain behind the liberalisation moves, is still special secretary at the PM's office. And people such as industry secretary A. N. Verma still look to him for counsel.

But if the PM sacks Ahluwalia, as he has threatened to do often enough, he stands to lose a brilliant economics man, who is also experienced an amazing six years at the PMO. "Politicians say a lot of things when they are out of power," says a top ministry bureaucrat. "But when they come to power, they have to deal with realities."

This could still save Ahluwalia, though the man himself seems to have given up hope. If he manages to stay on, he could experience victory of sorts. The PM might have to follow most of the policies that Ahluwalia championed—and the PM criticised earlier. Liberalisation, privatisation, easing foreign investment norms, the works.



MINISTRY OF COMMERCE

"It seems that the previous commerce minister (Arun Nehru) did nothing at all," says Subramaniam Swamy, the latest incumbent. While that may not be true, the fact is that the trade deficit has increased. For April-September 1990, the deficit is pegged at Rs 4,233.63 crores, 35.2 per cent more than the deficit of Rs 3,130.56 crores during the same period last year.

To offset this problem, Swamy plans to initiate policies to build "export competitiveness" in India. No hard policies yet, but Swamy talks of how the government is "committed to frame forward-looking policies ...it will also be our endeavour to make our economic policy easy to understand and the direction clear."

Swamy's first test: the Uruguay round of the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs at Brussels, Belgium, from 3—7 December. "We're not going to give an inch," says Swamy. "But we're caught between a pincer. If we concede in Brussels, then we lose. And if we don't, the US hits us with Super 301 (Trade sanctions)."

For help, he may call on India's ambassador to the US Abid Hussain, who keeps in touch with US trade representative Carla Hills, the lady Swamy will take on at Brussels. Swamy is characteristically upbeat. Says he: "With my background (a PhD in economics, and ten years as a professor at Harvard University) I should be able to absorb things quickly." And hopefully, act quickly.

Subramaniam Swamy: "committed to frame forward-looking policies"

MINISTRY OF CIVIL AVIATION

"My first priority," says civil aviation minister Harmohan Dhawan, "is to get the (Airbus) A320s back in the air. They were used to evacuate people from the Gulf, and are also being used on (Indian Airlines') overseas routes."

Brave words. The thing is, it is easy to believe Dhawan. For starters, he is efficient, and makes quick decisions. Like the day last week, when a MP from Jammu & Kashmir's Kargil constituency petitioned him. The problem, says the MP, is that roads in his constituency are impassable with snow, and the region is cut off. It is normal, he tells Dhawan, for a helicopter to operate in such an emergency, but this year, nothing has been done. Dhawan immediately picks up a phone, and orders a bureaucrat that the service be started right away.

Harmohan Dhawan: his priority is to get the A320 s back in the air

Dhawan, who is as comfortable wearing a safari suit as he is in a regulation kurta-pyjama, has a disarming air about him. He still smokes Wills king size filter cigarettes—refreshing in a set-up that refuses to do without a Dunhill.

All this, however, will not help his career as a minister much. His predecessor, Arif Mohammad Khan, was efficient and disarming, too. But he could not get the A320s up in the sky. Or improve Indian Airlines' (IC) service, or Air India's overheads. Or, save Vayudoot from quicksand, and Pawan Hans, for that matter.

But Dhawan could be different. One indication: "Do you know that IC planes come back with no cargo from overseas trips?" he asks. "I asked one officer why. He told me there are no imports. Then," says Dhawan, laughing, "India must be the richest country on earth."

Another instance. "I told an Air India official," says Dhawan, "that given the choice, I would never fly Air India. I asked him to give me one reason as to why I should. The officer said 'I'll get back to you.'"

"I like things to move," says Dhawan. For his sake and the country's—long traumatised by the civil aviation mess—one hopes he can pull it off.●

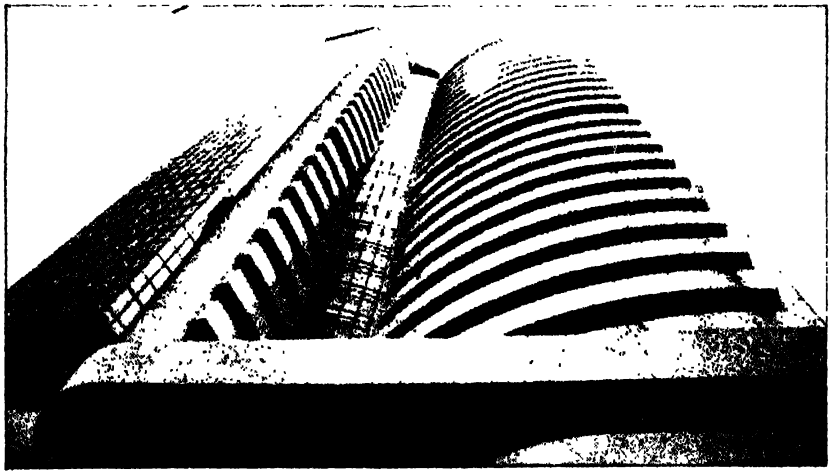
STOCK MARKETS

Now what?

The economic mess is keeping share bazaars depressed, but Reliance could help spark off a boom—again



"Reliance is going to look good, very good", says Vishwaraj Chauhan, a leading share broker at the Bombay Stock Exchange (BSE). "Look at the power of (Dhirubhai) Ambani." Adds another broker, Uday Upadhyay, "Reliance Industries Ltd (RIL) is the best bet now. The next government, as everyone knows, will be headed by Rajiv Gandhi. Ambani and Gandhi are good friends, so Reliance will continue to shoot up for at least another five years."

On 21 November, the day Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar expanded his Cabinet after considerable hedging, Dhirubhai was all anyone discussed at the BSE. There was talk about how Yashwant Sinha was made Union finance minister only after the 'great man' gave his approval. About how Larsen & Toubro (L&T) will now revert to the Ambani wing and how Nusli Wadia, chairman of Bombay Dyeing (and Dhirubhai's bugbear), was finished forever. And about clout. "Now when Ambani and Gandhi decide that Chandra Shekhar will have to go," says Chauhan, "he will go. It is that simple."

But the stock markets did not reflect the euphoria about the corporate comeback of the year. RIL shares closed for the day at Rs 206.50, lower than the Rs 235 levels in the first week of November. L&T was at Rs 126.50, a rupee lower than its price a day after the new PM was sworn in, and Bombay Dyeing was at Rs 170 per share, higher than the post-swearing in level of Rs 165. And the BSE index recorded an amazing dip of 1265.2, almost 150 points lower than its level in the first week of the month. It appeared that nothing—not the talk of "corporate democracy" being restored a la Ambani, the prospect of the market riding the RIL wave back to an 1985-like boom, a proposed Rs 570 crore issue by the house, and so on—could cheer up India's share bazaars, and if Bombay Dyeing went up, it did so of its own accord, backed by a solid corporate performance.

Because, Ambani notwithstanding the Gulf crisis, the petroleum price hikes and shortages, the inflation and utter lack of government direction for industry, are not easy to ignore. (See story on page 53.) Neither is a Cabinet that is as green or inept as they come.

And the stock markets. It has not been a very good year, despite strong half-yearly results from the corporate sector. In the beginning of 1990, there was talk of how the capital markets mop up Rs 10,000 crores plus in investment. Now, it appears that the figure could be as low as Rs 3,000 crores. But the markets will bounce back, says Harbinder Singh, stock analyst. "I feel that Sinha can do no harm," he says. "We have had a great monsoon and if the political climate does not produce a storm, the market will even out."

The Bombay Stock Exchange: it did not reflect the euphoria about Reliance—the 'corporate comeback of the year'

On the tenth floor of the BSE, a bunch of top stock brokers and analysts meets informally to review the situation. "I have nothing against Yashwant Sinha being made finance minister," says Chamanbhai Patel, a respected long-time broker. "But the problem is the government. You must remember that Devi Lal is deputy PM once again." He adds: "I do not think Sinha will want to interfere with business houses, because if they do so right now, with the oil crisis, then it will be bad for their (the government's) business. But who is to say what will happen tomorrow? Before Sinha has the time to formulate progressive policies, he and his government could be out of power. This caretaker government is bad for business."

It may be, already. The lull at the BSE lasted three days, before prices and indexes began moving up. RIL had inched up to Rs 207 a share on 23 November, and Bombay Dyeing was at Rs 182.50. And the BSE index touched 1304.5. And L&T, spurred on by purchases estimated at two lakh shares—"knowledgeable circle purchases", as the trade calls it, an euphemism for the Ambanis grabbing whatever L&T shares they can get—gained Rs 30, to close at Rs 150 a share. ●

■ Ice him?

National Dairy Development Board (NDDB) chief Verghese Kurien could have another interest group gunning for him soon: the ice-cream lobby.

The oil barons of Gujarat are livid that Kurien is marketing edible oil, and have tried to bump him off (see SUNDAY 11–17 November, 1990). And if he starts selling ice-cream—which could be as soon as spring 1991, then it will be another battle joined. Actually, it has already started. For the past few months, lobbyists in New Delhi have been saying what a nasty man Kurien is, and how he plans to corner the market by keeping all the milk for the NDDB ice-cream, cutting back supplies to private ice-cream makers. This should certainly hurt Kwality, Vadilal, Go Cool and Dollops—made by Cadbury India—and all are top brand names. The ice-cream manufacturers are trying to strike deals with various state governments, goes the grapevine, in a bid to bypass Kurien. It may not work: ask the oil barons.

■ The lost lady

It appears that Jaya Jaitley is taking her new job as chairperson of the National Institute of Design (NID) seriously. Or trying to. The lady—better known for promoting Gurjari (the Gujarat government's handicrafts effort), slamming Mrinalini Sarabhai, defending George Fernandes and the Mandal Commission report—made her way down to the ministry of industry (MOI) last week. (Ahmedabad-based NID takes its orders from the MOI, and has strong links with Indian industry.) Only, Jaitley had no clue about where exactly the ministry was located. She was striding into commerce minister Subramaniam Swamy's lair at Udyog Bhavan, when a couple of cops showed her the correct way, to the next block.

Only if former industry minister Ajit Singh was as circumspect. He could have appointed someone who does know his/her way around, in Delhi and at NID, instead of someone whose direction has been questioned. Ask NID officials: they are plainly scared to get someone like Jaitley, when they are used to dealing with clear-thinking bureaucrats. Otima Bordia, for one.

Rajan Pillai and Rajan Jetley: crack team

■ R&R

The two Rajans were in New Delhi last week. Rajan Pillai, chairman of Britannia Industries Ltd and the overlord of a US $400 million (Rs 720 crores) corporate empire. And Rajan Jetley—former Air India boss and currently, Pillai's live-wire point man in Singapore—presumably, to say hello to the new government and plumb the future.

Which looks good. Pillai is respected in government circles, and as far as Jetley is concerned, there is a bit of awe. The first Rajan is a level-headed, non-resident Indian with money to spend. The latter's connections have always been fantastic, and the way events seem to be leading in Delhi, these are expected to remain fantastic. In the next five years, Rajan & Rajan are likely to oversee major corporate expansions, both in south-east Asia and—especially—in India. ●

EVENT OF THE WEEK

Withdrawing the diesel supply cuts

●A temporary measure, at best. Because, even as the new government reverses a decision imposed by the previous one, it does so without a clue about what to do next. Yes, freer availability of diesel will help transportation of products and people, cut back hoarding and blackmarketeering in diesel and reduce inflation—though very marginally and very locally. But withdrawing cuts also means more imports. And the way things stand now, if India imports enough crude petroleum to satisfy demand, then it can't import much else. Not enough money. The choices? One: reimpose diesel cuts. Two: supply diesel but cut petrol supplies by more than the present 20 per cent. Three: freely supply both and pull the plug on India. And four: tell Iraqi President Saddam Hussein what a nice man he is, and could he please, please pull out of Kuwait?

Subramaniam Swamy is accused of misusing party funds

He had been in office for just two days. But that was time enough for a scandal to hit Union commerce, law and justice minister Subramaniam Swamy.

In its 24 November issue, Current, a weekly newspaper published from Bombay, front-paged an article accusing Swamy of political deal-making and raking in crores of rupees in the bargain. Current also published photostat copies of two bank draft receipts, one for Rs 45 lakhs and the other for Rs 10 lakhs—and Swamy's signatures are on both. "Both drafts were obtained after paying hard cash over the counter," accused Current. "Let Swamy deny it!"

"I don't deny it," retorts Swamy, leaning back on a sofa in his offices at the commerce ministry. "The photostats deal with the money that I transferred from the Delhi account of the Janata Party to the Bangalore account of the Janata Party last year, during the Lok Sabha election period." He adds: "This money was meant for Mr Deve Gowda (he was the Janata Party chief in Karnataka), who was at that time leading our election campaign in the state (Karnataka). The money went to Deve Gowda in Bangalore."

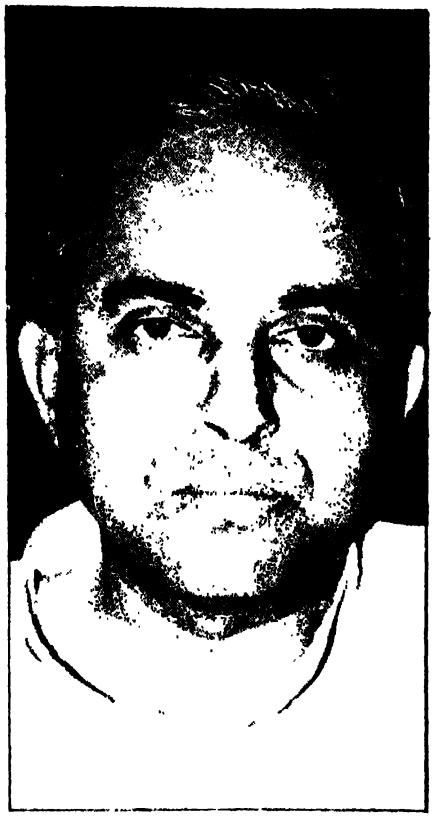
The dates on the drafts—the one for Rs 45 lakhs is dated 15 November, 1989, and the other, for Rs 10 lakhs is dated 23 November, 1989—drawn on Vijaya Bank's Barakhamba Road branch in New Delhi, checks out Swamy's assertion. But Current is adamant that something is fishy about the drafts.

The article also mentions that Swamy, a former professor of economics at Harvard University, purchased yet another draft on 30 November, this time for Rs 15.09 lakhs. Current goes on to say how the directorate of revenue intelligence sleuths, who were tracking the transactions, have suspended their enquiry now that Swamy is a minister.

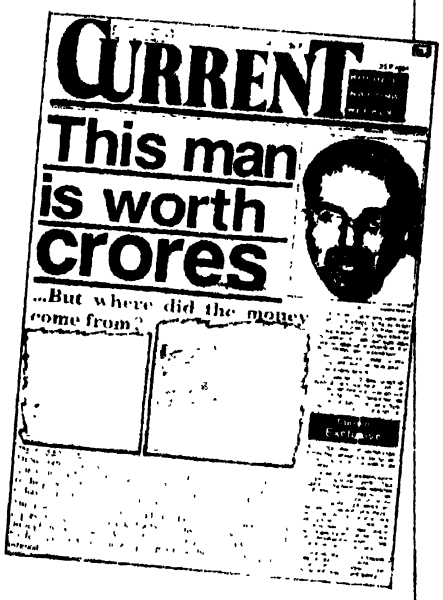
In addition, the article quotes Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar as saying: "Money morality is only important in the jargon of hypocrites. All of us in politics are getting money which is black money."

"Almost all political parties and politicians do transactions in cash," says Swamy, "and no records are ever maintained. But as soon as I became the working president of the Janata Party and chairman of its parliamentary board, I imposed a rule that funding of party expenses must be done through bank accounts."

There are advantages of following this practice, says Swamy. "One, records are maintained of how much money is sent to which account. Two, it makes it unnecessary to carry money in suitcases in a clandestine manner." He added: "Look, if I wanted to salt away money, I wouldn't put it in a bank. I would put it in a suitcase."



Current mentions that the PM and Swamy are friends of godman Chandraswamy and international arms dealer Adnan Khashoggi. (On another page, there is a picture of Swamy garlanding Khashoggi on the dealer's birthday.)



"Shekhar may defend the use of unaccounted wealth," says the Current article which, incidentally, is without a by-line, "but he and his Sancho Panza must answer who has made such huge sums of money available to them."

"According to the law," says Swamy, "political parties do not have to declare where their donations come from." He adds: "I have not even bothered to reply to the article."

The way things are, Current's accusations and Swamy's retorts, are perhaps, just the beginning of an extended brawl. Whatever one may say of Swamy, one thing is certain: controversy has a way of finding the man. And now, the minister. ●

A singular talent

A collection of Dhiren Bhagat's writings evokes memories

I remember giving Dhiren Bhagat his first column. It was 1979, Bombay magazine had just been launched and as managing editor I sought to introduce a Diary page, modelled perhaps on The Spectator or New Statesman diaries. Nobody in Bombay could understand what I meant when along came Dhiren, an old friend from school and university.

Could he do the first Diary? I asked. He agreed at once and then took a month to deliver (so Barota Malhoutra launched the column). But when the piece came in, it was exactly the sort of Diary I had imagined.

Then, we got down to brass tacks. Editing his copy I discovered that he preferred the archaic usage: "I telephoned to him." Given that Bombay was a modish magazine, I asked if I could delete the 'to'.

"No," said Dhiren.

"But you always say, 'I telephoned him'," I pointed out. "What difference does 'to' make?"

"It makes a difference," said Dhiren. "It is how I would like to write."

He won that battle.

Then there was the small matter of the picture to go with the Diary. "I'll get Gautam Patole to take one," I told him.

"No," said Dhiren.

I was surprised.

"I'm sure he'll use Maharashtrian colours," he snorted.

I informed him that the picture would be in black and white.

"Never mind," he responded. "I'll give you one that somebody in London took."

The next day he turned up with this wonderful picture of a foppish man with a dreamy expression.

"It's a terrific picture," I said. "Who is it?"

He stared at me as though I was an imbecile. "It's me," he said.

"No, it isn't," I countered. "You look nothing like the man in the picture."

"If you want to use a photo," he said agitatedly, "that is the one you'll have to use."

I gave in.

GAUTAM PATOLE

In 1983, Dhiren was back in Bombay. Four years ago, he had been pleased with the column but now he dismissed Bombay as a 'socialite register' and said that he thought journalism was a waste of time and effort. He pointed to the Diary column in Bombay and noted that it had degenerated into a series of ghost-written celebrity-pretends-to-be-honest pieces soon after his article had appeared.

He was right, of course, but I was a little taken aback when he added in the next breath that he wanted to write regularly for Imprint to which I had moved from Bombay. He had already been promised a column by Vinod Mehta at The Sunday Observer, then Bombay's hottest new publication and had visions of being the star-writer on The Illustrated Weekly, soon to be relaunched by an old friend of his called Pritish Nandy.

He was 26.

I was slightly astonished by his chutzpah. It took nerve to bad-mouth all of us and then expect the top slots on all our publications.

Who was Dhiren Bhagat, anyway?

But I published him nearly every month.

Vinod Mehta gave him a regular slot and treated him as the Observer's star.

And Pritish Nandy gave him carte blanche to do whatever he wanted at the new avatar of the Weekly.

By the time he was 27, he was the rising star of Indian journalism

By 28, he was being chased by London's The Spectator.

By 29, he was one of India's top columnists.

By 30, he was hired by London's The Observer as New Delhi correspondent as part of a cushy deal whereby he got a lot of money and wrote little.

By 31, he was breaking story after story in the Indian and international media.

Three months after he turned 31, he was dead.

Dhiren Bhagat was comfortable being himself. He made no compromises as a human being, and as this collection demonstrates, as a journalist either

It was two years ago, last week, that Dhiren crashed his Maruti Gypsy on New Delhi's Willingdon Crescent. To mark that anniversary Penguin India (in the person of David Davidar, whose idea it was) has published The Contemporary Conservative—Selected Writings Of Dhiren Bhagat. (Hardback. Viking Imprint. Rs 175). Edited with great pains and much affection by Salman Khurshid, one of Dhiren's Oxford mentors, it collects the best of his journalism, some poetry and a little fiction.

Those who did not know Dhiren may find themselves asking a variation of the questions I asked in 1983; who was Dhiren Bhagat, anyway? Why should a journalist who died when he was only 31, and who wrote for only five years have his articles collected in such a handsome volume?

The Contemporary Conservative should answer that question. It doesn't include that first Bombay magazine Diary but it shows how, by 1983, Dhiren was already writing differently. There was no more archaic usage and the battle over the photograph had been resolved. (He used it for his Sunday Observer column and then had second thoughts after it attracted offensive letters to the editor. Two years later he let Gautam Patole photograph him; a picture from that session appears on the cover of The Contemporary Conservative.)

Instead he focussed on challenging the conventional wisdom. In his early columns, he claimed that Midnight's Children was overpraised (for which Salman Rushdie never forgave him), that Arun Shourie wrote unreadable prose ("If Shourie really wants an aqueous metaphor I suggest he pull the flush and let the water flow through his muddled brains"), that Khushwant Singh was an old bore who made up stories about his sexual exploits (Khushwant loved the piece so much that Dhiren soon became a protege!) and that the Rajni Kothari-kind of intellectual thrived on humbug and cant ("The same old mumbo-jumbo: polity, criminalisation, lumpenisation, systemic features, polity").

Nandy used him as star inquisitor. The first issue of the new Weekly carried one of Dhiren's most successful interviews, a comprehensive hatchet job on Maneka Gandhi that Nandy loved so much (such is irony) that he let Dhiren do pretty much what he wanted after that. Coup followed coup: Charan Singh, N.T. Rama Rao and Bhindranwale all got the Bhagat treatment.

By then, he was into the big-time. Mani Shankar Aiyar put him on Rajiv Gandhi's plane and he asked the then Prime Minister questions that nobody had dared put to him. (A sample Bhagat: "May I ask what class you got at Cambridge?" Rajiv: "Zero, flunked out.")

The interview was meant for The Spectator but when a transcript appeared in The Sunday Observer, Mani Shankar Aiyar was livid. Bhagat retaliated by lampooning him in Private Eye, the British satirical magazine. The two became implacable enemies after that. Then two weeks before Dhiren died, they made up at a party. The reason was simple enough. Bhagat got into an argument with G. Parthasarathy, Mani's successor as Rajiv's press aide and after Parthasarathy had impugned his patriotism ("You bloody Oxford-Cambridge types have no stake in India," to which Bhagat retorted, "Does that include Rajiv?"), Dhiren decided to make common cause with Aiyar.

By 1988 when Dhiren started a column for me at SUNDAY (well represented in this collection), he had shifted to Delhi at the London Observer's expense and begun to make his presence felt in political circles. Mohan Katre, then director of the Central Bureau of Investigation gave him a copy of the draft of Zail Singh's letter to Rajiv Gandhi. The draft included handwritten corrections by the Indian Express' S Mulgaokar. Bhagat used the document to raise questions about the role of the Express and got into a scrap with the paper that continued till his death. (When Suman Dubey resigned as the editor, Dhiren wrote him a letter. "I must congratulate you for doing a brave and principled thing. The Express is no longer a newspaper, it is a partisan pamphlet.")

The Mulgaokar story made Bhagat a hero to the Congress but as Vinod Mehta notes in his perceptive introduction to The Contemporary Conservative, Congressmen were quick to call him a traitor when he later revealed that RAW was importing rocket launchers that it might be planting on Sikh terrorists.

He followed this up with another scoop: the admission by Mani Dixit, then India's high commissioner to Sri Lanka, that the Tamil Tigers had been paid off by the Indian government to support the India-Sri Lanka accord. ("In my experience," Dhiren said later, "anybody called Mani who is a member of the Foreign Service is indiscreet.")

He had come a long way from that day in 1979 when we had argued about archaic usage and the choice of photographs. Since entering journalism full-time in 1983, he had risen effortlessly to the top.

Many people offered him jobs (he spent a week in Hyderabad being courted by Ramoji Rao once) but he never accepted employment arguing that to do so would be to lose his independence.

Despite the handicap of not having a paper to back him, he was rarely turned away by the mighty and always came back from assignments with a scoop that everyone else has missed.

In it's obituary, the London Observer called him "one of nature's self-made originals". It is a description that captures the essence of Bhagat's charm. He was comfortable being himself. In earthy political gatherings, he would speak his Oxford-accented English and make no attempt to talk down to others. At upmarket cocktail parties, he would come in kurta-churidar, drink only nimbu-pani (he drank no alcohol, did not smoke and was a vegetarian) and hold forth in Punjabi.

He made no compromises as a human being. And as this collection of his writings demonstrates, he made no compromises as a journalist either. •

Rekha presents her side of the story

If the marriage had shocked an entire nation, the suicide left everyone aghast. It was only seven months since film star Rekha had wed Delhi-based industrialist (Fusebase, Hotline) Mukesh Aggarwal in a secret ceremony. And followed it up with a flurry of interviews to every film magazine worth its gloss on her new-found marital bliss ("the grass in greener" etc) with proud husband beaming happily in the background.

This was in March.

On 2 October, Mukesh Aggarwal, who'd been hard-put to contain his glee only months ago at having obtained the woman of his dreams, was found hanging from the ceiling of his Mehrauli farmhouse, Basera, his wife's dupatta serving as his noose.

Why had the dream soured so soon? What went wrong with the Mukesh-Rekha marriage? Why had the star's husband chosen such a drastic way out of what had clearly become an untenable situation?

As such questions did the rounds, most people seemed to accept that the actress had been, in one way or the other, responsible for the tragedy. As Mukesh's friends and family censured the widow ("Hamare bhai ko kha gaye", "Rekha gaye chulhe main, mere bhai ko das liya") for driving Aggarwal to the brink, the media joined in the orgy of condemnation. While film glossies went to town (some even slightly over the top) with the story, even the mainstream media highlighted instances of the actress's alleged high-handedness.

The story of Mukesh's last trip to Bombay was pulled out to pillory Rekha. Hadn't the besotted man gone to visit his estranged wife in the hope of effecting a reconciliation? Hadn't she thrown him out of her house? And hadn't he dealt with that rejection by taking an overdose of sleeping pills? He'd been saved that time, but that sort of incident was bound to recur given the relationship between the couple. And, sure enough, it had, with predictably tragic consequences.

At the time of Mukesh's death, the actress was in New York, in connection with a stage-show. The news of her husband's suicide was relayed to Rekha, but alleged Mukesh's elder brother Anil Gupta (see Sunday dated 14 - 20 October 1990) the star didn't even send a message of condolence. "All we want is a sorry from her," said Gupta, "but even that hasn't come."

Instead, Rekha remained incommunicado, refusing to speak to the press or the family. From New York she flew off to London to spend a couple of weeks without responding ing to the charges which had her out as the vamp of the piece.

It was a month before the actress hit back at those who had declared her guilty in absentia. First, came a libel suit (see Spotlight dated 25 November–1 December 1990) against Cine Blitz for its cover story on her husband's suicide. And soon Rekha was giving a spate of interview about how much her heart had "fluttered in the last few weeks" and proclaiming: "I'll fight this scandal. Fight it till the last drop of my blood. For nothing and no one can be more important than my self-respect."

As the actress presented her side of the story, it became rapidly clear that the two versions (Rekha's and the Aggarwal family's) were irreconcilable. The much-maligned star's defence:

Mukesh's Bombay visit

The charge: Having decided soon after the marriage that things were not likely to work between her and Mukesh, Rekha informed her husband that she wanted out. Aggarwal tried to talk her into changing her mind, but the actress refused to take his calls. In a last-ditch effort, he arrived in Bombay, sister-in-law in tow, to see his wife.

But Rekha locked him out of her house. Mukesh was reduced to running after her car as she made off for her shooting. In a fit of despair, he took an overdose of sleeping pills and had to be rushed to hospital. He was saved, but took a long time coming out of the depression.

The defence: When Mukesh decided to come to Bombay, the couple had already been having major disagreements. So, to obviate the possibility of unpleasant scenes, Rekha decided to check into a hotel during his stay, while Mukesh and his sister-in-law stayed at her house. Says the actress: "My being there would have given him false hopes. I saw no point in leading him on."

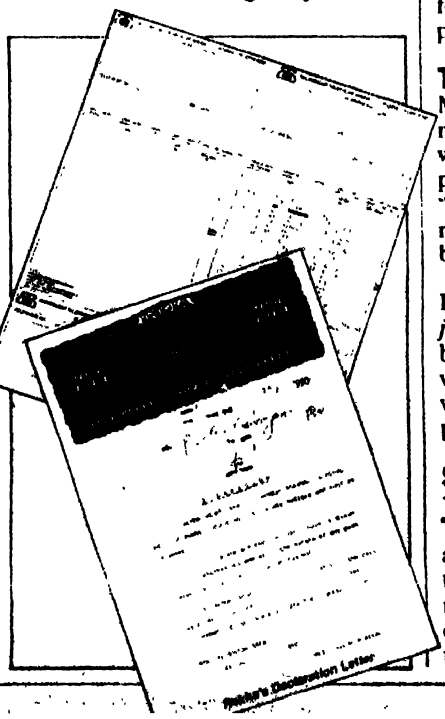
About his running after the car, Rekha asks: "I was never at home during his stay, so whose car would he have been running after?" Also if reconciliation was on his mind, asks the actress, "why did he carry 60 Calmpose pills and a ready suicide note in his pocket? Didn't he for a moment think of the danger this could lead me to?"

Indifference/High-handedness

The charge: Once Rekha had made up her mind that the marriage was off, she cut Mukesh out of her life completely. Whenever her husband called from Delhi he would be fobbed off by her secretary Farzana with the usual excuses ("Madam is in the bath", "Madam has gone for shooting"). Aggarwal died believing that things would have worked out if he'd been allowed to speak to his wife.

After his death, Rekha was informed almost immediately. But leave aside attending the funeral, she didn't even call the family to condole them.

The defence: Let alone refusing to take his calls, the actress insists she'd "called every day. Yeah, till the day I left for my show". According to Rekha, the last conversation took place in his office, when the couple accepted that a split was inevitable. For the benefit of disbelievers, the actress presents her telephone bill (see photostat) with calls listed to Mukesh's Delhi number.



Yes, admits Rekha, she had been informed about her husband's death, but there was no way she could have made it to the funeral. No it wasn't just the time factor, the organisors of the show she's backed out of were suing her for damages and she couldn't leave America until the case was settled. But she had called Delhi and spoken to Mukesh's sister-in-law, Mitto bhabhi, who advised her: "Jo theek samjho woh karo. Hame tumse koi shikayat nahin, tum apna dhyan rakhna. (Do whatever you think is right. We don't attach any blame to you. Look after yourself.)"

The sudden volte-face executed by the family, says Rekha, has left her totally perplexed.

While Mukesh's family and friends berated Rekha for not attending the funeral, the actress claimed that she'd been unable to leave America because of a law suit

Photocopies of Rekha's divorce petition and telephone bills: no, she had no claims on his property and she called him regularly

Divorce papers

The charge: It had taken Mukesh a while to recover from his abortive suicide attempt (during his Bombay visit). And just when he seemed to be on the road to recovery, his wife served him with the divorce papers. According to Aggarwal's elder brother, Anil Gupta: "I tried to hide them from him for a while. But he found out." And that was what finally pushed him over the edge

The defence: Once she and Mukesh had decided on a divorce by mutual consent, Rekha maintains she was in no hurry to initiate divorce proceedings. "We thought," she says, "we would wait until I came back from my shows on 10 October, my birthday."

But Anil Gupta called her from Delhi to insist: "Hame ek taraf karke jao. (Finish your dealings with us before you go.)" Says the actress: "I was too dumbfounded to reason it out with him." And so, she despatched the papers before she left for America.

Suicidal tendencies

The charge: The Aggarwal family and Mukesh's numerous friends insist that too much is made of the dead man's suicidal tendencies. Anil Gupta clarified that his brother hadn't tried to kill himself after his girlfriend Kitty

Malhan ditched him. "He just thrown something at the TV set out of sheer frustration," said Gupta, "and a splinter came and slashed his wrist. So everyone assumed that he'd tried to commit suicide."
It was only after he met and married Rekha that he became suicidal. And what better proof of that than the fact that he'd used her dupatta to hang himself.

The defence: Aggarwal had tried to commit suicide as many as seven times before. And not every attempt occured after his marriage. Also, there was no reason to presume that the dupatta he'd hung himself with belonged to the actress, merely because the family said so.

Mukesh's will

The charge: Public opinion had it that the actress had married for money. And now that he was dead, she would inherit his property. Even if she wasn't mentioned in the will, said Rekha's detracters, she still had rights as a wife, th. divorce not having come through.

The defence: According to the actress, her divorce petition (see photostat) makes it clear that she had no interest in or claims on her husband's property. Despite this, says Rekha, her in-laws asked her to sign a declaration renouncing her claims. "Don't they know," she said, "that such declarations cannot be sent for signature without appropriate accompanying documents such as the post-mortem reports and the deceased's will?"

Farzana

The charge: Rekha is a completely changed person in her secretary's presence. So much in thrall of Farzana is the actress that she falls in line with whatever the latter says. Farzana was never happy with "Madam's decision to marry, and made no secret of her animus against Mukesh. She often failed to relay messages and refused pointblank to call Rekha to the phone when Mukesh wished to speak to her. According to Anil Gupta: "She and Rekha stay together, sleep together. Rekha has a char anne ka dimag. Farzana controls her completely."

The defence: Says Rekha: "Anilbhai couldn't be further from the truth, for I take sole responsibility for my actions and am solely responsible for my decisions."

Soon after the wedding Rekha gave a series of interviews on her new-found marital bliss, with Mukesh beaming proudly in the background. But seven months later Mukesh was dead, and Rekha an object of national hate

Such is the actress's fury at the unsavoury allegations about the nature of her relationship with Farzana that she has sued a film magazine for Rs 1 crore for its cover story, which mentioned the same.

Akash Bajaj:

The charge: Rekha discovered soon after the wedding that Mukesh had an on-going affair with his business associate and friend Akash Bajaj, a psychotherapist. Calling him on his private number at the farmhouse, Rekha was horrified to hear Akash's voice at the other end. The actress served her husband with an ultimatum: it was either Bajaj or her. If he wanted the marriage to continue he had to stop seeing Akash.

The defence: Aggarwal stopped seeing Akash after he got married. A month after the wedding, however, Akash's mother died. And Rekha prevailed upon a reluctant Mukesh to go over and condole with his friend. Asks the actress: "Why would I want to break two friends?"

Recreating Mukesh

The charge: Having married Aggarwal, Rekha realised that he wasn't really her idea of an ideal husband: he was much too fat, smoked too much and dressed all wrong. He had to change, the star decided. So, the hapless Mukesh was forced to give up smoking, go jogging every morning, and change his wardrobe.

The defence: None. Rekha admits that Mukesh jogged every morning and gave up smoking. But not under duress. "He did it to prove something to me. And what's wrong with making my husband health-conscious and preventing him from taking pills?" she asks.

While the actress systematically demolished every charge levelled against her, the Aggarwals held their peace. When contacted by SUNDAY, the family refused to comment on the actress's rejoinder until Mukesh's will was probated, for fear of further complicating matters.

For the moment at least, then, Rekha has the last word on the subject. But we haven't heard the last on the Rekha-Mukesh affair, though. And with time, the story promises to get even more bizarre. ●

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

The Saffron Swastika

There are frightening parallels between Hitler's Nazis and the BJP

I don't know what good the Toyota yatra did for Ram but it certainly did a pile of electoral good for Advani. Never before has the kesri jhanda fluttered in as many electoral hearts as it is doing now. And the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) is busy fixing 6 December as the next rung of the BJP's vertiginous ascent to the top of the ladder. The date is significant—but, perhaps, for a reason not quite known to the stormtroopers of our homegrown Fuehrer. For 6 December will also see the commencement of the Golden Jubilee year of the day Admiral Tojo of the Land of Toyota, the Minister of War of Imperial Japan—that is, the Bajrang Dal to Hitler's BJP—launched the attack on the American naval base of Pearl Harbour in Hawaii which brought the United States into the World War, thus converting the localised confrontation in the European theatre and its colonial extensions—into the Second World War.

What is bringing December 1990 on us is much the same as brought 6 December 1941 on the world: the easy victories of the forces of fascism in early skirmishes against the secular democracies, which convinced the fascists that, provided only they remained on the offensive, their eventual victory over reason and good sense would be assured.

Tragically, far too few of us are disposed to learn any lessons from history. The editor of one of our most widely-circulated Urdu newspapers—himself a Muslim and, therefore, somewhat in the position of a Jew in the Weimar Republic that preceded Hitler's Third Reich—who publishes much of what I write, regretted to me a few months ago his inability to carry a previous column of mine on this theme saying that his readers would get bored to tears with some distant happening in distant times in some distant land. Could I not, therefore, give him something more spiced with contemporary murch-masala? "Like what?" I asked. "Misal ke taur par, mandir-masjid ka waad-wiwaad," he replied ("For example, the mandir-masjid controversy.") But, I protested, I had brought in the story of Hitler setting out from Berchtesgaden for Berlin only because Advani was threatening to set out from Somnath for Ayodhya. The Urdu editor was unconvinced. So here goes again.

The kar sevaks were in Ayodhya not to build a mandir to Lord Ram but to break the law and avenge themselves on Islam

In the last days of the First World War, the old Hohenzollern monarchy of the German Empire was dismantled and Germany encouraged and assisted to build itself up as a modern republican democracy. The Constitution adopted in 1919, a few weeks after the Treaty of Versailles, in the small German town of Weimar (from which the new Republic derived its name) was considered a model of its time. Despite the vicissitudes of post-war reconstruction, Germany, under the leadership of such outstanding democratic statesmen as Gustav Stresemann—a man remarkably like Nehru in his commitment to democracy and his opposition to majority communalism—the Weimar Republic secured its frontiers, forged for itself a new identity, grew enormously in international stature, and set itself up as a wise and tolerant society that, having learnt much from its past mistakes, would not countenance foul-mouthed attacks by the country's lunatic fringe on the country's Jewish minority. Hitler's National Socialist Party (the Nazis), campaigning on a platform of "Appeasement for None; Justice for All" secured in the elections of 1928 and 1930 just about the same percentage of votes as did the Jan Sangh/BJP between 1952 and 1989. If in 1929 anyone had suggested that within 1000 days, Hitler would become chancellor of Germany, he would have been

Thus spake the siyasi sanyasin

• "Let those who have been hatching conspiracies to prevent the establishment of Ram in this country, from the time of Mohammad Bin Qasim to Mohammad Ali Jinnah, not be misled into thinking that the Hindus are impotent cowards because they have suffered years of slavery. They are not. They are the descendants of brave and courageous forefathers."

• "Chandra Shekhar says that if the Hindus wish to build the temple, they can build it at another site. I say to Chandra Shekhar: all right, I will change the site—but tell me are you ready to change your father?!"

• "Our motherland cries out for succour, cries out for martyrs who will cut the enemies of the nation to pieces. We have no need of any Buta Singh or Joota Singh. What our country demands is men of character, men of iron who understand that freedom is only freedom when that freedom is placed at the feet of the Lord of Somnath."

• "We tell our Muslim brothers to remember the poets Rahim and Raskhan who devoted themselves to the quest for the dust of the feet of Lord Ram...We cannot suffer any more the descendants of Babar, all those who join Babar to their names, who join Babar to themselves, those cowards, those impotent men who flee the field of battle, who attach themselves to that Aurangzeb, that Babar who raised the sword of oppression in this country, who by force disseminated, propagated and spread Islam in this country, and who now proclaim with pride that they are Muslims."

• "In Hindu culture, if a Kansa is born among us, the Lord Himself comes down to earth to separate his head from his body. We do not take the name of Ravana or Kansa with pride. But you proclaim with pride the name of Babar, the name of Aurangzeb... This is why within this country, however many songs Mahatma Gandhi might have sung about Hindus and Muslims being brothers, such fraternity has never been established."

• "So that Hindu and Muslim might live together in this country as brothers, we even called that Akbar Great which evil-minded, sinful Akbar put up a Meena Bazar in Agra to demonstrate his disrespect for Hindu society. Despite all our sacrifices, even unto the dismemberment of our Mother's limbs, we who have done all we could to maintain fraternal goodwill, we it is who are accused of being communal!"

• "When we raise the issue of the Ram Janmabhoomi, we are accused of playing politics, of seeking votes. Arrey, we are sadhus and mahatmas who, seated on the throne of the sages, are monarchs already of the Universe. We do not seek power in Delhi. We seek Ram. We seek the Ram Janmabhoomi."

• "Mulayam Singh Yadav can trust the Provincial Armed Constabulary no longer. For even though they wear the uniform of the PAC, in their breasts beats a Hindu heart."

• "Mulayam Singh says that he will pit one section of our society against another, but the 30th October will show whether Mulayam Singh's schemes will succeed. Then you will know whether this site is the Ram Janmabhoomi or the Babri Masjid. Then you, Mulayam Singh, will discover that on the chest of every Ali will leap ten Bajrang Balis!"

• "The truth is that it is the Hindus who are suffering injustice and true is it also that he who inflicts injustice is not so great a sinner as he who suffers injustice. Therefore, to fight against this injustice, let us join together and build a grand temple to Ram. And if this means a bloodbath, then let there for once be a bloodbath."

• "We have tried, times without number, to explain our stand to the likes of Shahabuddin but, as you well know, the tail of the dog will always remain curled and however much you might try you cannot make it straight!"

• "Hindus, why don't you say that we are Hindus and for the sake for the honour of the Hindu, we are ready even to be wiped out?...For our honour, we are ready to sacrifice our lives, we are ready even for complete annihilation, and we are ready to sacrifice ourselves. But before we sacrifice ourselves, we will exact thousands of sacrifices from the other side. If we are ready to shed our blood, we are ready too to shed the blood of others. We have sacrificed far too much for other religions. Mahatma Gandhi ruined us by telling us that if we are slapped on one cheek, we should turn the other. Arrey, if your second cheek too is slapped, where are you going to find a third cheek?"

• "...If you do not rouse yourselves now, then for centuries you will not be fit to raise your heads again. It is on the strength of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad and the Bajrang Dal that your future will be built. The 30th of October will show whether, in this country, it is the Hindu who will remain—or the Muslim!"

• "Oh! Leaders of our times, just open your eyes: more coffins are being sold in our poor land than loin-cloths. The lust to fill their coffers does not shame them even into forbearing from stealing the loin-cloth off the corpses in their coffins!".

• "Who can hide this burning truth about the Ram Janmabhoomi that the Ram Janmabhoomi belonged to the Hindus, belongs to the Hindus and shall forever belong to the Hindus. We shall feel free to breathe in peace only when we shall have erected a great temple on the Ram Janmabhoomi."

the children of this land, it is you who gave your invaluable votes to those who have misgoverned this land. You have forgotten your own strength, you have forgotten the strength of your arms. You have forgotten the glory of your forefathers, you have forgotten the pride of Maharana Pratap—and that is why these impotents are seated on the throne of power and leading the nation into darkness."

• "We have till today never raised our sword against the helpless. We are those who embraced our invaders as brothers. The government of the day accuses us of being communal. But ask this blind government why it is that it is only on the festivals of Diwali and Dussehra that riots take place. How is it that there has never been a riot on the day of Moharram? When the processions of the followers of other religions are taken out, stones are never rained down upon them from our mandirs, but whenever we take out our shobhayatras, it is not from temples but from masjids that we are pelted with pebbles. Let there be a search made of every temple in India. But if you undertake a search of any masjid, you will find it filled with arms and ammunition and explosive substances of every description. And yet it is we who are called communal!"

• "We welcome those Muslims who regard themselves as the descendants of the poets Rahim and Raskhan but, however bitter this truth may be, however much it might pierce your heart, however much our listeners can bear it no more, however much you might be drowned in sweat, let those who think of themselves as the descendants of Babar and Aurangzeb know that we are no longer apprehensive of accidents, that the lava boils in our veins and arteries, that we can no longer bear this unending oppression, that those who cut both arms of my Mother, who worship the invader Babar and abuse our Lord Ram, that these deceitful people have no place whatsoever in our country, that they leave this Bharat, this Hindustan."

• "So, this then is my plea to you, that you, my Hindu brothers, understand the need of the hour, now the time has come to explain to this Government of India, to these leaders of the nation who know only how to place the noose around the necks of good people, that they must now halt this injustice which they are inflicting upon us—for we know how to avenge ourselves on those who perpetrate injustice on us!"

gently carted off to suitable establishments in Agra or Ranchi—trussed up, no doubt, in a straitjacket.

Two major developments—one political and the other economic—changed all that.

First, the political. As Stresemann's health declined, leading to his death on 3 October 1929, his hold on the German electorate declined and a scramble for the succession began. Political groups that had no hope of securing power on their own entered into electoral adjustments with the Nazis (much as the National Front groupuscules did with the BJP), sought out "common elements" in their respective platforms and manifestos (much as the Janata Dal did with the BJP in the heyday of its "value-based" politics), secured the outside support of the Nazis to prop themselves in power (rather in the manner of our centrist and leftist converts to "coalition politics" last year—to wild applause from the likes of otherwise decent, reasonable people like George Verghese and Pran Chopra). The non-Nazis even handed over an entire Laender (state) to Nazi rule in the manner in which last February the Raja of Manda surrendered total control over Madhya Pradesh and Himachal Pradesh to the BJP (with the full approbation, need one add, of the same Nikhil Chakravartty who is now so censorious of cohabitation with communalism!)

The BJP, like the Nazis, is, of course, not in politics to cook khichri for others but to grab the rasoi (indeed, the whole Janmabhoomi) for itself. It was the levers of power provided opportunistically by others—including right-wing Conservatives, centrist Christian Democrats and leftists Socialists—that took Hitler where it did. Equally, it is the levers of power provided opportunistically by others—including right-wing capitalists, centrist casteists and left-wing communists—that has brought the BJP where it has.

On the economic front, the late 20s was a period of astonishing recovery and growth for the Western world. Millionaires popped like champagne corks in the firmanent of global business. Wages rose. Inflation dropped. The rigours and deprivation of the Great War of 1914-18 were left behind. A generation exulting in democracy and prosperity christened the decade the Roaring Twenties.

The bubble burst in October 1929 with the collapse of the stock market on Wall Street and the Great Depression that followed. Millions were thrown out of work. The illusory fortunes of the new rich were wrecked. And the Weimar Republic crumbled to give way to the Third Reich. It was the economic collapse of 1929-33 which gave Hitler his opportunity.

In 11 months of the grossest economic mismanagement this country has known, V.P. Singh (with a little help from the oil sharks—Sheikh, Rattle and Roll, as Elvis Presley would have said!) has brought us to the brink of a disaster whose proportions are only just becoming public. Our foreign exchange reserves are being depleted by a thousand crores a month. At this rate, we will be flat broke by February—not a sterling in the treasury, not a dollar in the tijori. That is also the month in which I shall finally bury my last regrets at quitting the Indian Foreign Service (IFS), because my erstwhile colleagues are not going to get their monthly pay cheques (while I can only hope Aveek Sarkar will prove more considerate than Bharat Sarkar!) And don't just blame the Arabs (who, as the BJP is quick to point out, are all Muslims and, therefore, NQU—Not Quite Us). For, on the domestic front, inflation is running at double-digit figures despite our silos overflowing with the largest harvest ever (thanks to a sweetheart of a monsoon which even the Dandavate-induced loan waivers confusion couldn't deflect).

Thus, between Germany in the winter of 1929 and India in the winter of 1990, there are frightening parallels in the economic situation. The only forces that can draw comfort from the impending catastrophe are those that have found their political voice in the BJP. For economic anarchy provides rich soil in which to tend the tender plant of communalism. Hitler discovered this when he blamed it all on the Jews. The BJP is discovering it as it blames it all on the co-religionists of our largest minority.

Where do we go from here? Too large a number of politicians, of all hues, are beginning to wonder whether it wouldn't be best to steal the BJP's thunder by stealing a few of its ideological clothes. Draped, they think, in a paler shade of saffron, they might succeed in outmatching the Rabble-Rouser-in-Chief to the BJP, the shaven-headed, saffron-clad siyasi sanyasin Uma Bharti. That way lies disaster. Our secular future cannot afford a failure of nerve at this critical juncture in the building of our modern nationhood.

The reassertion of secularism has to begin at the precise point—and in the precise circumstances—where secularism is most under attack. Otherwise, we will slip unwittingly into the trap that is being laid for us by the widely-circulated cassette containing the venomous spoutings of this siyasi sanyasin. (See box.)

The lady claims the issue is the shooting by Mulayam Singh's security forces at the vanguard of the kar sevaks. That is not the issue. The firing in Ayodhya was merely the consequence of the heedless confrontationism of the local administration.

L.K. Advani has warned the "Babar aur Aurangzeb ki aulad" (the descendants of Babar and Aurangzeb) that they will be safe only in a "Hindu Raj"

The issue is: why were the kar sevaks at all in Ayodhya? They were, assuredly, not there to build a Ram mandir—for there are already over 200 Ram mandirs in Ayodhya and no one will stop anyone from building 2,000 more. The VHP/ Bajrang Dal/ RSS activists were in Ayodhya from 30 October to 2 November (accompanied by hordes of BJP cadres—but not, let it be noted any BJP leaders, not even Uma Bharti—for the leaders had carefully notified the UP government well in advance of their travel plans so that they could be arrested and comfortably lodged in Circuit Houses well away from the firing which they knew their workers would provoke in Ayodhya!) The kar sevaks were in Ayodhya not, as I was saying, to build a mandir to Lord Ram (who, in any case, is rama that is, manifest everywhere and, therefore, in no need of a BJP mandir even on his alleged janmabhoomi) but because of the incitement by siyasi sanyasins (and sanyasi siyasats!) to break the law, spill their blood and avenge themselves on Islam—all so that there might be come accretion in the one-in-ten Indians who put their stamp on the lotus symbol in November 1989.

Advani, for his part, has warned the "Babar aur Aurangzeb ki aulad" (the descendants of Babar and Aurangzeb) that they will be safe only in a "Hindu Raj"! He sounds exactly like Adolf Hitler telling Max Planck: "I am not an anti-Semite. It is just very regrettable that the Jews have this unfortunate identification with Marxism"! (Thomas Mann, Diaries 1918-1939, p. 161). Can you not discern the dulcet tones of the unctuous Advani: "I am not an anti-Muslim. It is just very regrettable that the Muslims have this unfortunate identification with Babar and Aurangzeb"!

The BJP have picked the expression "appeasement" to describe national policies based on compassion and sensitivity to minority concerns. It is an expression taken straight from the history of Hitler, because it first gained general currency when in 1938, British Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain sought to head off Hitler's war by compromising with Hitler and urging the European democracies to accommodate themselves to European fascism. Winston Churchill described this as "appeasement". It is a term used not against one's countrymen but against one's enemies. The BJP may consider the Muslims to be their "enemies"; no decent, civilised Hindu can share this view. It is by such subtle verbal tricks of equating the minorities with treachery (and, thus, the majority with a monopoly over patriotism) that the BJP is misleading the misled.

We cannot beat the BJP by joining the misled. We cannot beat the BJP by donning a paler shade of saffron. A civilised community, such as the Hindu community, knows that civilisation begins with Compassion for the Few-and only that can lead to Justice for All. Members of the BJP are certainly not the mandated representatives of the Hindus. I doubt, indeed, that they are Hindus at all! ●

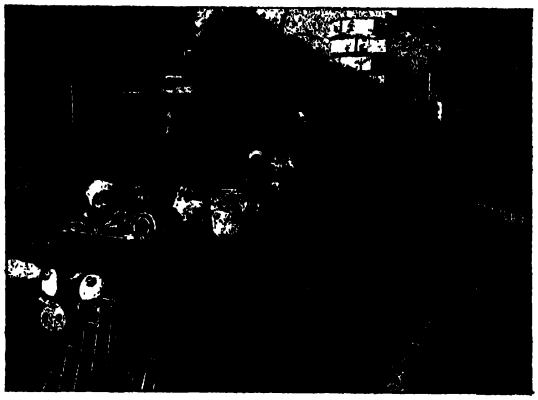
Games people play

Labour disputes make Appu Ghar a centre of controversy

As far as the management of Appu Ghar is concerned, fun and games are definitely over. With labour problems on the increase and demands for the nationalisation of the amusement park becoming more strident, the six-year-old outfit, set up by International Amusement Limited, is facing its roughest times ever since it was set up with the help of non-resident funding, and inaugurated by the then Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in 1984.



Trouble had been brewing for a while, with some employees getting disenchanted with the 'official' union Appu Ghar Karmachari Sangh (AGKS), and approaching the Hotel Mazdoor Union (HMU) with their grievances, which ranged from wages (lower than those guaranteed by the Minimum Wages Act), to the non-regularisation of temporary workers and the failure of the management to pay bonus. According to the secretary of HMU, K. Patra: "Over the years the number of workers owing allegiance to our union has increased. And now of the 300 workers in Appu Ghar as many as 250 belong to the HMU."

This claim is strongly refuted by the AGKS head, V.D. Dutta, who insists that his is the legitimate union, registered with the authorities and recognised by the management, with the majority of the workers on its rolls. Ever since its inception in 1988, the union has managed to extract such benefits for the workers as provident fund, gratuity, wage hikes, and bonus in the sixth year of the company's existence.

The management, too, chooses to recognise the AGKS, though the general manager of Appu Ghar, K.C. Arora denies that the union is granted the rare privilege of holding its meetings in the general manager's office. Says Arora: "We don't recognise the HMU. Appu Ghar doesn't belong to the hotel industry sector, so how can this union operate here?"

Patra thinks differently. According to him, there are any number of food stalls, even a restaurant and a convention centre within the premises of Appu Ghar, and the park also has its share of clerical and security staff. "So, why can't the HMU function here?" Patra asks.

As a matter of fact, it does. Recently, after a worker was demoted after being caught giving free rides to people, the HMU swung into action, gheraoing Arora's office. Six workers were suspended for misbehaviour and the HMU alleges that they were threatened that they should leave the union, or else retribution would follow.

The Appu Ghar management insists that there are no profits to share with the workers, while the employees clamour for nationalisation

The union, however, went to the labour commissioner's office to protest the management's unfair labour practices. And a week or so later, the suspended workers were taken back, after they had given an assurance that such behaviour would not recur. The management appeared to regard this as an apology, but union sources insisted that it was only an "assurance", nothing more.

But semantics aside, the HMU alleges that the management habitually short-charges the workers. Appu Ghar is a profitable concern, they allege, and makes lakhs out of the leasing of stalls alone. Now, the management has also developed a manufacturing unit in NOIDA, Indo-Italian Amusement Limited, which makes and sells rides to such amusement parks as the Pune-Pimpri Chinchwad Municipality Park and Disneyland of Om Prakash Chautala fame. Such ventures mean big money, though Patra charges that the management sold a NOIDA-made ride as an Italian one, only to have it sent back by the buyers. But such one-time mishaps notwithstanding, the NOIDA venture makes good profits. And there's no reason why some of those shouldn't percolate down to the workers, who get paid a pittance (Rs 750 to unskilled labour and Rs 850 approximately for security personnel).

Public relations officer of Appu Ghar, Sangeeta Das, has a different story to tell. According to her, the amusement park barely manages to break even. The cost of the rides has remained stagnant from 1984 at Rs 1, 2, and 3, (though visitors to Appu Ghar will have some difficulty reconciling that with their experience) and thus profits are non-existent.

In addition, the management has to make a payment of Rs 4,00,000 to the Trade Fair Authority of India (TFAI) from which it has leased land, and one-third of that amount is doled out as property, electricity and other taxes. The entertainment tax of 25 per cent imposed by the government makes things even more difficult.

Such claims do not, however, wash down well with the workers affiliated to the HMU. And they insist that either the Appu Ghar management give them benefits on a par with those working with the TFAI, or let the government take over, if they insist on pleading lack of finances.

In that event, at least, the workers will get a fair deal.

After all, the least you expect of an amusement park is fair play. •

The beautiful way to get rid of your dandruff

Most people think that dandruff is just an irritation on the scalp. But it can also affect the way your hair looks. Dandruff makes it dull and lustreless. New Clinic Special gets rid of your dandruff gently. Gives you great looking hair.

Its new international formulation loosens and lifts out dandruff from the scalp, where it really begins.

And it has a rich, creamy conditioner which leaves your hair soft and shiny. So you can use it regularly even after your dandruff's gone.

Use New Clinic Special to prevent your dandruff from coming back. And to keep your hair looking good.

Stings and swings

■ It's not the increase of free-trippers, or the encroachment of railway land, or even the disruption of traffic by demonstrators that disrupted the Eastern Railway communications network recently. It was monkeys and bees.

Bees swarmed the microwave towers along the Dhanbad-Gaya-Mughalsarai section, attacking the staff in charge of maintenance.

The massive felling of trees in the region also resulted in the monkeys shifting attention to the same towers, using the hanging parabolic copper wave guides as a swing, causing further disturbance in microwave communication.

With the animals taking over, the communications system seems headed for further trouble.

Peel to heal

■ Potato peels have suddenly become objects of reverence. At least, to doctors tackling the increasing number of burn cases. An ideal skin cover, potato peels allow the skin to dry and breathe at the same time.

Says Dr M.H. Keswani:

"They are less painful to remove, and work so well and are so suitable for our country, it is a method of treatment most advisable to adopt."

The peels prevent the dressing from sticking to the skin and keep the bandages moist. The peels are now being stuck onto gauge padding and made into bandage strips 10 feet long and six inches wide.

With potatoes chipping in to provide a healing touch, the things we all throw away in the name of garbage might be worth more than we imagine.

ANTI-DANDRUFF SHAMPOO

When it comes to arranging publicity stunts, there's nobody quite like Boney Kapoor.

And when it comes to entering into the spirit of things with proper enthusiasm, there's no beating the Sanjay Kapoor—Tabbu jodi.

At a recent location shoot of Prem, the lead pair were in their element, posing cosily for the benefit of photographers, eating out of each other's plates and cuddling in dark corners.

Even the fact that Tabbu was suffering from flu didn't dampen their ardour.

Obviously, it takes more than fear of infection to put the Kapoor kid off.

Sanjay Kapoor and Tabbu: what's a cold between good friends?

Farha insists that marriage isn't going to make any difference to her career; she'll continue working just as she did earlier.

But which career could she be talking about? As far as we know, she hasn't signed a new film in months.

Farha: I haven't quit, I haven't quit

The Amala-Nagarjuna love affair continues. And the pair is currently banking on their joint starrer Shiva (Hindi) to make an impact in the Bombay film industry.

If Shiva is a hit, the duo will shift base to Bombay, and, with luck, make a new life for themselves—married, or otherwise.

Amala: banking on Shiva, and Nagarjuna

It's one thing when Anuradha Poudwal dubs songs originally sung by Alka Yagnik. And quite another when she threatens to do the same to Lata Mangeshkar. Or, to be precise, when Gulshan Kumar, T-Series boss, sets her up to re-record Lata's numbers.

Film gossip has it that Kumar wanted Anuradha to sing those numbers for Kirti Kumar's Radha Ka Sangam, which had originally been recorded by Lata. Music director Annu Malik put his foot down, and nothing came of that.

Though, it did prove that Gulshan Kumar is well and truly besotted to the circular singer.

While on Telugu superstars, here's the latest on Chiranjeevi. Now that his Hindi film Pratibandh has proved to be a box-office success, and the critics more than enthusiastic, Chiranjeevi has decided that Bombay may be a viable proposition, after all.

Only, unlike Nagarjuna, he won't be accompanied by a nubile girl friend, when he makes the change of residence.

Sheena Sippy: Salman's favourite photographer

The letter 'S' seems to have a special significance in Salman Khan's life. No, we aren't referring to either lady love Sangeeta Bijlani or his air-hostess friend, but to that photographer who sparkles on both sides of the lens: Sheena Sippy.

Apparently, the dimunitive heart-throb refuses to be photographed by anyone other than good friend Sheena. Sippy alone, he claims, understands his best angles.

While he, no doubt, best appreciates her curves.

Over the years, Khushwant Singh's weekly columns, With Malice Towards One And All and Gossip Sweet and Sour *have regaled readers of over 50 publications, except when the Sardarji went abroad on one of his numerous junkets. And at all times, Singh has been at his provocative best, attacking sacred cows and presenting his unpopular views without a thought about the public outcry that would follow. Now, Rohini Singh has put together a compilation of Khushwant Singh's columns, More Malicious Gossip, *presenting us with the Sardarji at his best. SEEING ONESELF

THE GODS in their wisdom did not grant me the gift of seeing myself as others see me. They must have thought knowing what others thought of me might engender suicidal tendencies in me and decided to let the stew in my own self-esteem. Now I am up against the formidable task of having to write about myself. The young lady who is compiling, sifting and editing an anthology of these articles insists that the collection will not be complete without a prefatory piece on what I think of myself.

It is a daunting assignment. Have you ever tried to look at yourself squarely in the eyes in your own mirror? Try it and you will understand what I mean. Within a second or two you will turn your gaze from your eyes to other features—as women do when they are making up or men do when they are shaving. Looking into the depths of one's own eyes reveals the naked truth. The naked truth about one self can be very ugly.

I know I am an ugly man. Physical ugliness has never bothered me nor inhibited me from making overtures to the fairest of women. I am convinced that only empty-headed nymphomaniacs look out for handsome gigolos. They have no use for the likes of me; I have no use for the likes of them. My concern is not with my outward appearance, my untidy turban, unkempt beard or my glazed look (I have been told that my eyes are that of a lustful badmash) but what lies behind the physical, the real me compounded of conflicting emotions like love and hate, general irritability and occasional equipoise, angry denunciation and tolerance of another's point of view, rigid adherence to self-prescribed regimen and accommodation of others' convenience. And so on. It is on these qualities that I will dwell in making an estimate of myself.

First I must dispose of the question which people often ask me: "What do you think of yourself as a writer?" Without appearing to wear the false cloak of humility, let me say quite honestly that I do not rate myself very highly. I can tell good writing from the not so good, the first rate from the passable. I know that of the Indians or the Indian born, Nirad Chaudhuri, Naipaul, Salman Rushdie, Amitava Ghosh and Vikram Seth handle the English language better than I. I also know I can, and have, written as well as any of the others—R.K. Narayan, Mulk Raj Anand, Mulgaonkar, Ruth Jhabvala, Nayantara Sehgal or Anita Desai. What is more, unlike most in the first or the second category, I have never laid claims to being a great writer. I regard self-praise to be the utmost form of vulgarity. Almost every Indian writer I have met is prone to laud his or her achievements. This is something I have never done. Nor ever solicited awards or recognition. Nor ever spread false stories of being considered for the Nobel Prize for literature. The list of prominent Indians who spread such canards about themselves is formidable: Vatasyayan (Ageya), G.V. Desani, Dr Gopal Singh Dardi (Governor of Goa), Kamla Das and many others.

Am I a likeable man? I am not sure. I do not have many friends because I do not set much store by friendship. I have found that friends however nice and friendly they may be demand more time than I am willing to spare. I get easily bored with people and would rather read a book or listen to music than converse with anyone for too long. I have had a few very close friends in my time. I am ashamed to admit that when some of them dropped me, instead of being upset, I felt relieved. And when some died, I cherished their memory more than I did their company when they were alive.

I have the same attitude towards women who I have liked or loved. It does not take much for me to get deeply emotional about women. Often at the very first meeting I feel I have found the Helen I was seeking, and like Majnoon sifting the sands of desert wastes my quest for Laila was Much has been said about the choice of Zail Singh as President. No credit is given to him for his transparent humility, his undoubted knowledge of Punjabi, Urdu and Hindi and the gift of the gab over. None of these infatuations lasted very long. At times betrayal of trust hurt me deeply but nothing left lasting scars on my psyche. The only lesson I learnt was that as soon as you sense the others cooling off, be the one to drop them. Dropping people gives you a sense of triumph, being dropped one of defeat which leaves the ego wounded. I do not have the gift of friendship. Nor the gift of loving or being loved.

Hate is my stronger passion. Mercifully it has never been directed against a community but only against certain individuals. I hate with a passion unworthy of anyone who would like to describe himself civilised. I try my best to ignore them but they are like an aching tooth which I am periodically compelled to feel with my tongue to assure myself that it still hurts. My hate goes beyond people I hate. I drop people who befriend them. My enemy's friends become my enemies.

Fortunately there are not many people I hate. I could count them on the tips of fingers of one hand—no more than four or five. And if I told you why I hate them, you may agree that they deserve contempt and hatred.

I hate name-droppers. I hate self-praisers. I hate arrogant men, I hate liars. Is there anything wrong in hating them? People ask me, why can't you leave them alone? Why can't you ignore their existence? Now, that is something I cannot do. I cannot resist making fun of name-droppers, calling lairs liars on their faces. And I love abusing the arrogant. I have been in trouble many times because of my inability to resist mocking these types. And since most name-droppers, self-praisers and arrogant men go from success to success, become ministers, Governors and win awards they don't deserve, my anger often explodes into denouncing them in print. I have been dragged into courts and before the Press Council. This can be a terrible waste of time and money. I think I will have wax images of my pet hates and vent my spleen on them by sticking pins in their effigies. May the fleas of a thousand camels infest their armpits!

I am not a nice man to know.

ZAIL SINGH

ZAIL SINGH's final tryst with his fellow politicians was apparently a very memorable one; his swan song as a member of the Congress-I a tour de force of sentimental oratory. This was on the evening of Thursday the 8th of July when he bade farewell to his party colleagues in the Central Hall of Parliament. Since the meeting was not open to the Press I have put the details together from accounts given by my friends in the Rajya Sabha. When Zail Singh entered the hall, Mrs Gandhi was speaking to the members. He was visibly embarrassed. Mrs Gandhi further embarrassed him by her words of welcome: "See he is blushing like a bride." And so he did to the roots of his beard:

"Like a bride full of blushes when lingering to take A last look at her mirror at night ere she goes..."

The PM's words gave him the theme of his farewell address which he delivered for over 50 minutes without the help of a single note. He spoke of his humble beginnings and how he learnt to read the lines on the palms of labourers, ironsmiths, carpenters and other workmen; the warm welcome he had received all over the country, particularly in the South where he had been told that his inability to speak English would prove a handicap. He criticised the "consensus" notion by saying that what the Opposition wanted was to set up its office in Rashtrapati Bhavan. "That I will not allow; neither them nor the Congress-I," he said very pointedly. Whereupon Mrs Gandhi quipped that he would not be able to keep her out as one room in Rashrapati Bhavan was used for Cabinet meetings. The Giani continued that having been an active politician all his life he felt like a fish being thrown out of the stream. "You have decided to retire me from politics; however mine will be a kind of Shahi (royal) retirement." He ended his speech by telling them that he felt like a bride taking leave of her parents, brother and sisters when every one in the family is in tears. And so apparently were many of his audience.

Much has been said by the Opposition against the choice of Giani Zail Singh for the top position in the Republic. No credit is given to him for his transparent humility, his undoubted knowledge of Punjabi, Urdu and Hindi, the scriptures of all the religions practised in the country and his gift of the gab. He will be by far the greatest orator we have had as President (and I am not forgetting Dr Radhakrishnan). Zail Singh exudes the aroma of the earth because he is closer to India's soil than any of his predecessors. I am not in the habit of making forecasts; but when I do, I am usually right. I forecast that Giani Zail Singh will be the most popular President that India has had so far.

PRESIDENT ZAIL SINGH

WHEN GIANI Zail Singh took over as President of the Republic, I wrote: "I am not in the habit of making forecasts; but when I do I am usually right. I forecast that Giani Zail Singh will be the most popular President that India has had so far."

That was more than three years ago. In the last two years much has happened to his image. More has been written about him than was on his predecessors because of his role in the many catastrophic events that engulfed the country. Instead of being the most popular he has become the most controversial President. What his image will be like when he lays down office a year and a half from now is hard to figure out. However, having read just about everything in print about him as well as gone through six biographies I will try to answer a few questions uppermost in people's mind.

No need to bother about the biographies. Without exception they are qaseedas (eulogies) written by nondescript biographers produced by nondescript publishing houses. Large chunks of them consist of excerpts from newspapers and pictures supplied by the President's P.R.O. In any event all of them were written after Giani became President and none come up to events in which his name came to be embroiled.

What we have to find out is how much substance there is in the charges levelled against Gianiji in other much more widely read books published since Operation Blue Star. The list of journalist-authors who have pronounced on him is formidable: M.J. Akbar, Kuldip Nayar, Chand Joshi, Arun Shourie, M.V. Kamath, Patwant Singh, Harji Malik, Tavleen Singh, Subhash Kirpekar, Shekhar Gupta, Sunil Sethi, Mark Tully, Satish Jacob and Pranay Gupte. Four questions cry out for answers. First, did Giani Zail Singh play any role in elevating Bhindranwale from a rustic bhai to a political monster? Second, did he as President sanction the storming of the Golden Temple by the Army and did he warn Mrs Gandhi of its impact on the Sikh community? Third, what did he do to curb the anti-Sikh violence following the assassination of Mrs Gandhi and what help did he render the victims? And finally, is there any truth in the press reports that the present Prime Minister rarely bothers to consult him on important issues?

I have not the slightest doubt that Gianiji did not pick up or promote Bhindranwale. To the best of my knowledge, he met him once when he was head of the Punjab Congress in Opposition during Janata rule. That also at a keertan in a gurudwara. After Mrs Gandhi's return to power he was made home minister at the Centre and Darbara Singh became Punjab's chief minister. It was Mrs Gandhi's practice not to consult state's leaders she brought to the Centre on matters relating to their home states. She also knew that Gianiji and Darbara Singh did not see eye-to-eye on political matters. It was Darbara Singh who announced over the radio that warrants of arrest against Bhindranwale had been issued, allowed him six days during which he dictated the time and place where he would surrender to the police, kept him in a Circuit House rather than in a prison and then had him let off.

When Indira Gandhi succeeded Lal Bahadur Shastri, fairly and squarely beating Morarji Desai, it was said she became Prime Minister because she was Nehru's daughter

I am still not sure about Gianiji's role (he was by then President) in sanctioning the storming of the Golden Temple. He agreed to putting Darbara Singh's government in cold storage and proclaiming Governor's Rule. He stayed his hand for quite some time before he agreed to declare it a "disturbed area" and hand over administration to the army. Therefore, there was no need to consult him about Operation Blue Star. He heard about it over the radio. It stands to reason that had Gianiji been consulted he would have at least advised the Prime Minister to pre-date or defer action and avoid embroiling innocent pilgrims who would be present on the martyrdom anniversary of the builder of the temple. Mrs Gandhi apparently did not realise that the Akal Takht would be rid of Bhindranwale's men without having to be knocked down. What she saw of the havoc appalled her. The generals incharge of the action either misled her or botched up the Operation.

I have no convincing replies to his staying in Rashtrapati Bhavan while Delhi was witnessing a carnage of Sikh lives following the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. As Head of the Army why did he not order the troops out at once? And why after the carnage was over, did he not visit refugee camps and solace the victims? I am on even less sure ground about his relations with the Prime Minister. If they are strained, as papers report, they will impair the institution of the President. Only future historians who have access to secret papers (if any have been preserved) will be able to throw light on them. Or perhaps earlier if Gianiji writes his autobiography and decides to reveal the truth as known to him. Till then we have to withhold judgement.

RAJIV GANDHI

IN THE next few days, Rajiv Gandhi is likely to announce his decision to quit flying and enter politics. He had no interest in politics and a very poor opinion of politicians. He was most reluctant to change his profession and his wife, Sonia, totally opposed to his going into the hurly burly of political life. However, he has at last decided to yield to the pressure put by members of the Congress party.

Mrs Gandhi's critics, particularly among the so-called intellectuals, have mounted a propaganda campaign questioning Rajiv Gandhi's entry into politics. "He is only being brought in because he is the Prime Minister's son and Sanjay's brother," they say. That may be so. But they overlook the fact that it is also his right as a citizen of India to do so. He is not—as the Opposition maintains—"succeeding" either to his mother or his brother, but only offering himself (albeit reluctantly) to help as anyone else might in the organisation. It would be a gross travesty of democratic principle to deny him rights enjoyed by all others simply because of his ancestry or relationship. He has yet to prove himself. And it will be for the people (not only his critics) to accept or reject him.

It is worth recalling that when Pandit Nehru first became President of the Indian National Congress, there was similar criticism that he had been chosen because he was Motilal's son. When Indira Gandhi succeeded Lal Bahadur Shastri, fairly and squarely beating Morarji Desai, it was said that she became Prime Minister because she was Jawaharlal's daughter. And when Sanjay burst on the Indian political scene and established his unquestioned power over the party machine, similar insinuations were made against him. But it was clear as daylight for anyone who wished to see that Nehru, Indira and Sanjay, each in his or her turn, were not imposed on the people but chosen by them. What could have been more democratic?

And now it will be Rajiv. There is little doubt that his way to the political path was paved by Sanjay Gandhi. People who believed in what Sanjay stood for hope that he will carry on the task that this valiant son of India left unfulfilled. Sanjay was much more than a Member of Parliament, the Prime Minister's right-hand man and leader of the Youth Congress. He had succeeded in firing the imagination of the people that they could within their lifetime, convert the dream of a more prosperous and powerful India into a reality. If the people are now eager to pass on the torch that Sanjay lit into the hands of his elder brother, they do so in the hope that Sanjay's unfinished mission will now be accomplished.

STILL THE BEST BET, IF HE LEARNS

THE MOST significant thing that happened in the first month of 1987 was that people began to look for blemishes on Rajiv's face. This very month, two years ago the same people were loud in praise of the many qualities he possessed: his good looks, his candour and courtesy and assured us that we were fortunate in having so forward-looking a man as him at the helm of our affairs. Why did the magic mirror which once reflected his image as among the fairest of the fair start showing warts and pimples?

Rajiv's own contribution to this change has been most noteworthy. Perhaps his massive victory at the polls gave him an illusion of invulnerability. He succumbed to the temptation of riding roughshod over dissenters, ignored institutions and traditions of governance, appointed friends unknown to the public to important public positions and unceremoniously fired those whose vibes did not please him. He began to pronounce with authority on subjects with which he ha little familiarity. The subjantawala destroyed the image of a modest young man eager to learn. Said a south Indian friend to me: "A man who till the other day only knew how to handle the joy-stick in a cockpit can hardly be expected to deliver learned sermons from the world's pulpits."

Rajiv's image has by no means suffered irreparable damage. He should know that he still remains our best bet to lead the country. He can afford to dismiss the rantings of politicians but he must take the near-unanimous criticism by the press, the trahison des clercs—the revolt of civil servants—more seriously. The press enjoys more credibility with the people than politicians. Civil servants have taken a lot of mauling from politicians and will not take any more. I raise my glass to toast the Venkateswarans of India:

"God give us men!
Men whom the lust of office does not kill"

SANJAY GANDHI

IT WAS a hot sweltering afternoon when neither man nor beast stirred out of the shade. And there was I standing under a scorching sun midst a sweaty crowd on the roundabout near India Gate. I wanted to say my last farewell to my young friend as he passed by. I recalled that 16 years ago I had stood at the same spot in the same kind of torrid heat to watch the cortege of my friend's grandsire. His grandsire had been a national figure for more than half-a-century and then Prime Minister for 17 years. There had been elaborate bandobast for his funeral. My young friend was a political parvenu who had been vilified and slandered from the day he became a major, persecuted and gaoled off and on and had only recently managed to get into Parliament. Yet the crowd at his funeral was larger than the one I had seen at his grandfather's. Someone had quoted an apt couplet in Urdu:

"Ai gulcheen-e-ajal tujh se nadaani hooee phool voh tora ke gulshan men veeranee hooee"

(O thou picker of life's flowers;
you made a grave mistake;
You plucked the one flower which laid the garden desolate)

The cortege came along led by bands of young men chanting:

"Jab tak sooraj chand rahega
Sanjay tera naam rahega"
(As long as the sun and moon go round, Sanjay will thy name resound)

Back home I pondered over this strange phenomenon. The only explanation I could find was that in the last year or two of his life unnoticed by anyone, a Sanjay cult had grown.

It was very much like the cult of Che Guevara based on the worship of a man who lived dangerously, cocked-the-snook at convention and tradition, was more feared than loved, and above all, feared nothing himself. All these applied to Sanjay. I recall his saying that a leader who is feared is more respected than a leader who is loved. "That's why when I tell them to do something, they damn well do it."

Who will now become the leader of the Sanjayists? I don't see the mantle drop on the shoulders of his brother, Rajiv. He is too withdrawn, unambitious, and a man of the family. Nor on Kamal Nath or Jagdish Tytler or the young Scindia. None of them have the derring-do or the panache that was associated with Sanjay. The only possible inheritor of the cult figure is Maneka. She is like her late husband, utterly fearless. And when roused, the very reincarnation of Durga astride a tiger.

The Sanjay cult was based on the worship of a man who lived dangerously, was more feared than loved, and feared nothing himself

GEORGE FERNANDES

IF ANYONE looking for an appropriate subject for a biography, I can suggest one person through whose life he can tell the story of contemporary India including its achievements and failures. He is George Fernandes.

I have known George in different incarnations. I first met him at a cocktail party in the house of a Bombay industrialist. He was a trade union leader basking in the glory of being a giant-killer having trounced Maharashtra's leading dada-politician, S.K. Patil in the Lok Sabha elections. Why was he socialising with an industrialist? And why at a cocktail party when he did not drink? Some years later on my way back from office, I saw him standing on a stool in the middle of Kala Ghoda square facing the Jahangir Art Gallery, haranguing a large mob. At one time he edited a weekly, Pratipaksha, in Marathi and Hindi. In one of its issues he described the Parliament as a brothel house. The case was taken up by the privileges committee. And for reasons unknown, dropped.

When Emergency was declared, George went underground. However, he managed to let his friends know that he was still around. Once I was summoned by Mrs Gandhi to Delhi for an off-the-record and strictly private meeting. The day I got back to Bombay I found a letter from George on my table with a one-line query: "How did your meeting with Madam Dictator go?" A few months later, the Calcutta police nabbed him and he was brought to the Red Fort of Delhi for interrogation.

The next time I saw George at Palam airport. As I came out of the Airbus, I noticed an enormous limousine flying the Indian tricolour draw up along the ramp. Members of a Russian trade delegation came down the steps. Camera bulbs flashed as they shook hands with some dignitary sent to receive them. It was the Hon'ble Mr George Fernandes, minister for something or the other. I met him several times after the Janata was thrown out of power. He won and lost elections, but political reverses never seemed to dampen his zeal for living. He continues to exude confidence that it will not be long before he will be riding limousines flying the tricolour as the Hon'ble Mr George Fernandes, minister of something or the other.

I had Fernandes almost all to myself (he is always escorted by the nicest looking girl in the neighbourhood) for an hour.

I asked him about his underground days as the elusive pimpernel. "The police thought I was in the garb of a sadhu; so they went about interrogating sadhus. That was too obvious a camouflage. I let my beard grow and taught myself how to tie a turban. The beard grew fast enough but the hair on the head remained short. I passed off as a Sardarji."

"But you don't speak a word of Punjabi; anyone speaking to you in Punjabi would have become suspicious."

He laughed uproariously. "I only knew three words Sat Sri Akal. I avoided Sardarjis like the plague. I tried to speak English with a Canadian accent hoping to pass off as an emigre Sikh who had forgotten Punjabi."

"What name did you assume?"

"I kept changing them. Twice I travelled by air using your name when I booked my seat."

"Good Lord! Quite a few of the Indian Airlines stewardesses recognise me. Surely that was asking for trouble!"

"Not at all. They may have recognised you but not me. And they had no reason to know that I was using your name."

It was after several months that the police realised that George was disguised as a Sikh. He made the mistake of staying in one place longer than he should have. A note he sent to a friend to get money led to his arrest in Calcutta. The police wanted him to admit he was George Fernandes and not a Mr Singh. He stoutly denied it. "If you are so certain I am Fernandes, why are you bothering me? In any event you can ask me all you want but I will say nothing of what I did or whom I met from the day I went underground to my arrest."

There is a lot more to George Fernandes than a swashbuckling comprador of Indian politics

The police tried to break him down. He was too important a politician to be subjected to third degree. But they did their worst to frighten him. They took him into the jungle to give him the impression that they would shoot him and pass it off as having killed him in an encounter. After they brought him to the Red Fort, they changed their tactics. First they used the filthiest abuse for him. 'Ma, bahin, beti, no one was spared," said George with a smile. "Then they stripped me naked; a naked man feels very defenceless and betrays himself. While two officers were interrogating me, there were dozens of eyes watching every movement of mine from behind glass panels. They gave me a very rough prickly blanket to sleep on. It was like lying on a bed of nails. When none of this worked, they tried to break down my morale by other devious ways. After many hours of grilling interrogation in a hot room, they would ask me politely if I would like chilled beer, lemonade or ice-cream. I said, "Yes, thank you." Nothing came. After keeping me hungry for two days, they would ask me whether I would like Mughlai or Chinese dinner. When I expressed my preference, they forgot about the meal."

There is a lot more to George Fernandes than a swash-buckling comprador of Indian politics. He is a highly civilised man, an aesthete, widely read, a compelling orator and a man who has a clear vision of the future and his own role in fulfilling it. He may never become the pillar of administration but he will always remain a force to reckon with.

DHIRENDRA BRAHMACHARI

PUBLIC REACTION to his fall from grace and the discomfiture in which he finds himself reveals another, perhaps the dominant, aspect of our national character: rejoicing over the sorrows of others. I have yet to meet anyone including those who once fawned on him who has now a kind word to say in his defence.

I had passing acquaintance with the Brahmachari. I met him when he had recently installed himself in Delhi as a teacher of Hatha Yoga and was eager to cultivate people in high positions. A senior official of the ministry of education (he was seeking a grant from the ministry for his ashram) brought him to my apartment. He instructed me on the appropriate asanas for imaginary ailments from which I have always suffered. I was very much taken by his unusually handsome appearance: tall, ramrod straight with the cleanest-clearest eyes I had ever seen.

Thereafter I met him on a few other occasions. He sent me the manuscript of his book on Yogasanas for corrections. I spent a New Year's morning in his ashram to interview him and his patients for an article for The New York Times. By then he had become a prosperous and powerful man. His four telephones rang all the time: ministers of Cabinet and other VIPs rang up to wish him a Happy New Year. There were a bevy of bosomy young ladies to receive the calls. A large foreign-made limousine was parked in the driveway, a herd of imported black Jersey cows grazed on the lawn and he had his own plane in a hangar in Palam.

To be fair to Dhirendra Brahmachari, he did not exploit his chelas—only people who exploited him to forward their own interests. However, it was clear as daylight that he had his feet in two different boats, the spiritual and the material, and would inevitably come to grief.

I believe it is the ambivalence in Dhirendra Brahmachari's character, the desire to get the best of both worlds, that roused the peoples' ire and jealousy. They rejoiced when he was taken off television and chortled with pleasure when they read of the seizure of his gun factory. "Envy, among other ingredients, has a mixture of love and justice in it. We are more angry at undeserved than at deserved good fortune," wrote Hazlitt. Most of us felt that Dhirendra Brahmachari's fortune was undeserved.

Has Dhirendra Brahmachari any friends left? Perhaps a few fence-sitters who fear that he may stage a comeback. I hope by now he must have learnt that a face-flatterer and a back-biter are one and the same person. We are a nation of fence-sitters, face-flatterers and back-biters

NARGIS DUTT

FOR MANY years the picture of Nargis troubled my midnights and my noon reposes. She remained a lovely, distant apparition beyond the approach of earthly mortals like me. Then one morning my telephone rang and a dulcet voice announced: "This is Nargis Dutt speaking. Can I speak to Mr so-&-so?"

"It is so-&-so speaking. Would you by any means be Nargis the film star?"

"Jee-han."

"Mother India and all that?"

"Jee-han. Can I come and see you?"

An hour later, she breezed into my office causing many a heart wildly aflutter. She was as beautiful as she was unassuming and friendly. "I have come to ask you for a personal favour," she said. "I believe you have a house in Kasauli. My children are at Sanawar and I can't find anywhere to stay during the School Founder's Week celebrations. I was wondering if you could let me stay in your house."

"Of course!" I replied, "but only on one condition." I paused to create the necessary suspense. She looked quizzically at me: "What?"

"Provided thereafter I have your permission to tell anyone I like that Nargis slept in my bed."

She burst into peals of girlish laughter. "Done!" she said putting out her hand to make a compact. "I stay in your house; you say I slept in your bed."

Nargis repeated this dialogue many times without the slightest embarrassment. She has the knack of making people happy. And a malicious sense of humour. But the last time she was in Delhi to attend the session of the Rajya Sabha, she was somewhat lacking in her usual exuberance. "I shouldn't be here. My doctor told me I have some kind of jaundice. I promised the local Rotary I would come—I couldn't break my word, could I? And there is this debate on Baghpat."

The debate, as you might recall, was largely the tirade let loose by the Opposition on the shooting of three men and the alleged rape of Maya Tyagi in the police station. The atmosphere in the House was surcharged with emotion. A lady member somewhat dark and corpulent exploded a volcano of angry epithets pouring lava on the government which though headed by a woman allowed women to be insulted, molested and raped. "There is rape here and a rape there! Every day we hear of rape, rape, rape," she shrilled. Nargis who was sitting next to me became suddenly very animated. "Why are you getting so excited?" she shouted. "No one will ever rape you."

One thing that intrigued me was her faith. Was she Muslim or Hindu or both or nothing? She wore a bindi on her forehead, married a Brahmin, gave her children Hindu names and was often seen in Swami Muktanand's ashram at Ganeshpuri. Nevertheless, she was buried with Muslim rites in a Muslim graveyard with her Hindu husband reciting the fateha. I can't think of any one Indian family which better exemplified the principle of Sarva Dharma Samabhav.

Despite Mountbatten's awe-inspiring image, I was not wrong in suspecting that the emperor had no clothes

MOUNTBATTEN

TWO BRIEF encounters, one in London followed by another a few months later in Toronto (Canada), have stayed in my mind. At the time I did not have the nerve to put my reactions in print: he was the Lord of Destiny, an awe-inspiring figure of whom singing anything but paeans of praise would have sounded discordant. Zieglar's excellent biography Mountbatten (Rupa) assures me that I was not wrong in suspecting that the emperor had no clothes. Or wore flimsy see-through raiments.

The first meeting was unscheduled. Lord Mountbatten was the chief guest at a reception in India House. By some error he turned up 15 minutes before he was expected and even the host, Krishna Menon, was not present to receive him. I rushed down to greet him, apologised for the misunderstanding and suggested that he relax in my temporary office.

His Lordship was out of countenance. He had come splendidly attired in an Admiral's deep-blue uniform splattered with gold epaulettes, ribbons and a chestful of medals. Instead of making a spectacular entry at a glittering reception as he had planned, he was having to waste time with a nondescript clerical type. I did my best to keep him amused. I asked him about the partition and the stormy days that followed. He answered me in bored monosyllables. I tried to provoke him: "Lord Mountbatten, many people feel that if you had not forced the pace, the exchange of populations might have been smoother and we might have been spared the enormous bloodshed that took place."

He was needled into replying: "I don't give a damn about what my critics say today," he said angrily. "I will be judged at the bar of history."

I was taken aback by his pomposity. However justified, I did not expect a sophisticated English gentleman of breeding to air assumptions of immortality. It wasn't pucca.

The next encounter revealed another facet of Lord Louis' character. He was to inaugurate an international trade fair in Toronto. Out of the blue we were informed that His Lordship had desired that his escort should be provided by the Indian High Commission in Canada. We were very happy to learn that he had such affection for India that even after laying down office as Viceroy and Governor-General he wanted to perpetuate his Indian connection.

It was a warm, bright summer morning. There was an enormous crowd. He arrived in his Rolls Royce flying the Union Jack. This time he wore a white shark-skin uniform with the same gold and silver tinsel and medallions spread over it. We lined up behind him: two bearded Sardars in black sherwanis and chooridars followed by our army, navy and air force attaches in their respective uniforms. The Canadians went delirious at the sight. This was the British Empire at the zenith of its glory! ●

Finally, the film

At last, the production of The City Of Joy gets under way

If the then information and broadcasting minister, P. Upendra and the West Bengal culture minister, Buddhadev Bhattacharya had maintained a discreet silence, Roland (Killing Fields) Joffe would have been just another distinguished foreigner working in Calcutta during its tercentenary year, filming his version of Dominique Lapierre's novel, The City Of Joy.

But Joffe was denied permission to shoot, and his script denounced as being "harmful to the national interest". And thus began a controversy which was to drag on for nearly a year. Calcuttans, who always love an acrimonious debate, soon got in on the act. While some embraced Joffe as the latest victim of a bloody-minded government, others dismissed the director as a "poverty-profiteer". As the verbal fight escalated, it seemed unlikely that the film would be made in the next couple of years, if at all.

Surprisingly enough, the clearance came after five months (Joffe plans to begin shooting on 11 February). But not before "reassurance sessions" with government officials, prolonged negotiations with the film's financiers, and script approval by Bengali author Sunil Gangopadhyay, after 14 drafts had been prepared. "Any script where two different cultures mix is always difficult to write, you have to get it just right," says a boyishly grinning Joffe. "Bringing The City Of Joy script to Calcutta was like dropping soluble aspirin in water. The script fizzed, bubbled and became something new."

What made the task slightly more complex was the fact that Joffe and scriptwriter Mark Medoff deviated from the novel at times. Father Kowalski, the Polish-American Roman Catholic angel of the slums is missing, for instance. Says Joffe: "He is an interesting character, but makes the film ethnocentric in a Catholic sense. I have no desire to make a film on Catholicism."

As in most Joffe films, the interest here is focused on the interaction between two men belonging to different worlds. The filmmaker throws together the emaciated Hasari Pal, a rickshaw-puller (played by Om Puri, Shabana Azmi plays his wife) and Max Loeb, a wealthy American doctor in the slums of Pilkhana.

Though filming is only three months away, the director insists he still doesn't know who is going to play Loeb, admitting, however, that there are three distinguished American actors on his shortlist. Adds producer Iain Smith: "We want to keep the cast under wraps." But informed reports have it that Victor Banerjee is among those tipped for a major role.

Initial plans to shoot the film at the slums in Pilkhana were quickly shelved, when logistic problems presented themselves. Instead, production designer Roy Walker and art director John Fenner chose a site on the wasteland near the city's dock area in Kidderpore. The set, a 500 feet by 150 feet plot, is an astonishing exercise in realism and a virtual replica of the shantytown of Pilkhana. After bulldozers had levelled off the area, 200 people worked for eight weeks to put up the set.

Says production manager Philip Kohler: "We brought truckloads of stuff—rusty metal sheets, mouldy wood, chipped doorframes, asbestos sheets, tiles green with moss, everything was welcome."

Under the shadow of the giant backdrop, stretches the main street, tenement huts on either side, some with faded signboards. The street opens into two courtyards, where important sequences will be shot. The final one being the flood sequence, which will leave the sets three feet under water. Several million gallons of water pumped from the nearby pond and a "rain-rigger" to provide "telescopic rain" will be necessary to achieve that effect.

In the chaotic production office is a miniature model of the city of joy and rolled up maps of the site. Each shack on the main street is represented by a small square, numbered and coloured to indicate the religion of the inhabitants. "These are only the bare bones," says Smith. "The set has still to be dressed."

But, as beginnings go, it's not too bad.●

L.K. Advani goes to Ayodhya

UTTAR PRADESH

The wave returned. Hindutva practically engulfed the troubled state of Uttar Pradesh as BJP president L.K. Advani visited Ayodhya on 19 November. "Barely 20 days ago, the entire administration in UP was geared to thwart Advani's entry into the state," said Naram Dutt Tiwari, former Congress(I) chief minister, in the Assembly. "And there he is now, being accorded a hero's welcome."

The mood was clear from the excited crowds that spilled into Gonda, a town some distance from Ayodhya, to greet Advani when he arrived by the Vaishali Express from Delhi. Fiery slogans by the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) activists (like "Bachchu bachchu Ram ka, Janmabhoomi ke kaam ka ") along with the relatively staid "Jai Shri Ram," rent the air. Advani's visit appeared to soothe the wounds of the police firing in the beginning of the month. Appropriately, the speeches made on the occasion were extremely aggressive, repeatedly reminding the people of Ayodhya and Faizabad of the "black days" of the past and reaffirming the VHP's conviction of success in the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid issue, thus aggravating an already volatile situation.

But that did not seem to bother the BJP or its leaders. The visit was a huge image-boost to Advani, and also strengthened the BJP's position in UP. Party supporters deftly used the occasion to whip up support and to keep the mandir/masjid issue alive till the elections. And all this after BJP spokesmen repeatedly denied that the party had anything to do with the VHP's kar seva.

Advani in Ayodhya: unstoppable

Three days before Advani's visit, the BJP supporters got down to the task of organising "mass awakening" programmes in the twin cities and the neighbouring villages. Audio cassettes were distributed and frequent meetings held to drive home the fact that the Ram rath would eventually reach Ayodhya because anyone who dared stop it would not remain in power. The rhetoric and the general hysteria reached a crescendo with Advani's arrival in Gonda, where, contrary to his previous schedule, the BJP president was compelled to stop and address a gathering of nearly 90,000. A sizeable section of this crowd followed him right up to Ayodhya.

Advani decided to make good use of the situation and in speech after speech he reiterated the fact that a solution to the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid issue lay in shifting the masjid to a distance five kms from its present site. "Some 500 mosques have been relocated to construct a dam in Andhra Pradesh" he said. "Therefore, Muslims should not get particularly sentimental about the one in Ayodhya."

Understandably, the UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav was one of Advani's principal targets, who, the BJP leader declared, would not succeed in stopping the kar sevaks because of their "genuine feelings and commitment to the cause of the temple". He also felt that the present government would not be able to solve the problem if they stuck to the court decision alone. This was an "emotional" problem. "I am a politician and not a religious leader," he said. "But because Ram symbolises our spiritual aspirations, it is my duty as a responsible politician to liberate the temple."

The VHP, too, tried to utilise the mass hysteria generated as a result of the visit by announcing that the next phase of kar seva would begin on 6 December. Said VHP general secretary Ashok Singhal: "We will resort to satyagraha to perform it." The party has also decided not to accept the Rs one lakh that Yadav said would be given to the families of those killed in the 30 October police firing. Instead, it has called upon people to donate generously to a trust set up by the party for the purpose.

Advani also visited the victims in a place that has now been re-christened "Rambhakt Balidaan Marg" and assured the people that the guilty would be brought to task. With the announcement of the next leg of the agitation, which would include a shuddhi karan or purification programme for all temples in Ayodhya, the battle lines seem to be clearly drawn. And very soon Ayodhya might give us another chapter of blood, sweat and tears. ●

Bal Thackeray shocks the Shiv Sena and the BJP by flirting with Chandra Shekhar

MAHARASHTRA

The Shiv Sena has always bowed to the BJP. So, when Sena supremo Bal Thackeray went against the wishes of the BJP and swore allegiance to Chandra Shekhar, there was a major embarrassment. The BJP leadership was outraged and the top brass of the Shiv Sena alarmed. But Thackeray's word was out, and his word, to his party, is law.

Thackeray began changing colour when V.P. Singh was rapidly losing ground "I may have differences with Chandra Shekhar," he said, "but I will prefer him as Prime Minister." Thackeray's preference did not really make a difference to the party, but the supremo was, in his characteristic way, laying the fuse for a future shock. Even on the day L.K Advani was arrested on his way to Ayodhya, Thackeray had not changed his stance "We will completely toe the BJP line " he proclaimed. Then at a massive annual day rally in Bombay, the Sena supremo came up with the bombshell. He declared his trust in Chandra Shekhar, categorically stating that the Shiv Sena would support him as Prime Minister.

Not surprisingly, Thackeray's announcement set off a wave of resentment. Politicians like Pramod Mahajan, responsible for the BJP-Sena political pact, were extremely unhappy. The fall-out of Thackeray's statement shocked several top Sena leaders. Threatened with a split within his own party, and a backlash for the four-member Sena band in the Lok Sabha, Thackeray finally backtracked. He announced that he was now withdrawing support of the Shiv Sena to Chandra Shekhar's government.

In the midst of this turmoil, Thackeray held meetings with chief minister Sharad Pawar. Pawar had engineered Congress(I) support for the Chandra Shekhar government. And Thackeray, it appeared, was desperately trying to appease both the Congress(I) and Chandra Shekhar. So, finally the Sena supremo began meeting his arch-rival. But Pawar, the wily politician, was hedging. When the state Janata Dal formally split recently—with its president Mrinal Core swearing by V.P Singh while Kamal Morarka, viciously opposed the Raja Pawar gained control The Shiv Sena, having patched up with the BJP, remained the only force to reckon with.

However, Thackeray refuses to admit that the meetings with Sharad Pawar were sessions of political wrangling. "Why should I not meet Sharad Pawar"? he retorts. "After all he is the chief minister! And we talked about the 40 lakh hutmen that I want to rehabilitate " When pressed on why he had to seek out his old and constant rival of whom he has been bitterly critical all along, Thackeray shrugs and says, "How can I tell you everything that took place at those meetings? This is politics!"

Thackeray: attempts at grabbing Pawar

Thackeray and his partymen are now looking forward to a mid-term poll. Sources within the Shiv Sena say that this could prove to be a golden opportunity for the party in Maharashtra. If Rajiv Gandhi comes back to power, he may want Sharad Pawar by his side in New Delhi. And this will leave Maharashtra wide open for the Shiv Sena. Presently, there is nobody in the Congress(I) who can match Pawar's expertise and experience when it comes to dealing with the problems and power games in Maharashtra. Ramrao Adik, and Shushilkumar Shinde certainly cannot measure up to Pawar's sheer political ingenuity and manipulative power.

And after all the talks with the CM Thackeray has once again started spouting anti-Pawar rhetoric. "Sharad Pawar is one of the richest politicians around," he says. "He has the capacity to buy people." Rather carried away, the supremo also declared that the Shiv Sena would never, have anything to do with the Congress or Sharad Pawar or, for that matter, Chandra Shekhar. Denying that he was serious about supporting Chandra Shekhar, or that he was piqued when the BJP stole his thunder, and took credit for whipping up sentimental support for the Ramjanmabhoomi temple issue in Maharashtra, Thackeray says, "It is all in the mind of the press. No one can steal my thunder in Maharashtra."

But this show of confidence does not wash. There have been too many contradictions recently coming from the Sena supremo. Talk of revolt crops up now and again with Thackeray asserting that as long as he holds the whip,the tigers must jump through a ring of fire if he commands.

Quite obviously, Bal Thackeray would like to rule Maharashtra. At the moment he seems to be waiting for Rajiv Gandhi to return to power and summon Sharad Pawar to New Delhi. And once Pawar leaves, the tiger will roar. •

Will the Shekhar regime spell trouble for the LDF?

KERALA

With V.P. Singh bowing out the Nayanar Government is in a fix. The CPI(M) and its partners in the ruling Left Democratic Front (LDF) coalition have been forced to rework their entire political strategy to retain whatever political advantage the LDF had gained in the state on account of V.P. Singh. Chief minister E.K. Nayanar had an excellent rapport with VP and often said that a phone call to Singh was enough for him to get his way. According to the Marxist leader, V.P. Singh had done more for Kerala than any other Prime Minister. The long pending demand to upgrade Trivandrum as an international airport and to declare coconut to be an oil seed, were conceded by the Centre during the last days of the Singh regime. And, above all, the threat of dismissal of the LDF government, which was a lingering nightmare during Rajiv Gandhi's tenure, disappeared when V.P. Singh came to power.

But the situation has changed overnight. The LDF will now be forced to rework its political strategy to retain whatever political advantage it had gained on account of V.P. Singh. The Janata Dal in Kerala depends on the CPI(M) vote bank for its survival in the state. So none of its top leaders, including the MLAs, was tempted to move over to the splinter Janata Dal (Socialist), formed by lower level, virtually unknown, leaders. Rosalin Panjikaran, a practically unknown lady who claims to be a close friend of the PM, heads the Janata Dal (S) in the state. None of the dissidents and die-hard Lohiaites, who were fighting each other within the Janata Dal, were willing to cross over—mainly due to their total dependence on the Marxist party. Even Thampan Thomas, former MP and State Campaign Committee chairman, who was bitterly opposed to V.P. Singh, has decided to stay on, since the Marxists are backing Singh to the hilt.

And now the state is feeling the impact of VP's fall. Last week, the Centre reduced the rice allotment for the state by 10,000 tonnes for the month of December. This has created a major political row in the rice-eating state. The Marxists feel that the cut in the quota seems to indicate the way things were likely to move in the future; while Opposition leader K Karunakaran has asserted that the reduction came about because of the "inaction of the previous V.P. Singh government at the Centre". It is the same story all over again, only those who were supporting the Centre have now become its critics and the earlier critics are today the biggest defenders of the Centre.

Meanwhile, with a change of government at the Centre, the CPI(M) has decided to postpone the elections to the district council which was to be held in December. Though CPI(M) state secretary V.S. Achutanandan declared that the postponement was due to "uncertainty regarding the stability of the present government at the Centre," other political parties say that the Marxists simply have cold feet.

As the CPI(M) tried hard to play down the riots in Matancherry, in the heart of Cochin, the Congress(I) resurrected the horror to project it as a prime example of the deteriorating law and order situation in the state. Yet the Opposition finds itself torn by internal dissidence and dissatisfaction among party cadres over its support to the Chandra Shekhar ministry. The fall of the V.P. Singh government

His sexist comments get the Chief Justice into a mess

Justice Mishra: eating crow

The new Chief Justice of India, Ranganath Mishra, has created a minor constitutional crisis. On 7 November, Justice Mishra was speaking at a women's conference organised by the Brahma Kumaris, a religious society. Mid-way through his 40-minute speech, the Chief Justice (CJ) suddenly delivered a scathing attack on women.

"Women should go back to their homes and not think of competing with men on everything," he declared and explained that work was the binding feature between a man and a woman and if one tries to get equality, then "love perishes, love dies". Finally, he disagreed with the banners the organisers of the conference had put up, which read "The world will rise when the women rise" and stated that the world could only rise when "women are women".

The remarks of the CJ were briefly reported in the newspapers the following day. But the tenor of Justice Mishra's remarks were enough to prompt women's groups to search out the recordings of the speech and threaten mass action. Rani Jethmalani commented that the CJ's words go against Article 51A of the Constitution which grants the fundamental right of equality of men and women. A senior lawyer of the Supreme should have come as a shot in the arm for the Congress(I)-led UDF but, instead, it has created utter confusion in the rank and file. The Muslim League, the second largest partner of the UDF, voted for V.P. Singh but now wants to join Chandra Shekhar. And the younger leadership in the Muslim League wants to come out of the Congress(I) fold and join the LDF to support V.P. Singh.

Meanwhile, another constituent of the Opposition UDF, Kerala Congress(Mani), has become the laughing stock of Kerala today—thanks to the machinations of Karunakaran. The Kerala Congress strongman, K.M. Mani, was to be sworn in as Cabinet minister in the Chandra Shekhar government, but at the last moment he was asked not to come for the swearing-in ceremony. Congress partymen, however, feel that it is best that Mani has not been given a ministerial berth because with both the Assembly and the state elections around the corner he would have thrown his weight around and become quite difficult to handle.

All in all, VP's exit seems to have created panic and turbulance in the state—for the ruling party, as well as for the Opposition. ●

Sreedhar Pillay/Trivandrum

Court said, "What Justice Mishra has said is not an isolated stance. We have read his judgements and in many of them, his bias against women shows up clearly."

As the women planned to launch a signature campaign against the Chief Justice, Indira Jaisingh, another Supreme Court lawyer known to take up women's issues frequently in court, wrote to Justice Mishra, demanding an apology.

Justice Mishra realised that he had stirred a hornet's nest and responded to the plea of the women lawyers almost two weeks after he made the controversial remarks. In a letter addressed to Brinda Karat, secretary of the All India Democratic Women's Association (AIDWA), Justice Mishra clarified that he had made the remarks in a personal capacity and that this should not be linked with his official position. Stating that "he had the highest respect for ladies" he took a position which was an anti-thesis of that taken by him earlier. ●

A tale of two gurus

The godmen who might be running India

MADHYA PRADESH

It reads like the eternal Indian fairy tale, the story of Ram and Shyam. Only, this time the two seem to have magic powers. They made leading ministers out of ambitious nobodies. The blessed ones: Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar and external affairs minister V.C. Shukla. The godmen: Bhagvan Ram and Radhe Shyam.

The two godmen are very highly respected in political circles, as well as by the humble godfearing mass of devotees. Bhagvan Ram is a very well-known tantrik of Varanasi, and now resides mostly in his ashram in Raigarh district of Madhya Pradesh. Belonging to the famous Aghor Tantrik lineage, this godman was originally known as Bhagvan, and later suffixed "Ram" to it. He has an ashram for lepers in Jashpur, and is reputed to be a kindly soul who doesn't use his tantrik powers to harm anyone. He is also regarded as the top social worker in the whole of Chhattisgarh.

And he keeps top company. Not only is the present PM a devotee of his, but former PM Morarji Desai had come to pay his respects to Bhagvan Ram, and former chief minister of Madhya Pradesh Arjun Singh is also a follower. Chandra Shekhar visits his ashram religiously, at least once a year, usually more. This time, when he stayed there for a few days in the first week of October, nobody quite knew what happened. Some said the tantrik had refused to meet Chandra Shekhar, while others declared that he had blessed the hot-shot leader. As for the leader himself, he answered all questions regarding Raigarh, but did not reveal the outcome of his meeting with the godman. But Shekhar's recent good fortunes may make one wonder whether there is any reason to doubt the blessings of this powerful tantrik.

Shyam's part of the story is even more intriguing. V.C. Shukla is a blind devotee of Radhe Shyam, a godman of Patharia in Jabalpore division. The regular, tranquil visits of Shukla to his guru's place get alarmingly frequent whenever Shukla faces a dilemma, or goes through a rough time. Even the minister's big bungalow in Raipur is named "Radhe Shyam Bhavan". The guru is known to be a likeable person, a family man with no great airs but some divine powers.

The powers, divine or otherwise, show. For example, during the days of the Dal turmoil, Shukla had decided to support V.P. Singh, and had instructed his supporters to do likewise. Thus the Raipur District Janata Dal Committee, staunch Shukla loyalists, even adopted a resolution supporting Shekhar and Shukla : godfearing?

VP and condemning Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal. But then Shukla went to Patharia, met his guru and announced his decision to support Chandra Shekhar. His bewildered supporters followed suit. Only Tarun Prasad Chatterjee, MLA and president of the Raipur District Janata Dal Committee (Urban), chose to go on record as having conveyed to VP his loyalty and support.

However, coming back to godman Radhe Shyam, all associates of Shukla are convinced that the panic trips to the guru do benefit the politician immensely. Whatever heights Shukla has reached, he believes the blessings of Radhe Shyamji to be behind them.

And the Prime Minister isn't doing so badly either. The windfall that changed the colour of his life might have been a pleasant blessing from the great tantrik, Bhagvan Ram.

So that is the story of Ram and Shyam, the magic wands that might rule the country from behind the curtains. ●

Air hostesses protest against the new retirement policy

Air India's hostesses are on the war-path again. Since the government decided, on 16 October last year, to "ground" hostesses at 45, the ladies have been agitating against what they call an unjust and sexist enforcement. And demanding the retirement age be set at 58. The decision is particularly unfair, they point out, since all over the world the retirement age of air-hostesses is 60 years. Air India, by implementing this new age limit, is guilty of treating its hostesses as mere sex objects.

"We are ready to go all the way to Parliament," says R.E. Ramanathan, secretary of the Air Corporations Employees Union (ACEU). "The message is clear: you had better stop flying by the time you are 45, because passengers prefer nubile, young girls. Older women make them uncomfortable."

The airline officials seem to have no plans regarding re-employment of the grounded hostesses. "Besides says Ramanathan, "there is a lot of resentment among the ground staff. They have already begun taking exception to 'untrained personnel' jumping the rank. Will Air India, then, relegate every grounded hostess to the post of a clerk?"

The airlines officials, however, are in no mood to accept these demands. A senior airlines manager has no trouble explaining why. "People whotravel do not want old women serving them."

The women have formed an organisation called the Air India Hostesses Association, to fight the unjust rule. But this organisation is yet to be recognised

Trapped between an insensitive management, an unfair ruling and a lot of red-tape, the ladies are in a tough situation. But they are determined to fight and be treated as efficient workers, not just pretty faces. ●

Biju feigns neutrality regarding the changes at the Centre

ORISSA

On 16 November, after more than six months, and in the wake of the split in the Janata Dal, the party wing in Orissa held an executive meeting. And the state party neither pledged support for V.P Singh, nor condemned the dissident leader Chandra Shekhar. This surprised quite a few, no doubt, especially since Biju was toeing the VP line till a short while earlier.

The unanimously adopted resolution merely granted full authority to the chief minister—who is also the president of the state party - to unite the factions at the national level. Apparently not worried about sounding ridiculous, the resolution authorised Biju to decide on the future course of action, since "under his enlightened guidance and farsighted leadership, the future of the Dal is bound to bounce back to life and prosperity".

However, not all Dal-men backed the resolution without reservations. Some disagreed, but did not dare go against the wish of their leader , Patnaik. They did demand a positive stand from the CM, wanting to know which way exactly the state party was leaning, and pointing out that the executive meeting had been summoned after so long at this crucial time, precisely because the party needed to adopt such an unambiguous stand. It was clear that these legislators were in favour of VP and itching to condemn Chandra Shekhar. Senior MLA Harish Baxipatra had even expressed his desire to move a resolution to this effect, but backed off fearing Patnaik's ire. Amar Satpathy's proposed amendment to the resolution, which was supposed to be backed by Umesh Swain and Raja Rajendra Pratap Swain, met a similar fate.

Biju Patnaik: Inching towards Shekhar?

So the pro-VP MLAs, though the overwhelming majority, failed to dent the neutral resolution passed. In fact, possibly the only positive thing that they achieved was restraining the eager Biju from lending "constructive support" to the Chandra Shekhar government, as he had announced earlier. Also to avoid a confrontation with the pro-VP members, Ashok Das, the working president of the state party, said to the press that the state party continues to be in the Dal led by S.R. Bommai and V.P. Singh. This reference had been carefully avoided in the resolution, which was actually drafted by Das.

But despite this careful neutrality, Biju's leanings show. He justified not condemning Shekhar with the argument that it was important for the state to have friendly relations with the Centre, simply for the sake of assistance. He also sternly reminded the pro-VP MLAs that all of them had been elected not in the name of VP, but in the name of Biju, so would they kindly "stop chanting VP...VP..".

The fangs were spared, however, since the former Union minister Srikant Jena, a staunch supporter of VP and keen rival of Biju, was absent, along with other pro-VP members, as the executive meeting coincided with the Lok Sabha's special session. But although Biju still looms supreme over his political fiefdom in his home state, his strength might be sagging. Times of trouble lie ahead. And this time the eternal carrot of ministerial berths may not be of much help.●

High on gas

A new chemical promises to slash fuel costs

Swapan Kumar Das slid into the driver's seat, turned the ignition key and started thinking hard. The cost of petrol had gone up again, and the 120 km drive to work and back would be quite unfeasible. He needed to find a way to save petrol. Ten years later, Das is handing out little bottles of fluid to taxi and auto-rickshaw drivers, free of cost. The fluid, when added to petrol or diesel, gives 30 to 40 per cent extra mileage.

"Ever since the acute shortage of fuel following the Gulf crisis, I have an average of 70 taxi and auto drivers coming to me every day," says Das. "The liquid doesn't damage the engine, it has passed the chemical scrutiny of the National Test House."

The magic additive, Petrosol, is derived from coal tar. It can boost the efficiency of any petroleum-based fuel: petrol, diesel, kerosene or furnace oil. And Sen has different varieties to suit different fuels- -Petrosol/P for petrol, Petrosol/K for kerosene, and so on. All one needs to do is add half cc of the liquid to a litre of fuel. "It's just a catalytic agent," explains Sen, "which produces oxygen in the combustion chamber and lowers the flashpoint of the fuel. Since the fuel then ignites at a lower temperature, its efficiency increases." A benzene derivative, this is completely combustible and stands above other agents which increase fuel combustion because of its special anti-knock characteristic.

It seems that the Bangladesh government tested his chemical a few months ago and pronounced that fuel efficiency is increased by more than 25 per cent in foreign cars. Hindustan Motors is examining the additive now. And almost certain of a major breakthrough, a lot of industrial groups have approached the inventor: like the Reliance Group, the Bangur Industries, the Pittsburg Paint Group of the USA or consultants Harry and Allen Lindsay of Ireland. But Sen has refused all and is waiting for a grant from the United Bank of India.

"These names are well-known, I grant, but are they respected?" asks the concerned inventor. "Besides, the national interest comes first. If this works out, then we spend less on petroleum imports." Which make up a huge chunk of our total import bill. So Sen has got a cottage and small-scale industries licence and plans to set up his very own 'Strans Otto Systems'. The name, though strange, is important, says the inventor with a very straight face. "If I can't convince," he grins, "I would prefer to confuse."

SEN, 50, has very little formal education. After graduating from high school, he had to fend for himself and his widowed mother, and had no opportunity for continuing his studies. Nevertheless, the self-taught chemist has eight patents to his name, both Indian and foreign. His passion for tinkering has made him a master of converting waste to wealth: his earlier inventions include tiles and decorative items from water hyacinth, water and fire-proof material from sawdust and high-strength wood substitutes from straw and plywood waste.

Petrosol can be further enriched to serve as a fuel by itself. The inventor uses the gas derived from this modified liquid to cook. But his car uses the fluid as a catalyst. In the last five years, Sen has saved an incredible amount on petrol. And others are catching on.

"For the past one year, my cost of petrol has decreased by a sure 35 per cent," says Sadhan Adhikari, a bank employee, who has been a regular user and is awe-struck by Petrosol's properties. "My Ambassador and my friend's Maruti give better mileage. Besides, my bike runs smoother, with less smoke emission and leaves the spark-plug cleaner," he elaborates enthusiastically. Possibly because the temperature is reduced by 10 degrees and the fuel is completely burnt out, leaving practically no deposits.

If the project is as successful as it now seems likely to be, India might survive the oil crunch. •

Chocolate lead

An ad takes up all of The Afternoon Despatch & Courier's front page

When Marlowe's Faustus sold his soul to the devil, he at least, had adequate compensation. The company of Helen of Troy whose face had 'launched a thousand ships and burnt the topless towers of Ilium'. But when a newspaper sells its soul, in this case, its front page, to accommodate an advertisement for chocolates, the journalistic fraternity is quite rightly indignant

The newspaper concerned was Bombay's The Afternoon Despatch & Courier (ADC), edited by Behram Contractor, popularly known as Busybee. On a day Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar was in Bombay, readers were shocked that the entire front page of the newspaper had been taken over by Nestle's Chocolates. Gloated a senior ad person with the paper, "We made a neat little packet or, say, a good chunk of money, but I cannot let you in on the secret". The editor, who is unsparing in his criticism of other papers (he called the 48-page new avatar of Sunday Observer, a sheer waste of newsprint!) was quoted as saying, "It was an honour to carry the ad. One has to keep doing new things."

The editorial staff of the paper were not so happy. There were rumours they volunteered to collect and pitch in an equal amount, provided the ad was not published. And while the advertising fraternity crowed about the coup, the more professional among them, like C.Y. Gopinath (a brilliant writer himself) said, "The front and the edit pages belong to the readers. These pages are the special ones which no amount of money can buy. That's why replacing news on the front page with an ad becomes blasphemous."

The city's number one eveninger, Mid-day, had also been approached by the ad agency but did not succumb to the lure. But the ADC had always been an ad man's paper. Look at the way it had been projecting Lintas chief, Alyque Padamsee's Othello. Almost every day, there would be an interview, a photograph or a write up about the play!

That the 'chocolate-led' issue sold 72,000 copies should be taken with a pinch of salt, though it may not go well with the chocolate taste. The ADC's circulation is nowhere near that figure. Meanwhile, one of the hotshots of the paper came out with the statement that the front page would never be sold again. That, however, is like a girl who had lost her virginity claiming virtuously, "Oh, no, it won't happen again."

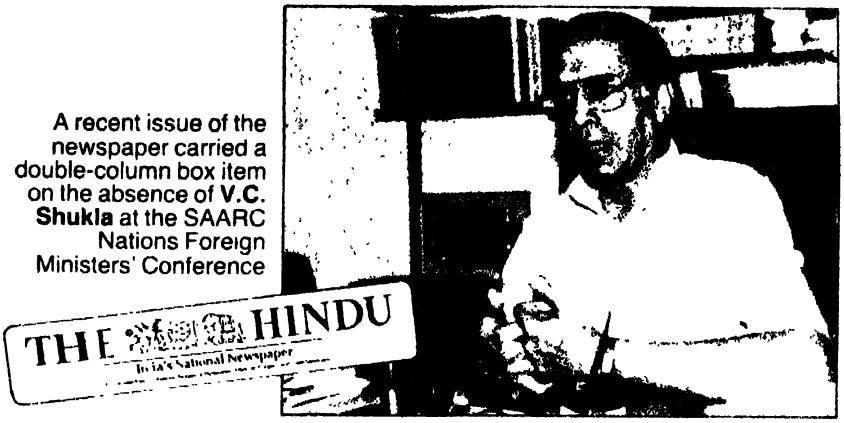
Premature conclusions

Bombay was shocked by the killings of two nuns at a suburban orphanage. A couple of days after the killings, came further shocks Indian Express and The Times of India, published news reports that the postmortem reports on the victims revealed they were used to frequent sexual intercourse and that one of them was suspected to have been suffering from venereal disease. The Express report, actually, led with this bit of shocking news.

Immediately there was a furore. Christian associations, church persons and women's groups came out with strong statements denouncing the maligning of the dead. Subsequently, the Times and other papers carried a story quoting the crime branch of the city police (which had taken over the investigations) that the postmortem report did not mention "either about sexual intercourse or venereal disease" and that all such conclusions were "premature".

The publication of such details raises quite a few issues. How come only the Times and the Express carried references to the sexual intercourse and venereal disease? If there had been no mention of these in the report, how did they come to be published? The police explained that genital swabs and other samples from the bodies of the victims had been sent to the Forensic Laboratory to ascertain whether sexual assault could be the motive for the crime.



It appears that somebody at the lab had drawn premature conclusions and leaked them to the press. While wishing that the Times and the Express had properly checked the authenticity of the leaks, it is regrettable that the press seems to be obsessed with the 'rape' angle. Every single report on the killings mentioned over and over again, that the women had not been raped.

Murder is messy, foul. In order to solve the crime and book the guilty, the personal, intimate details of the victims had to be made public. Sexual motives would throw an entirely new light on the crime. But why speculate on these?

A change of style

Gimmicks on the pages of the venerable The Hindu! No, no, not Chitra Subramaniam and yet another expose on the Bofors. A recent issue of the newspaper, carried a double-column box item in bold print on the op-ed page. Headlined, 'Dear Foreign Minister, We Await Your Arrival in Male', the box item was in the format of a letter from K.K. Katyal, the paper's New Delhi Bureau Chief to the absentee Indian external affairs minister. Katyal was among the media persons who had assembled at Male for the SAARC Nations Foreign Ministers Conference and had been quite upset at the 'unprecedented event' of the 'doleful sight' of the empty chair for the minister!

A recent issue of the newspaper carried a double-column box item on the absence of V.C. Shukla at the SAARC Nations Foreign Ministers' Conference

The letter then goes on to cover New Delhi political gossip about the Prime Minister's problems over Cabinet formation, making certain tongue-in-cheek observations on the issue. For a paper which had to explain to its readers that the Art Buchwald column was not to be taken seriously, the op-ed page box was a bit revolutionary and quite a change from the highly personalised reporting style of the late G.K. Reddy, Katyal's predecessor.

The letter format suits the edit page better. I remember, Mr Sham Lal of The Times of India, addressing Jean Paul Sartre or Albert Camus and questioning them where they thought the world was going? But on the op-ed page, that too on a current political issue, Katyal's experiment stood out like a sore thumb. •

The Sixth World Cup Boxing Championship was a damp squib

That amateur boxing will always remain a minor sport is evident every time the event is held anywhere in India. If further proof were needed, it came in the form of the sixth World Cup competition. Touted as the biggest sporting event in the country, it came and went practically unnoticed. And, had not India won a bronze medal, the first ever, in a world meet – it would certainly have been written off as a colossal waste of time and money.

Bombay was allotted four of the twelve weight categories by the Amateur International Boxing Association. The other eight had been divided between Havana and Dublin. This was the first time that the World Cup competition had been divided into three sections. It was also the first time that India was staging the event.

But there seemed nothing to recommend it, not even the fact that the super-heavyweight category was included in the first leg. Bombay, traditionally a sports-minded city, seemed to have ignored its existence. It appeared as if there were more officials and ushers at the Bombay Gymkhana than spectators.

In fact, according to an usher, "people were being cajoled into filling the 5000-odd seats." But even this "free offer" was not being taken readily by sports enthusiasts. They preferred the national swimming that was on simultaneously at Andheri and the Rovers Cup football at the Cooperage. Ultimately, it was left to members of the Bombay Gymkhana to bring in friends and acquaintances.

It is not as if boxing is not popular, especially the professional variety. But the build-up for this event did not appeal to Bombayites. And the vast difference between amateur and professional boxing was never more in evidence. A title bout in any weight category of professional boxing would attract many times the number attending an amateur bout.

An attempt was made this time to increase the duration of a fight. Instead of the usual nine minutes into three rounds, AIBA introduced two-minute fights spread over five rounds. The intervals of two minutes was reduced to one. Boxing, essentially an easy in courage and craft, was reduced to a frantic search for point-scoring punches. From the spectator's point of view, this was not even as exciting as the sparring session of a professional.

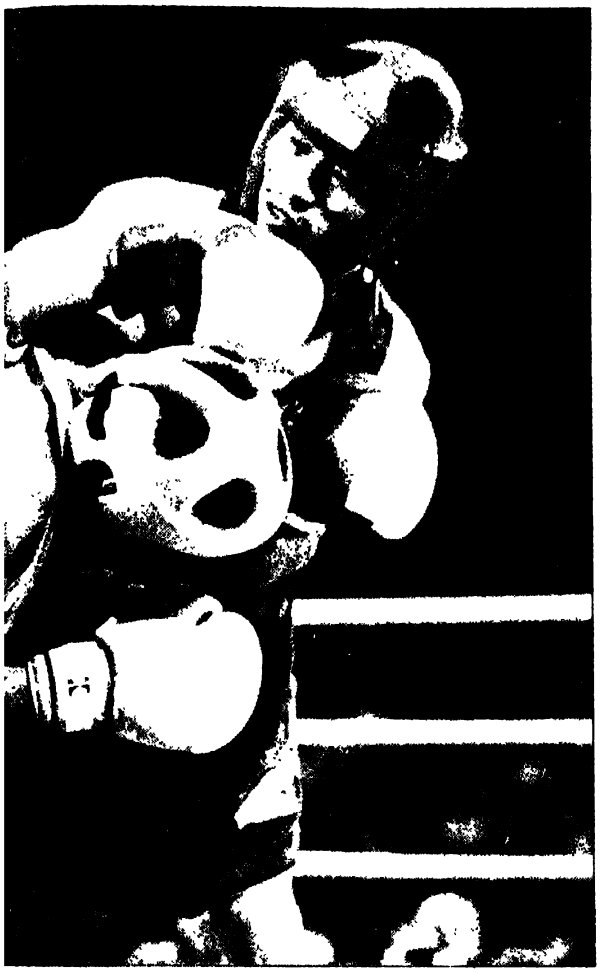
From India's point of view, however, this was a good investment. While the whopping expenses, estimated at about Rs 60 lakhs, were borne by a sponsor, the Indian Amateur Boxing Federation managed to get Doordarshan coverage on the second channels of the country.

From the boxers' point of view, the event provided the opportunity of getting top-class adversaries. Pugilists from over thirty countries turned up with their best boxers, only one for each weight. As hosts, India was allowed to field two boxers in each category.

But even here, the public was short-changed. The Soviet Union, one of the strongest countries in amateur boxing, did not send a team. Nor did Australia and a couple of others. But Pakistan set a bad example. Inspite of the fact that the president of the international body happens to be Pakistan's Anwar Chaudhury, even after confirming entry, the country did not send a squad.

Eric Griffin of the United States

RASHBEHAR DAS



RASHBEHAR DAS

It will be interesting to see what punishment is meted out to the defaulting countries. Taking action against the USSR is almost impossible. The Pakistan association will not take it lying down if their own representative in the world body agrees to sanctions against the boxers and the association concerned.

Chaudhury's reaction to the news of his team's withdrawal was interesting. When first asked for his reaction by an Indian news agency, he hinted that it was due to the unsettled conditions in this country in the wake of the Babri Masjid issue. Then, probably after second thoughts, he told the press politics had nothing to do with the team's absence, "they are idiots for not coming".

From India's point of view, the championship being held at home came as a boon. "Computers have been installed to ensure fair and correct decisions," the organisers said. But then, these were being operated by the judges themselves. There were several decisions which boxing pundits said should have gone against Indian boxers but didn't, perhaps because the competition was being held here.

Zhoramthanga (facing camera), the gutsy, experienced, pugilist had the measure of Yadav from the start and emerged the winner. He won India the bronze medal

Dharmendra Singh Yadav, an 18-year-old with a great future, was distinctly lucky that he was boxing in India when he was given a points verdict against West Germany's Jan Quast. The Germans had separate boxing federations despite the October reunification. Quast came into his quarter-final bout with cool confidence and certainly had the measure of the Indian in at least three of the five rounds—the first, second and the fourth. But these were apparently not enough to merit victory, which went Yadav's way, with a comfortable 11-7 points.

The same was the case of Mizoram's Zhoramthanga. The 24-year-old sports officer is easily the gutsiest boxer in India today. But that was not enough to gain a victory of Robert Wen of Scotland. What made spectators break out into derisive laughter was the scoreline—16 to four. If at all Zhoramthanga won, it was by a whisker. Mukund Killekar also had the benefit of a benign band of judges, while Sarabjit Singh missed his Cinderella shoes in the semi-finals when he met Svilen Russinov of Bulgaria. He lasted just a round and a half. In the box-off for bronze, he lasted a little longer.

The semi-finals also saw high drama when the over-enthusiastic Zhoramthanga initially refused to heed India's Soviet coach, Anatoli Volkov. The latter threw in the towel immediately after the third round against Eric Griffin of the United States. He was not willing to give up his fight with the world champion although he was taking quite a beating. He gesticulated wildly and then labelled the coach's decision as unfair.

But Zhoramthanga could derive some consolation from the fact that, on that day, four of the eight bouts were stopped by the seconds of the losers well within the duration of the bouts. This was a professional strategy adopted by coaches to avoid a knockout decision, which debars a boxer from entering the ring for the next four weeks. This holds true of bouts stopped by the referee, too.

But this means the spectators were robbed of good contests just so that a boxer could slot himself for a medal. The paying public wants a contest, not a medal.

Ultimately, India did gain a medal through Zhoramthanga. The more experienced pugilist had the measure of Yadav from the start and emerged an overwhelming winner. He also netted Rs one lakh as a medal winner for India—just compensation for his heroism and tenacity from being a school dropout to emerge as a champion in the light-fly class. At least from India's point of view. But there was one hard-luck story here—that of Manoj Pingale. The Indian contingent had placed a lot of hope on this lad who had reached the third round of the Seoul Olympics, losing to the ultimate bronze medallist. Pune's boxing hope lost to Wayne McCullough of Ireland in the bantamweight by a margin of 27-24. But he is dedicated enough to pursue his goal of glory in the future.

On paper, the Indian performance is praiseworthy—three boxers in the semi-finals of the World Cup and one bronze medal. But further progress will depend on the kind of coaching imparted to the boxers. While everyone is full of praise for the reticent Volkov, they do realise the folly of not having assistant coaches to help him. This was tried out during the World Cup and it was a great success. B.S. Thapa, Isaac Amaladass and D. Devan, all former national boxers, were inducted as assistants to Volkov.

What the boxers feel is that they do not get enough competitive boxing. They need regular outings, preferably against better opposition. But who will arrange this? When last seen, the IABF chief, Aspy Adajania, was busy trying to sell video cassettes of the 65 or so bouts in the World Cup to foreigners. The price? Twenty dollars a bout. One can understand his enthusiasm—the money is to be shared between Doordarshan and IABF—but what good will it do Indian boxing? ●

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—ARIES

This relationship might see a lot of conflicts, since both the partners are born fighters. The Aries man, though willing to listen to the Scorpio woman's point of view, will not be less stubborn than the latter when the two disagree.

Blood isn't thicker

The desertions from the Raja's camp continue. The latest to change sides is V.P. Singh's brother-in-law Mandhata Singh, a Rajasthan MLA.

V.P. Singh: exit, the brother-in-law

Mandhata Singh has left the ranks of the Janata Dal to join the splinter group, headed by Digvijay Singh (not the deputy minister, finance), which has allied with the BJP, in Rajasthan.

The Raja—or the Rani, for that matter—can't be too pleased about this. But Mandhata Singh is unperturbed.

After all, isn't he tipped for a ministry in the near future?

Straight drive

Cricket jargon seems to have caught on in a big way with politicians. And we're not just referring to Margaret Thatcher and Sir Geoffrey Howe. Even Gujarat chief minister Chimanbhai Patel has begun talking in cricketing metaphors when it comes to describing his political career.

Recently, addressing a group of newsmen, Patel said: "For the past 20 years, I had been fielding (in Opposition). But now I will hit sixers and boundaries and complete two centuries (terms)."

Yes, we all know where we've heard that one before.

It wasn't me, it wasn't me!

Rajiv Gandhi may cry himself hoarse about not having had anything to do with the constitution of the council of ministers, but nobody seems willing to believe him. No, not even the members of the Mahila Congress.

Soon after the swearing-in ceremony, several irate women workers demonstrated in front of the Congress president for allowing the appointment of a pro-sati leader such as Kalyan Singh Kalvi to the ministry. His induction as a minister was nothing short of an insult to Indian womanhood, they informed Rajiv.

Kalyan Singh Kalvi: creating problems

Gandhi made all his usual noises about Shekhar, and Shekhar alone, having decided on the ministers. But to little avail. The protests continued.

As, no doubt, the misconception.

Hey, that's my letter!

One of the first things Yashwant Sinha did after becoming finance minister was ask for the file comprising complaints sent in by various members of Parliament. He would take action on these, the minister decided, before embarking on his other duties.

Yashwant Sinha: apply, apply, no reply

But he was in for a surprise. For as many as 27 letters were written by Yashwant Sinha, MP. Many of them were several months old, on which the Janata Dal(S) leader had assumed, mistakenly as it turned out, that action had already been taken. Little had the former bureaucrat known then, that his predecessor, Madhu Dandavate, had little use for his helpful suggestions.

But Sinha can hardly complain. He is now finance minister in place of the good professor, and can implement them under his own supervision.

The buck stops here

You've got to hand it to Harmohan Dhawan and Digvijay Singh. They certainly know how to beat party MPs at their own game.

Soon after being sworn in as civil aviation minister and deputy minister in charge of finance, the two leaders announced that if any MP wanted some work done by their ministries, they should approach them personally, instead of resorting to the usual letter-writing.

Generally what most members do when approached by their constituents for some favour or the other is to write in to the concerned minister, and then promptly forget all about it. When questioned about the progress on the matter, they reply, "Sorry, but the minister refuses to take any action on the matter. You know how people become once they come into power."

With one stroke, Dhawan and Singh have destroyed that scenario.

Dal(S) MPs will have to think of more inventive methods of passing the buck.

CHECK-LIST

Who's close to Chandra Shekhar

- Kamal Morarka: Has been there almost from the beginning. A Bombay industrialist with vaguely leftist sympathies, Morarka has stuck by Chandra Shekhar since the latter's days as a Young Turk.

  He is the man Shekhar trusts the most because he knows that Morarka not only has unflinching loyalty, but is also rich enough in his own right to not want to make money out of politics.

- Yashwant Sinha: The man Shekhar depends on the most. A former IAS officer, Sinha was special assistant to Karpoori Thakur when he decided to join politics.

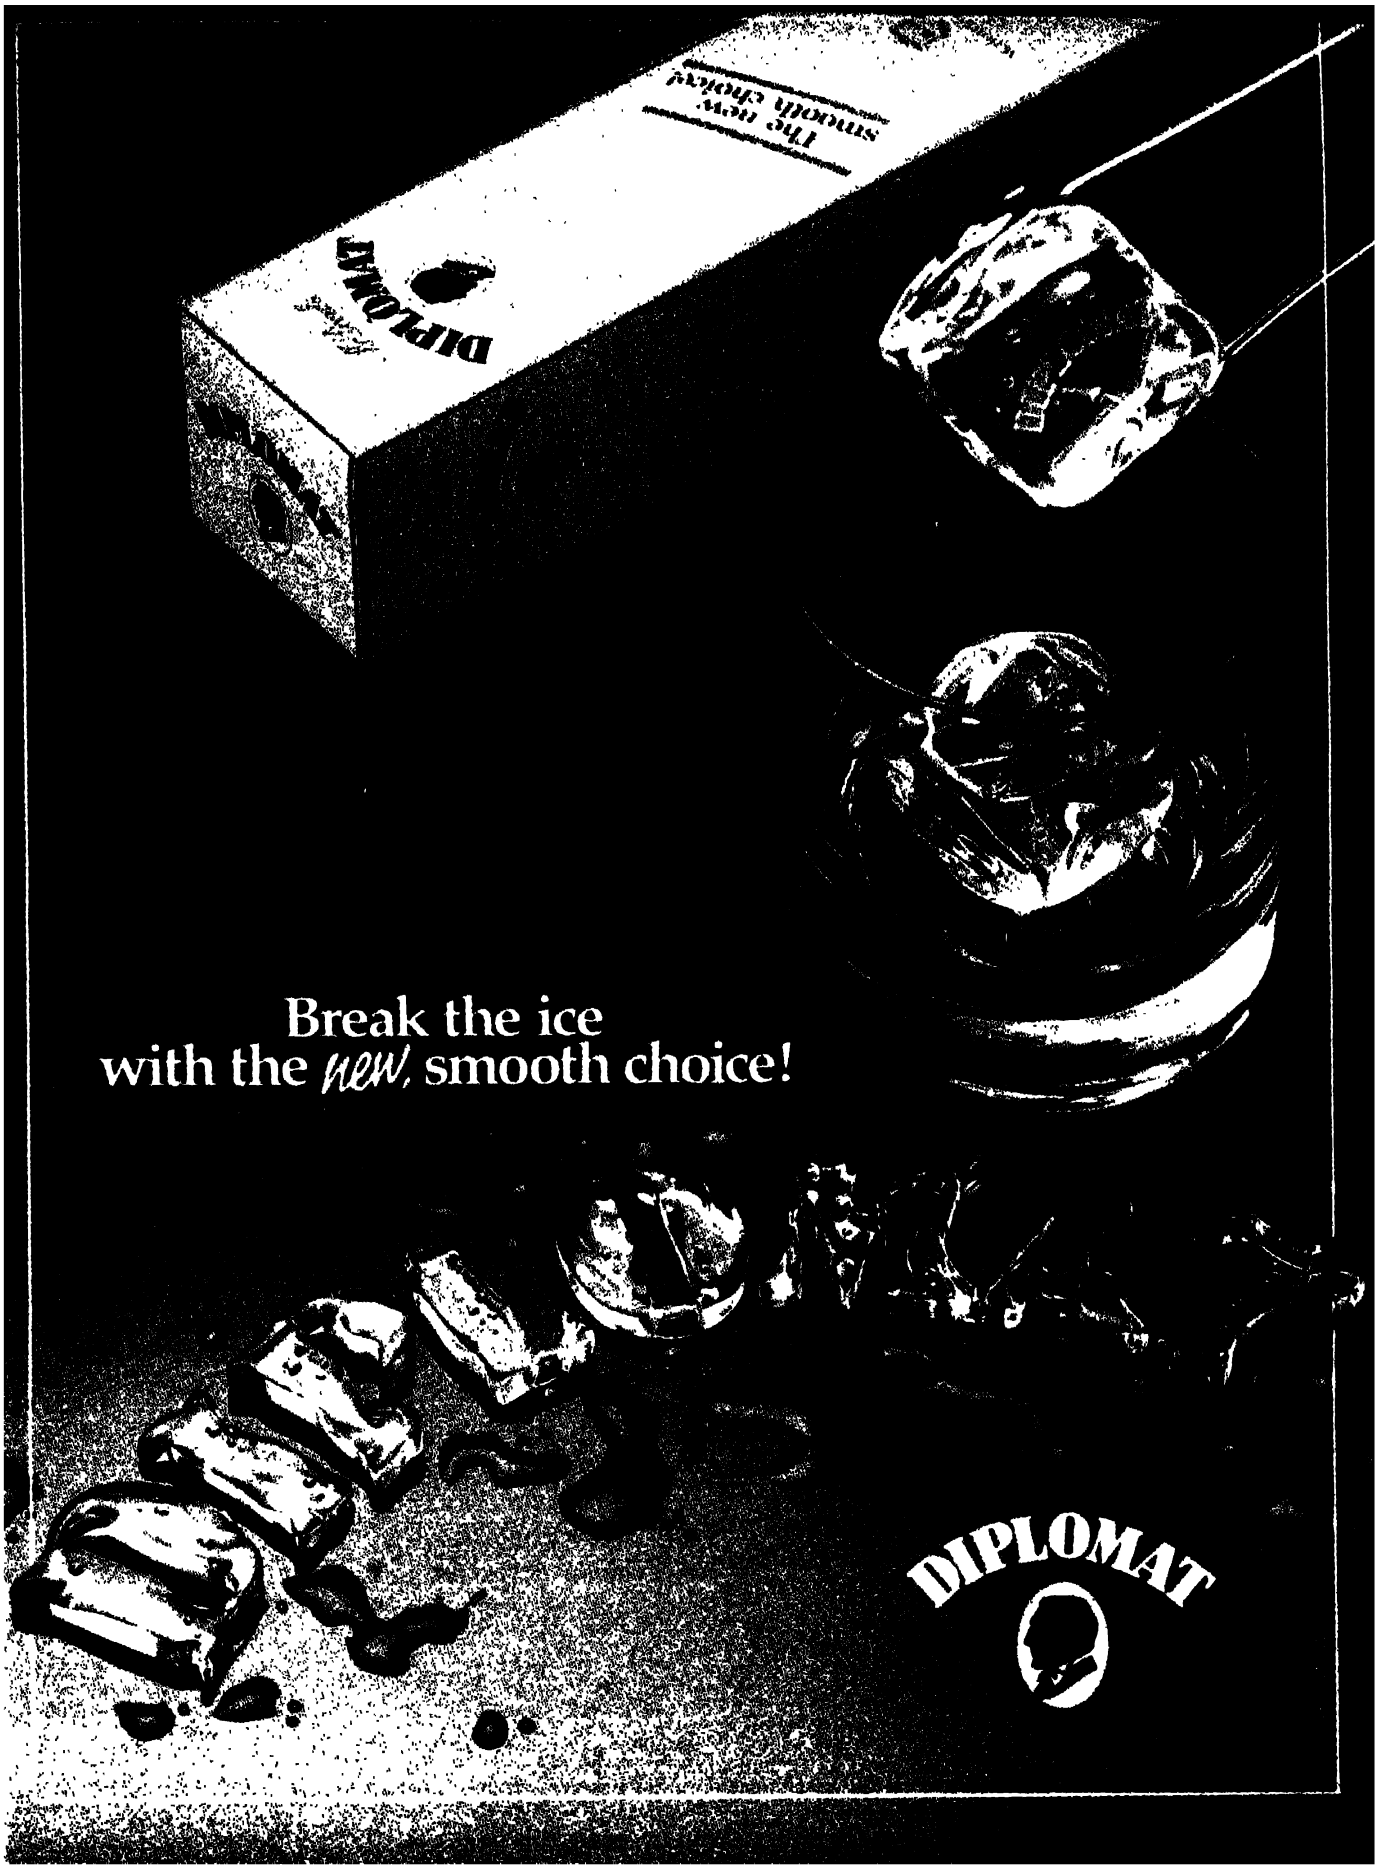
  From 1984-90, he functioned as Shekhar's one-man secretariat, during which period he convinced his leader of his ability.

- Subramaniam Swamy: That he should now be one of Shekhar's most voluble supporters is ironic. In 1984, he was expelled from the Janata Party for abusing Shekhar in print.

  Over the last three years, however, Swamy and Shekhar have made up and the bearded boss of Ballia seems fond of the former Harvard professor's iconoclastic streak.

- Harmohan Dhawan: An industrialist and hotel owner from Chandigarh, Dhawan is a hard-core Shekhar loyalist. Along with Sinha, he led the signature campaign for V.P. Singh's removal and took on the Raja (with Shekhar's tacit approval) before his boss was ready to play his hand.

- C.V. Gautam: Debonair, bearded, Chandra Shekhar aide, who has emerged as the V. George of the government. Gautam has stuck by him since 1977 and understands his leader's mind. Within the Shekhar camp, his relative sophistication has led some rustic party workers to complain about his "five-star" leanings.



Harmohan Dhawan: beating the system

On the comeback trail

With the Congress-supported Chandra Shekhar government in power, two high-level officers may well be on the verge of staging a comeback: former director of the Intelligence Bureau (IB) M.K. Narayanan and the former cabinet secretary, T. Seshan.

Narayanan's chances are rated as excellent after the Prime Minister upbraided the current chief of the IB, R.P. Joshi, saying that his bureau spent all its time chasing politicians, instead of pursuing terrorists, foreign agents and the like.

Seshan, too, has become more high-profile now that a Congress government, if only by proxy, is back in South Block. And he may well end up playing an important role in the new dispensation.

Time to act

At last, Chandra Shekhar achieved his goal by joining hands with Rajiv Gandhi (The making of the Prime Minister, 18—24 November). We have to wait and see how he wins the trust of the people. All are anxiously waiting for any activity that will lead to the betterment of the nation.

B.N. Bose, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ After 30 years in politics, there is very little left to be said about Chandra Shekhar. But Shekhar still remains a myth. For no one knows how well he is going to fare at the highest seat of the land

But one thing is certain. While V.P. Singh tried to divide and rule, the new Prime Minister will seek to heal and unify. India at last seems to have a Prime Minister who can look his people in the eye Though he relies heavily on Congress support, he has the advantage of being untried and untested. He has been waiting in the wings for so many years to rule the nation. Therefore, one can only hope for the best.

Surendra Singh, Patna (Bihar)

■ The Raja played into the hands of Chandra Shekhar. Had V.P. Singh resigned as soon as BJP withdrew support, he could have succeeded in keeping Shekhar

Chandra Shekhar: in the hot seat

■ There can be no doubt that money power played an important role in the recent political crisis in the capital. The leading industrialists of the country descended on Delhi as soon as the BJP withdrew support to the government. If there is an iota of truth in this, then it is a shame that the world's largest democracy was a pawn in the hands of a few rich people.

Chitra Menon, Mysore (Karnataka)

out of the running for the prime ministership. For, Shekhar had only a few supporters and was not at all prepared to stake his claim to form the government. By hanging on to office till 7 November, VP gave him the time to get his act together.

What made matters easier for Shekhar was the Raja's avowed preference for a mid-term poll for which he did not find any takers. Shekhar was opposed to this idea and he cashed in on this issue and pulled the rug from under the Raja's feet.

Irfan Ahmed, Lucknow (Uttar Pradesh)

True India

In his latest novel, The World Of Nagaraj, R.K. Narayan once again shows his inimitable style (Profound and simple, 11—17 November). His depiction of Indian town life through Malgudi is popular throughout the world and his characters come to life.

Unlike many others, Narayan has kept his identity as a true Indian who has never forsaken his homeland but preferred to remain in a Malgudi-like India.

Because of this, Narayan remains one of the most readable and sought after Indian novelists.

Harekrushna Mahanta, New Delhi

Ineffective

The cover story (The desperate hours, 11—17 November) exposes the unsuccessful attempt by V.P. Singh, and his coterie of advisers to cling to power. The former Prime Minister proved himself to be a disaster. He knew his limitations yet took up the challenge of leading the nation and thereby dragged the country into the doldrums.

The implementation of the Mandal Commission recommendations is one such example. Previous governments would not touch it for fear of far-reaching consequences. V.P. Singh's decision to accept the Mandal report was only a move to counter the threat of Devi Lal. It was an ill-conceived move that has raised a furore which is yet to die down. Moreover, Advani's rath yatra could easily have been stopped before it actually got under way. By the time a decision was taken,it only served to add fuel to the fire. The Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid issue is still unresolved. Nobody knows where to go from here to solve the problem.

The economy is in a mess and it is the common man who has to bear the burden

V.P. Singh: followed the divide and rule policy of escalating prices.

Only a handful of people enjoy power at the cost of the poor citizens. It seems India is destined to suffer.

Jagadish C. Patra, Matkambeda (Orissa)

■ It has been rightly pointed out that Chandra Shekhar has been blinded by his lust for power and has forgotten the lessons of the past. By depending on Rajiv Gandhi to stay in power, Chandra Shekhar has given up all his principles. He has betrayed the people.

Shekhar is the Charan Singh of 1990. Rajiv Gandhi is the de facto ruler of India. The crisis reveals that Rajiv has inherited much of his mother's political shrewdness.

Chandra Shekhar is bound to have a short tenure at the Centre during which there will be a complete breakdown of law and order in India.

Rohit R. Das, Bangalore (Karnataka)

Self before service

Though the government passed the CPA, the irony is that most government departments refuse to be covered under the Act (Fight back, 4—10 November). The government is still wary about making the Act powerful. There are innumerable complaints against services provided by government concerns.

As consumerism is still in its infancy, compensations are rarely awarded. There is no justice for the consumer in these days of shoddy products and merchandise.

A. Srinivasa Murthy, Secunderabad (Andhra Pradesh)

A wrong assessment

I somehow couldn't agree with Khushwant Singh when he praises Arun Shourie and Indian Express sky high (Mahatma Shourie, 4—10 November).

Public memory is short but not so short to forget the strike the management resorted to following the non-implementation of the Bachawat Award at their Delhi office.

Let the management not forget that employees are an asset and that the Indian Express empire has been built on their toil and sweat.

S.M. Annam, Secunderabad (Andhra Pradesh)

A secular force

Reports from Ayodhya once again bring to our attention the ineffectiveness of our civil information system and the organisation of our peacekeeping forces (The battle of Ayodhya, 7—11 November). Muslims have been wrongly blamed for provocative acts that spark off communal riots. However, the Muslims have been the ones who are demanding a restructuring of the security forces.

Securitymen clash with kar sevaks in Ayodhya: taking sides

Reviewing the whole Ayodhya episode, it is high time that there was a large-scale revamping of our security forces. In the national interest, all communities should have representation in the forces.

This will prevent any bias from creeping in during the maintenance of law and order.

Mohammed Rais, New Delhi

Spreading hatred

L.K. Advani has become a threat to the nation's unity (Jinnah of the Hindus 18—24 November). Those who are making efforts to turn India into a Hindu state are certainly no lovers of their country. India belongs not to Hindus alone, but to all religious communities. It will be a good idea for Advani to give up his idea of forming a Hindu state.

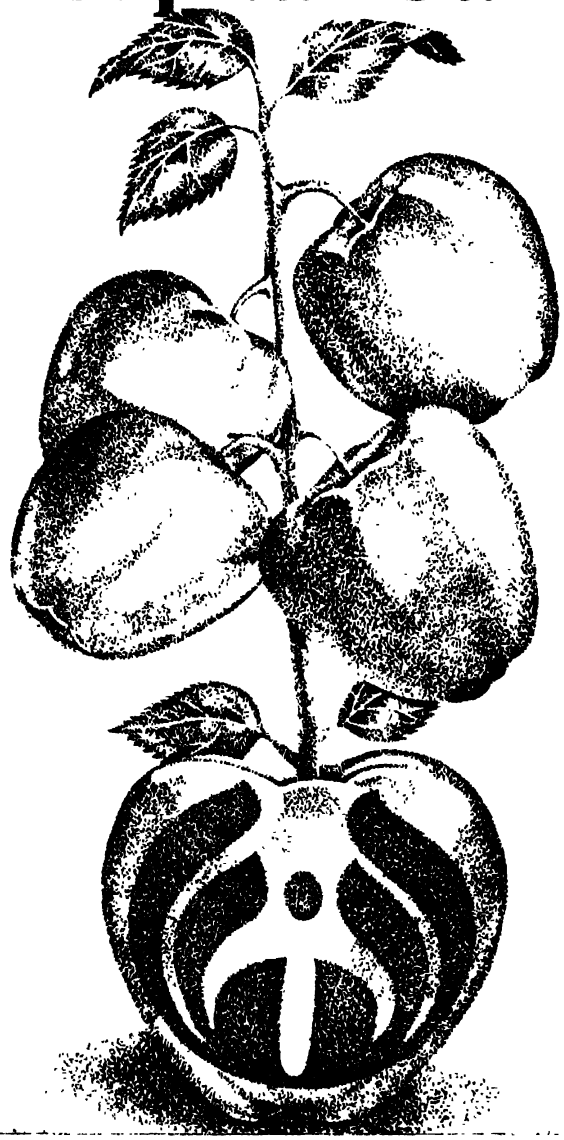
When one group tries to dominate another, it only invites trouble and the net result is violence which leads to chaos and anarchy.

S. Hussain, Dibrugarh (Assam)

Taking on the oil lobby

The article Kill to profit (11—17 November) exposing the nefarious game that the "Telia Rajas" are playing in the edible oil sector has been objective and comprehensive. The battle that the NDDB has launched to assist and help the oilseed producers and consumers to come out the clutches of the a very powerful section of the oil kings has also been put in the proper perspective.

L.K. Advani: dividing the people



NDDB has demonstrated that the issues of mismanagement of the edible oil sector, tax evasion, adulteration and speculation can no longer be swept under the carpet. The Market Intervention Operation would need at least 15-20 per cent share of the edible oil market to tackle these unhealthy trade practices. In the meantime, one will have to live with the confusing signals that are sent out to the market by certain vested interests.

We are passing through a phase when the oilseed economy is being moved from the parallel economy to the official one. The primary cause of inflation in the country has been attributed to unaccounted money in the parallel economy. How much of that is contributed by the oilseed sector is anybody's guess.

I am intrigued by the statement that somebody has made about my leaving the Dairy Board under physical and mental pressures. While it is true that I had received several threatening calls and the task of market intervention is not an easy one, my decision to opt for voluntary retirement from the NDDB on attaining the age of 50 was to help me concentrate on policy issues rather than operational matters. In any case, the article has brought out that the "oil lobby till today is trying to beat us, says Aneja, still talking as if he is very much with the NDDB team, but for us, there is no going back. Sure, there have been pressures. But we have learnt to live with them". This itself takes the thrust of the statement that I had sought voluntary retirement due to my "mental and physical state". The vested interests, including those in the government, that could have made the above statement are surely in for a surprise.

KHUSHWANT SINGH

Simla, Shimla, Shame-la

In 1984 Colonel Ochterlony (of Calcutta's Ochterlony Memorial, now Shaheed Minar) was busy finding out the lie of the land between the plains of eastern Punjab, the Shivaliks and the Himalayan ranges upto Tibet. The Gorkhas, who had conquered these territories, had been defeated, their forests were being demolished. Three years later, two Scottish officers surveyed the tract. And four years after their survey, Captain Charles Pratt Kennedy, political agent and garrison officer posted at Sabathu, one of the chains of hill cantonments built in preparation for a war against the Sikhs, trekked uphill and arrived at Simla. He was so charmed by the scenery that he built himself a pucca, gabled bungalow named after him. Kennedy House. The news spread to the English community in northern India and families started coming up to Simla to escape the scorching heat of summer in the plains and stayed there till the autumn. By 1830 over 30 houses had been built. The tiny hamlet named Simla after goddess Shyamala Devi grew into chhoti Vilayat, little England, anglicised to Simla.

A succession of governors-general while touring northern territories of their newly acquired domains would end up in Simla to spend the summer months. If the Bengal government could move to Darjeeling, Bombay to Poona and Mahabaleshwar, Madras to Ooty, UP to Nainital or Ranikhet, what was wrong with the central government finding a hill resort of its own? So Bentinck, Auckland, Ellenborough, Hardinge and Dalhousie acclimatised the people to the notion that in the summer months the government would be run from the cool heights of Simla. The fait accompli was given legal sanction by governor-general John Lawrence, who had served in the Punjab and knew the terrain well. He dismissed suggestions of alternate place and opted for Simla. In 1871, the Punjab government also decided to make Simla its summer capital. The place was well-wooded and had many springs; the inhabitants very docile, their women unusually attractive, being petite, almond-eyed and forthcoming. In due course, a rail line running uphill from Kalka through 103 tunnels was laid to Simla, 7000 feet above sea-level. A wide road had already been laid going through Simla to the Tibetan border.

Simla, designed to be a little bit of England, had rigid laws to keep natives out of bounds of areas inhabited by the Whites. If poorly dressed, they were not allowed on the Mall when memsahibs took the evening air on horseback or rickshaws. Indian princes had to have permission to buy or build houses. Some like Cooch Behar and the Nizam were refused permits. For the Whites it was a few hours of work during the mornings, the afternoons and evenings were spent playing polo, tennis, squash or riding. They staged plays, organised fancy dress balls, danced, drank and flirted into the early hours of the morning. It was "red-tape tempered with picnics and adultery" remarked a visitor.

Simla during the Raj: a favourite haunt of the British Simla's glorious time was during World War II. The apartheid was over. Rich and powerful Indians like Sir Khizr Hayat Tiwana, chief minister of Punjab, flouting his plumed turra turban and Sardar Baldev Singh, defence minister, strode ahead of their rickshaws pulled by liveried runners. English governors, commander-in-chiefs, Maharajahs, Rajas and Ranas of hill states could be seen gossiping at Scandal Point. Two famous restaurants, Davicos and Wengers, were packed with Whites and well-to-do Blacks having afternoon tea. The half-a-mile stretch of the Mall was perhaps the best place on India to ogle at opulent Maharanis and Begums decked in their finest jewellery. The whole place was aglitter with well-stocked stores and fragrance of French perfume pervaded the twilight air. No sooner the war ended, the decline of Simla began. Wine shops closed down due to pressure of sustained Congress picketing; one after the other English stores shut shops. Davicos and Wengers went into Indian hands and lost their upper class character. Patisseries were replaced by halwai shops, chaat, paan and bidi stalls erupted like rash on the skin of Simla. It degenerated into a vast slum on the Himalayas, dirty enough to make its inhabitants name it Shame-la.

The story of Simla, its rise and decay, has been fully recorded by Pamela Kanwar in her recently published book, Imperial Simla (Oxford University Press). It is thoroughly researched and thoroughly readable. Lovers of Simla will enjoy reading it.

Shoot and scoot gun

Bofors is still a mystery

What, I asked V.P. Singh, would Chandra Shekhar do if over the next few days he discovered the real names behind the AE Services account in Zurich, courtesy the Swiss courts? He asked if the question was on or off-record. Both, I said somewhat optimistically. His reply for the record was the usual mixture of cliches expressed in the fond hope that the new government, keeping in mind public interest, would do nothing to derail or disrupt the enquiries currently in progress. Off-the-record, he entertained no such hope and sketched out exactly what would happen as and when the information came in. Alas, I cannot break a confidence and divulge more. A Janata Dal leader, who was a senior member in the National Front government, put the matter in context: "The whole basis of Congress support to Chandra Shekhar is on the understanding that the investigations will be scuttled. The day Chandra Shekhar stops cooperating with Rajiv on this issue, support will be withdrawn."

To write about the notorious 'shoot and scoot' gun these days is to court the reader's wrath. Five years after the scandal first surfaced, we are no closer to the truth than in 1986 when a Congress spokesman described the Swedish radio revelations on the payment of bribes as, "false, baseless and mischievous". Today, we are all in the throes of Bofors fatigue, a disease whose symptoms are ennui with a touch of cynicism. The prospect of another 'exclusive' expose fills the average citizen with dread rather than expectation since every fresh revelation seems to only complicate the picture and thicken the plot, instead of leading us to the final truth. We know the code names of the accounts, we know in which banks they have been maintained, the offending country appears to be eager to help, we even have vital clues about the identity of the account holders. Yet, we keep going round and round in circles.

Mr V.P. Singh and his band of clumsy sleuths are largely responsible for the prevailing anti-Bofors mood in the country. In fact, a large part of the electorate that voted Janata Dal in the belief that the Swedish armament company and the top echelons of the Congress party were guilty of massive corruption, is today angry and vexed. Small wonder then, that the Congress is reminding the nation that its involvement in the so-called embezzlement was a canard spread by V.P. Singh to discredit the supreme leader and the supreme party. Commissions were no doubt paid, but they had nothing to do with it. It is a claim that sounds increasingly plausible with every passing day.

In moments of candour, Vishwanath Pratap Singh concedes that over-enthusiasm may have affected the investigation. However, he is quick to emphasise the immense difficulties in extracting banking secrets out of the Swiss. "The American and Filipino governments have not been able to get information about Marcos's accounts after three years of combined effort, and we had less than 11 months," he says. That may be true, but one must remember that both in Washington and in Manila, the title of the numbered accounts was never in dispute, merely the ramifications of the deals, the precise sums involved and the mode of transfer to Switzerland had to be established. In our case, we know the sums involved, we know which deal and we know how the money was transferred: only the names are missing. Therefore, the analogy does not exactly fit.

Not only have the official investigations been discredited, the halo around the heads of the Bofors media heroes has lost much of its shine. Arun Shourie, N. Ram, Chitra Subramaniam and the lesser players have to varying degrees fallen from grace. While following legitimate journalistic leads and coming up with useful clues, they were also playing their own games that sought to direct the enquiry along the lines that suited their personal-political predelictions. Beside, shielding certain individuals, the media heroes were guilty of manipulating release of collected information available to them. Sometimes, stories were held over for six months, or longer, in order to maximise embarrassment to certain parties. Editors, of course, determine timing, but they also have a responsibility to the public to reveal details connected with bribery and corruption at the highest levels of the administration, not in driblets, but in totality.

"The whole basis of Congress support to Janata Dal (S) is on the understanding that the Bofors investigations will be scuttled. The day Chandra Shekhar stops cooperating with Rajiv on this issue, support will be withdrawn," says a senior Janata Dal leader

Public indifference, therefore, is understandable. Accordingly, when Mr Chandra Shekhar declares that the Bofors scandal should concern only a sub-inspector and not a Prime Minister, the anticipated outrage is minimal. Similarly, the Haryana patriarch's crazy statement that the defeat of the Congress in the general election was not caused by the Bofors scam, but by the stirring example set in his state, causes barely raised eyebrows. Not surprisingly, the developments in the Swiss courts and reactions in Stockholm are relegated to the back pages. Mr V.P. Singh tries gamely to bring Bofors back on to the national agenda, but, increasingly the "biggest and dirtiest fraud since 1947" is being squeezed out by Kashmir, Punjab, Assam, Mandal, Ram Janmabhoomi, not to mention the price of onions and sugar.

Actually, even V.P. Singh has given up on Bofors. I asked a journalist who travelled with the former Prime Minister to Bihar whether the Swedish gun or corruption in high places had been mentioned even in passing in the speeches Mr Singh delivered. The reply was an unambiguous no. In Bombay, Bhiwandi and Pune, the silence persisted. If the person who catapulted into office by the roar of the Swedish howitzer has forgotten his key electoral weapon, can one blame the ordinary citizen for doing likewise?

V.P. Singh and his band of clumsy sleuths are largely responsible for the prevailing anti-Bofors mood in the country

Whatever the deal with Rajiv Gandhi, the Prime Minister has made his intentions clear vis a vis Bofors: he is putting the scandal on the backburner. The sacking of the CBI chief, one of the few individuals who pursued the investigations with integrity, skill and diligence, is a clear pointer that this government does not accord a high priority to completing an unfinished enquiry. Presumably the incoming CBI chief will be properly briefed on the subject and will pick his team accordingly.

It will not take long for the Swiss to get the message. Despite their self-confessed eagerness to shed their stereotyped image—chocolates, cuckoo clocks, and crooks—they cannot be enjoying the exposures in the international press regarding Third World slush money salted away in Geneva vaults. If the Swiss get the slightest hint that the Indian government's attitude has changed with respect to the investigation, they will drop it too—or at least they will find legal ways and means to put the ball back in the Indian courts where it will remain.

Because the drama has been drained out of Bofors, should the press, public and politicians forget it too? Simply because no more votes are to be won on this issue, should it cease to exercise our collective memory? Those who control the levers of power are very good at determining which buttons are 'hot' as far as the electorate is concerned; currently, the consensus seems to be that Bofors is 'cold' and therefore worthy of neglect.

The acquisition of the Swedish gun was not just another instance of routine skullduggery. For the last five years, the scandal has been a national obsession. Elections have been won and lost on Bofors, political careers made and destroyed. We cannot just put the enquiry into the pending tray and rely on public amnesia to wipe away its shame. If the charges were nothing more than a slur, then those who spread the lie should be exposed. If there is some basis, justice must be unsparing. Arguments like, "Oh, it is only Rs 100 crore," become irrelevant when put besides the principle of accountability. If we abandon that principle, we join the ranks of Brunei, Burkino Faso and Zaire.

Speculation is rife in Delhi that the Prime Minister has retained the defence portfolio because he wants no one but himself to sift and scrutinise the sensitive material regarding AE Services that should be in the hands of the Indian government within the next 30 days. Whether he uses the received information to blackmail Rajiv or solicit his advice on how, if and when it is to be released, will depend on the nature of the material and Mr Chandra Shekhar's perception of how best it can be used to buttress his own tenuous position.

An overwhelming majority of Indians have been led to believe that Mr Rajiv Gandhi either directly profited from the Bofors commission or actively collaborated in procuring these for the benefit of his friends. The Congress president is only a heartbeat away from a second crack at the prime ministership. It is intolerable (for his sake and ours) that he should continue to run for high office with this unresolved suspicion against his name—a suspicion that will remain until the full truth on Bofors is put before the nation. ●

The halo around the heads of the Bofors media heroes has lost much of its shine. Arun Shourie, N. Ram, Chitra Subramaniam and the lesser players have fallen from grace

Editors, owners, readers

Arun Shourie asks: who has the Brahmaastra?

A free press is vital for us today, especially so because other institutions—our legislatures, our courts, for instance—are clogged. It is just as true that the press has done a lot of good. It is the only institution which has scored a victory or two for accountability, for instance. Similarly, there is scarcely an issue which would have become a national issue but for the press having taken it up—we have only to imagine where these issues would have reached had they been left to Doordarshan.

So, a free press is a vital institution and it is exerting itself in the public weal, and on occasion with tenacity and vigour.

But it is a fragile institution. When we look back over the last ten years we see that the "achievements" for which our press often preens itself—in bringing our rulers a bit more within the reach of our people, for instance — we notice that these are in fact the work of a small section of the press. Within that section, it has been the work of a handful. On occasion this handful has had the support of others in that small section: thus, for instance, everyone in the Express group worked shoulder to shoulder in the efforts to bring Rajiv's government to account in 1987-89—proprietors, journalists, everyone else. But just as often that very work has had to be done by that handful inspite of the others even within that small section of the press: thus, for instance, the work of bringing V.P. Singh, Devi Lal and their government to account in 1990 for things they had done and which were even more injurious to our country than those that Rajiv's coterie had done, that work in the same Express group had to be done by that handful inspite of others, in fact often in the face of active discouragement by the very associates who had been zealous in ensuring accountability in the previous round.

A precious institution thus, but a fragile one. From where do the pressures come and what may we do to bolster the press against them?

Government

Several governments—in the states and at the Centre—have raised their hand against the press in the last 15 years. In each instance the hand got singned and had to be swiftly withdrawn. The various Press Bills, Rajiv's Defamation Bill are ready examples. The attempts by Mrs Gandhi and Rajiv to squelch specific newspapers were of course much more serious, and they came close to succeeding. But for the sort of facts I have listed elsewhere (Individuals, Institutions, Processes Penguin, 1990, pp. 227-239) the government went, the papers survived. And these when we scarcely have any government at all, no paper need fear a government.

But even where fear isn't, greed is. A non-government cannot harm, but it can put many goodies in a newspaper's way. Advertisements, property, sanctions of various kinds—these need not even be for the newspaper business per se. Negatives can be just as alluring: investigations which were reaching fruition are dropped, of course after making the paper's management realise how close they were to bearing fruit; cases already filed are not pressed...

Lobbyists

But much more lethal than such overt acts of government in which the apparatus of State is directly used in the incessant lobbying, the devious slander that goes on. Those who happen to be in government at the moment are of course very active in this as they are, almost ex officio, the principal targets of writing in the press. And they also have the largest resources to deploy for the purpose: friendly businessmen who are friends of or related to the proprietors, politicians and their local point-men, "intellectuals" whose travel can be facilitated...But the lobbying is not confined to those in government. Someone who feels, for instance, that the ouster of a government which is better disposed to him will bring back a lot which is the thrall of his rival will be just as active. As will the person who is aspiring to be in government, and is therefore eager to establish how useful he can be to, say, the Prime Minister, "Leave that fellow to me. I'll speak to...and make sure that the fellow pipes down..."

This lobbying is skilful. It is incessant. Two circumstances make it in the end lethal.

When the proprietors are consumed by the passion for public affairs, when they keep up with public affairs and with what their paper is writing about them, when they have that sine qua non, a sense of purpose, when their opinions are formed by reflection on public issues and by the detailed study of what their papers are writing—when these are the circumstances, the lobbying is not effective. But when their attitude to public affairs is that of the dilettante, when their opinions are formed by the gossip they hear at cocktail parties, when they do not or, worse still, cannot, because of preoccupations or debility, keep up with public affairs and with what the paper is doing, when their social circle consists of other dilettantes rather than of persons dedicated to the public weal, the lobbying is fatal.

Nor is the matter confined to proprietors. A journalist functions in intense interaction with his colleagues and peers. And he will be just as easily deflected and discouraged by what he hears from his peers unless he is suffused with the things mentioned above. Thus, the lobbying even when it does not touch him directly, often does its work by altering the atmosphere in which the journalist functions.

It is the concatenation of persons and interests rather than one person which gets the journalist in the end. There is so much in a society such as ours which cries for reform. The journalist who takes up such issues becomes a lightning rod. More and more persons who would that our affairs be better, as also those who are oppressed by things as they are reach out to him. He takes up one issue after another. And thereby inconveniences and offends one lot after another. These are the very persons who are influential in the state of affairs as it then is—that is why he is writing about them in the first place: they are the principal beneficiaries of arrangements as they are, they are the most

A free press is a fragile institution. Efforts to bring Rajiv's government to account in 1987-89 as also the work of bringing V.P. Singh, Devi Lal and their government to account in 1990 for things they had done and which were even more injurious to our country than those that Rajiv's coterie had done, had to be handled by a small section of the press visible symbols of things that need to be altered.

Such persons are enmeshed through "interlocking webs of mutual complicity", and so, when you offend one, many get to proprietors and editors. But even if they were completely independent of one another, even if some of them were rivals of others, over the years the journalists's work would have given them common cause as far as he is concerned. It is thus that the proprietors, editors etc., come to hear the same remarks all over the place about that journalist: "There ought to be some limit.. Who does he think he is?...This is nihilism..." Hearing all these round, they themselves begin to see the work being done in their paper through the spectacles contrived by the lobbyists.

Proprietors

Apart from what has been listed above about them in passing, two circumstances relating specifically to proprietors can derail the work.

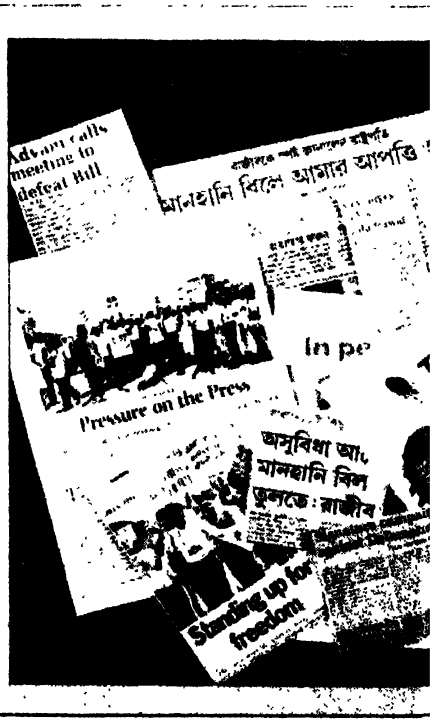
The pressures and inducements and lobbying are naturally more effective when members of the family which owns the paper are at war with each other, an occurrence which unfortunately is not uncommon in India. Some member or the other in this fractured lot, this faction of the family rather than that, will be amenable to fears or inducements. Often, precisely because one member or part of the family endorses the public-spirited work which the paper is doing, the others will revile it, they will blow up the cost and uncertainties which such work -which they now dub as "heroism"—entails for the group. Governments and lobbyists lose no time at all in locating the persons; and working on them.

The second circumstance is much more pervasive. In a factory the exertions of a works manager ensure smoother functioning, a higher output. The proprietor's satisfaction is unalloyed. But in a newspaper the product— the story in the paper or the article—is a public product. The more consequential it is, the more conspicuous it is, and therefore its author is in the public eye. The proprietor's reaction to such work is therefore often ambivalent. He is gratified by the fact that such work is being done by his paper. But the more such work is published, the more the readers come to identify the paper with the journalists who are doing kind of work. And this many a proprietor cannot stomach.

I remember friends tearing their hair at the falsehoods Mrs Gandhi would spread through AIR during the Emergency. But why not just switch off the set?

When we wrote about Meham it was alleged that we were going after Devi Lal on behalf of V.P. Singh—not because we were for fair electoral practices

Many a proprietor or editor is in any case psychologically insecure. He needs to assure himself every fortnight that he is indeed the boss. Rudeness to employees and subordinates, trampling their initiative, throwing them around provide the reassurance The need intensifies with age, with debility, for then one can see things slipping away. As one cannot fight circumstance, nor age, one flays those around one.

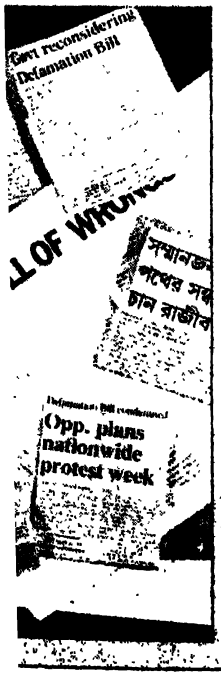


The lobbyists zero in on this a chink: "The people are saying the paper isn't yours any longer", they tell him. "X and Y have taken it over."

The very work in which the proprietor was taking pride therefore becomes anathema, the journalist doing it becomes in his eyes a rival, a usurper, a person who is hogging all the credit while he the proprietor, has to bear the costs.

Journalists

When eventually the work has consequences everyone in the press appropriates it. "See the power of a free press", they say. But till that eventuality the work is a reproach to those who are not doing similar work. And they stalk it.



By misrepresentation: How much of this journalists working in the Indian Express had to put up with in the last four years! From "They have asked the President to dismiss Rajiv Gandhi" in 1987 when the controversies began, right down to, "He has asked civil servants to revolt" in the final days of V.P. Singh in November 1990 Not one of these assertions

There is scarcely an issue which would have become a national issue but for the press having taken it up—we have only to imagine where these issues would have reached had they been left to Doordarshan was true—a mere reading of the editorial or article would have given the lie to what was being alleged. "RSS goons used to thrash Express journalists"—that on our attempt to recommence publication when we had been locked out by the government and the "trade unionists" it had deployed. The whole sequence was on video. Over fifty pressmen saw the entire, unedited film. Everything was there: the entire sequence, who had beaten whom. Not one corrected the falsehoods which the press itself had pasted on us. And so, in this as in all the other cases, the lie, repeated with Goebbelsian frequency and insistence, did its work.

Several governments have raised their hand against the press in the last 15 years. In each instance the hand got singed and had to be swiftly withdrawn. Rajiv's Defamation Bill is a ready example

By pasting motives: "They are out to destabilise the country..." "It is all a campaign at the behest of Nusli Wadia ." When we wrote on the rigging in Amethi it was alleged that this was just part of our personal vendetta against Rajiv Gandhi, that we were acting on behalf of the Janata Dal. When, along with so many in the press, we wrote about Meham it was alleged that we were acting on behalf of a faction of the Janata Dal, that we were going after Devi Lal on behalf of V.P. Singh. That in both cases we were pursuing the matter not because we were against Rajiv in one case and against Devi Lal in the other but because we were for fair electoral practices in either instance—this was sought to be buried under an avalanche of accusations.

By pasting pejoratives: "His tirade", "his diatribe", "his vituperative abuse..." Even words which should be commendations have been made into dirty words!—"campaigner", "crusader..."

The consequences of such journalism on the work of others in the press are manifest:

- The merits of the issue are obscured by the dust which is kicked up by alleging base motives;
- The cacophony and noise dissipates the effect of the work;
- If the journalist sets to answer these accusations, he is deflected from the work; if he does not the mud, at least some of it, sticks, and makes subsequent work that much more difficult.

There is another consequence which in my experience is even more enervating. Some of us have deafened ourselves: we are therefore not deflected by the pejoratives. But most have not. Therefore most journalists, specially the ones who are taking up work of this kind for the first time, are greatly discouraged by the dust their peers raise. One of the tasks to which I had to most devote my energies as editor of the Indian Express was that of sustaining the morale of my younger colleagues in the face of this barrage from other journalists, of sustaining their sense of purpose, of showing them how what was being hurled at them was the inevitable consequence of the work they were doing, of convincing them that standing up to such abuse was itself a part of the work they had to do to redeem our society.

Readers

The passivity of the reader and his short memory are what gives confidence to the editor or the proprietor to snuff out the conscientious journalist. "Ghar mein javaan ladkaa bhi martaa hai to gyarvein din ke baad koi yaad nahin karta," it was once explained to me, "Yeh to do editor he gayen hain" ("When even a young lad dies in the family, no one thinks of him after the eleventh day, here it is only two editors who have left".)

I winced, and protested, and argued. But I was proved wrong.

If readers are going to buy newspapers for classified ads, or for their value as raddi, those are the things they will get.

If on the contrary, whenever the paper does something wrong they are going to bombard owners and editors with visits, with letters and telegrams, if they are going to call them to meetings and skin them for the wrong they have done, the falsehood they have spread, or the silence they have kept on a vital issue, proprietors, editors, journalists will think hard before they forsake the public interest.

And the point is not just, "If they bombard owners and editors...". They must. We noticed how very resourceful and active those affected by good work are in persuading owners and editors. Readers are almost the only ones who can effectively counter these lobbyists. But that requires stirring and making sure one's voice is heard.

The only reason readers are helpless is because they do not bestir themselves thus.

I remember friends tearing their hair at the falsehoods Mrs Gandhi would spread through AIR during the Emergency, that Rajiv would spread through Doordarshan in 1988 and 1989. But why not just switch off the set at news time? In exactly the same way, in the case of the newspaper the Brahmaastra is in the hands not of the proprietor or the editor, it is in the hands of readers. They have but to stop buying the paper when it forsakes the public interest. It will not only be disabled from broadcasting what is wrong, it will, I have not the slightest doubt, be swiftly brought to heel.

This is particularly the case with publications that have been taking up public causes. Over the years they come to be identified with such causes. Catering to the anti-establishment sentiment in the society becomes, even from a strictly commercial point of view, their particular niche in the market. Readers of such publications can hold them to this character much better than the readers of publications which provide a more diversified fare can, if only they wield the Brahmaastra of cancelling their subscriptions the moment the paper forsakes the public weal.

One of the tasks to which I had to devote most of my energies as editor of the Indian Express was sustaining the morale of my younger colleagues, of sustaining their sense of purpose, of showing them how what was being hurled at them was the inevitable consequence of the work they were doing

In conclusion

Proprietors and editors committed to the public weal, secure in their make-up so that they revel in the service journalists and they render together, a press which deals with ideas and arguments on merit and does not go about pasting motives, readers as hawks who will keep the paper on the path of duty, who will counter the incessant chatter of the lobbyists...

Even these few things would go a long way.

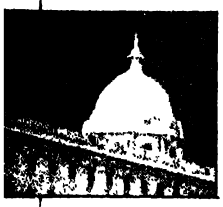
But the ultimate guardians can only be two.

Plurality—in the press as in every other sphere. So that if for one reason or another one publication or group will not or cannot continue that kind of work at that moment, others will take up the baton.

And individuals who will persevere with the work, jobs in the press or no jobs—who will see that their task is not just to discharge the specific work that has fallen to their lot, but also to show by their example that there still are in our society persons who will continue that work inspite of such obstacles.

How well our seers have put it:

Praarabhyate na khalu vighnabhayane neechaye
Praarabhya vighnavihataa virmanti madhyaa
Vighnaye punah punrapi pratihanyamaanae
Praarabhya chottam janaa na parityajanti...



Verily there are three types:
"The lowly who do not commence the task for fear of difficulties
"The middling who abandon it upon encountering difficulties
"And the exalted who, inspite of difficulties upon difficulties, persevere..."

INDER MALHOTRA

Russians are starving

But India seems least bothered

Younger readers of this column perhaps know nothing about it and even older ones may have forgotten. But there was a time, almost immediately after Indira Gandhi had become Prime Minister, when large parts of India were on the verge of starvation. The United States then had a surplus of foodgrains, especially wheat, and these stocks were being given, under Public Law 480, at highly concessional terms, to all needy countries, including ours. However, there was a rub.

Lyndon Johnson, the tall and irascible Texan in the White House, was infuriated by India's criticism of his dirty war in Vietnam. He put the wheat supplies to this country on a very tight leash. Each consignment was required to be authorised by him personally, and he delayed the process for as long as possible. Liberal Americans were appalled. Many of them protested. Even his ambassador in New Delhi, Chester Bowles, pointed out to him that Indira Gandhi was not saying anything different from that of U. Thant and the Pope.

All through summer and winter that year, India lived from ship to mouth. With every morsel of American wheat—which, in the end, totalled a whopping ten million tonnes over a 12-month period—we swallowed some humiliation. Indira Gandhi suppressed her rage as best as she could. She rejected the suggestion that India should say no to American wheat ("the ladies and gentlemen who are saying this would not be the ones to starve," she said icily). She also suggested to the Soviet government that it might make a gesture to India by offering whatever quantities of wheat it could spare.

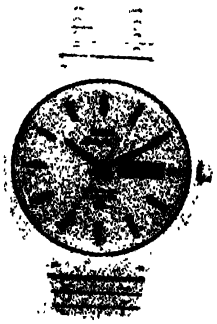
After a short delay, Moscow came through with 200,000 tonnes of wheat which it offered as a gift, not as a loan. Compared with Indian needs and American supplies, the Russians' offer was no more than chicken-feed. But the Soviet Union reaped a bumper harvest of goodwill in this country. By contrast, the Johnson administration earned only curses.

A quarter of a century on, there has been a sea change in the situation. It is the Soviet Union that is haunted by the spectre of starvation.

During a short visit to Moscow with the then Prime Minister, V.P. Singh, in July I had seen for myself the empty shelves in the Soviet capital's food shops and interminable queues outside McDonald's. A good friend who has lived in the Soviet Union all through his adult life confided that for the first time he had started carrying bread and cheese in his briefcase because he could no longer be sure of getting food even in the best and costliest of restaurants. Even so, I had not thought that the food situation in Russia would turn so bleak as it already has. Neither Mikhail Gorbachev nor Boris Yeltsin nor any other responsible Soviet leader has tried to hide the gravity of the crisis that looms ahead. Unless the outside world helps, Russians might start dying of starvation.

Mercifully, superpower detente has seen to it that the Soviet Union would not be left in the lurch. Indeed, its erstwhile foes in the US-led Western alliance are already making massive arrangements to rush life-saving calories to what was only until the other day the "Evil Empire". Interestingly, in the forefront of the West's humanitarian mission is reunified Germany. It transpires that apprehending a sudden Soviet blockade of Berlin, the Federal Republic of Germany had built up a colossal food reserve in the then divided city. This has now come in very handy because of excellent rail and road communications from Berlin to Moscow. Even airlift of food to Soviet cities is being planned.



Conspicuously absent from this heart-warming scene, however, is any Indian effort to make even a symbolic gesture to the Soviet Union. It seems that everybody who is anybody in Delhi is too busy to worry about the outside world, at any rate at the time of writing. We talk about the "time-tested Indo-Soviet friendship", but seem unwilling or unable to do anything to help our Russian friends when they are in dire need. ●

For over five decades, Mukand has been synonymous with steel.

Mukand is India's largest producer of the widest range of stainless and speciality steels; leads in exports of alloy steel castings; designs and builds some of India's biggest, most complex cranes and machines; helps launch her rockets; and undertakes execution of turnkey engineering projects. Making it a multi-product, multi-division, Rs. 500-crore conglomerate.

The commitment of Mukand's people to technology, innovation, research and development has given them a rare insight into steel and its applications. Mukand knows how to make steel, engineer it and use it effectively.

In 50 years, Mukand has truly become a mastermind in steel.

BLEAK FUTURE

For the ordinary Kashmiri, the 11 months were a dark period in the history of the state

How the Valley was lost

This is the fourth in SUNDAY*'s series on the problems faced by the V.P. Singh government. We started with Bofors, continued with Mandal and then, last week, examined the Raja's handling of Ram Janmabhoomi.*

This issue, Shiraz Sidhva analyses what went wrong in Kashmir.

Hours after Vishwanath Pratap Singh assumed office as Prime Minister on 2 December last year, he visited the Golden Temple in Amritsar. The purpose was obviously to make his priorities public: that the Punjab problem was uppermost in his government's scheme of things. It could well have been that way but for the fact that a crisis in another state totally upset the Raja's plans. Even before the V.P. Singh regime could settle down, Kashmir, which was in turmoil all through Rajiv Gandhi's tenure, flared up.

It was indeed an inauspicious beginning for the Raja. The Kashmir terrorists struck barely a week after the new Cabinet was sworn in. On the afternoon of 8 December 1989, guerrillas of the dreaded Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF) kidnapped the daughter of home minister Mufti Mohammad Sayeed in Srinagar and demanded the release of five terrorists in exchange for the life of Rubaiya Sayeed. The government came in for sharp criticism for the way it handled the crisis and critics even pointed out that the Raja had made a deal with the terrorists at a time when it was absolutely necessary to come down hard on the militants. From then on, the Valley gradually slipped out from the grip of the VP regime and the problem even brought the country on the brink of a war with Pakistan.

Why did V.P. Singh go so wrong in Kashmir? According to many, the Raja's first mistake was to appoint Mufti Mohammad Sayeed as home minister. Initially, of course, V.P. Singh's decision was hailed as historic, even bold. For, no one before him had the guts to appoint a Muslim to such a crucial post. But soon, the Raja was criticised for having made the wrong choice: the Mufti proved totally ineffective as home minister. And by the time he left, he was labelled the "invisible home minister". And as far as the Kashmir problem was concerned, Mufti was perhaps the wrong man for the job. For, though the home minister came from Kashmir, his image in the state is not too bright. He has no political base and has never won an election from the Valley.

But that did not prevent the Mufti from nurturing ambitions of becoming the chief minister of Jammu and Kashmir. And he tried out all means, fair and foul, to achieve that end. But invariably ended up being a pawn in the hands of political wheeler-dealers. Indira Gandhi, for instance, used him to unsettle the National Conference government in Kashmir at a time when the popularity of Farooq Abdullah was at its height. The Kashmiris never forgave Mufti Mohammad for that. "And then suddenly you find that this man is the country's home minister. He led V.P. Singh the wrong way in Kashmir. All the Mufti did was to use his office to build a base in the

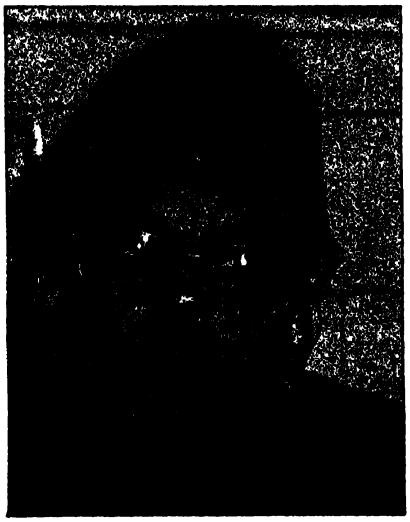
JKLF MILITANTS



During V.P. Singh's tenure, the extremists had a free run in the Valley. The repressive measures only added to the militants' ranks state. He didn't even mind bartering away the nation's interests in the bargain," says a senior Janata Dal leader.

The appointment of the Mufti was not the only blunder V.P. Singh made in Kashmir. The Raja's attitude from the very beginning made it clear that he did not have the political will or the courage to take on the might of the JKLF. Take the instance of the Rubaiya Sayeed episode. Throughout the negotiations, the Centre kept insisting that it had given a free hand to the state government to deal with the issue. But Farooq Abdullah, who was then the chief minister, now says that he had been by-passed throughout the dealings. The Centre, he alleges, was calling the shots through the then Cabinet secretary, T.N. Seshan. And Farooq Abdullah is sure that he would have been able to secure the release of Ms Sayeed without making a deal with the terrorists. That, according to Kashmir observers was the turning point in the Valley. It gave the militants the moral courage to go on the rampage.

Soon after, all political processes in the Valley collapsed and the militants took control of the situation. The state administration proved unequal to meet the challenge as thousands of Kashmiris danced on the streets of Srinagar to celebrate the release of the militants. The cries of azaadi rent the air and nearly every day, the Indian tricolour was burnt at street-corner meetings. But even then, not many Kashmiris were sympathetic to the JKLF's secessionist cause. But V.P. Singh faltered at this crucial juncture and he allowed himself to be influenced by the three powerful ministers in his Cabinet—Mufti Mohammad Sayeed, Arun Nehru and Arif Mohammad Khan. All three were old hands at the art of playing power games in the Valley since Indira Gandhi asked them to oversee Assembly polls in Kashmir in 1983. What's perhaps more important is that all three had a common enemy: Farooq Abdullah, whom they wanted to teach a lesson. And, as soon as they took charge of Kashmir affairs, the troika started building pressure on V.P. Singh to sack Farooq Abdullah.

V.P. SINGH

Every time the Raja was called upon to take a crucial decision on Kashmir, he faltered

Though rumours were rife that the Farooq government would be dismissed, nothing of the sort happened primarily because of the strong objection from senior ministers like Madhu Dandavate, George Fernandes and Inder Gujral, who were all part of the Cabinet committee on Kashmir. For a time it seemed that V.P. Singh had been successfully convinced by them not to take the extreme step, for antagonising Farooq would have disastrous consequences for the state. Arun Nehru, Arif Khan and the Mufti now began to look for other ways to needle Farooq Abdullah.

On 17 January 1990, Farooq Abdullah was called to Delhi to hold consultations with the home minister. After the meeting the Mufti issued a statement saying that the Centre would extend all help to the state government in its fights against terrorism. The home minister also clarified that New Delhi was not in favour of promulgating President's Rule in Kashmir. The next day, however, surprise was in store. The Centre announced that

MERAJUDDIN

Everywhere, people rose in revolt against the excesses perpetrated by the security forces. Kashmir was perhaps lost forever

Jagmohan was being appointed Governor of the state, even though Farooq Abdullah had made it clear that he would step down if such a thing was to happen. And, Farooq had his reasons. A staunch supporter of Arun Nehru, Jagmohan was brought in by Indira Gandhi in 1984 with the sole purpose of dismissing the Abdullah government. The Centre's move shocked Farooq Abdullah, who promptly stepped down. And, Kashmir was left without a popular government.

Farooq Abdullah's exit marked the watershed in the Kashmir problem. And, as it turned out later, it proved to be a costly blunder for V.P. Singh. The new Governor, Jagmohan, was no stranger to Kashmir, but his reputation was that of a political wheeler-dealer. He first achieved notoriety during the Emergency, when as Sanjay Gandhi's hatchet man, he ordered the demolition of the Turkman Gate and cleared the adjoining areas. "Jagmohan had felt that dealing with the Kashmiris would be as easy as demolishing the Turkman Gate," says a senior Janata Dal functionary.

But why did V.P. Singh agree to the appointment of Jagmohan in the first place? After all, he could have easily appointed someone like Naresh Chandra and K.F. Rustomji, if the Raja wanted to send a strict administrator to Kashmir. According to sources close to the former Prime Minister, the Raja at that stage had complete faith in his home minister.

The day Jagmohan arrived in Srinagar, the militants demonstrated their strength by unleashing a wave of violence in the Valley. On 19 January, Farooq Abdullah resigned as chief minister and flew off to London. The next day, Jagmohan dissolved the Assembly and brought Kashmir under Governor's Rule. While the left parties and the Congress(I) strongly condemned the move, V.P. Singh promptly distanced himself from the act by saying that he was not consulted before Jagmohan dissolved the Kashmir Assembly.

JAGMOHAN

PHALS GHOTA

His policy of repression alienated the Kashmiris further. His appointment was perhaps the biggest blunder committed by V.P. Singh Whatever the truth, Jagmohan now emerged as a dictator. Hundreds of people, most of them innocents, were rounded up by the cops. The militants too struck back. During this period, the Valley witnessed a pitched battle between the JKLF cadres and the security forces.

As pressure began to build on V.P. Singh to remove Jagmohan, the Raja once again hesitated. Even though he had realised within one month of Jagmohan taking over that he had made a big blunder, the Raja did nothing to atone for the mistake. V.P. Singh gave in to the BJP's demand not to sack Jagmohan. And by the time Jagmohan was recalled, the damage had already been done.

Take a look at what Jagmohan had achieved during his five-month tenure. Extremist outfits demanding secession mushroomed in the state. And even those who opposed the militants initially, joined their ranks and started providing shelter to them. The security forces too were pushed to the wall and showed signs of desperation. And the movement for Kashmir's independence, which so long was in the hands of a few extremists, suddenly became popular.

V.P. Singh, however, took the first positive step towards resolving the Kashmir problem even when Jagmohan was the Governor. But ironically enough, the idea was first mooted by the Raja's political rival, the Congress(I). Realising perhaps that his home minister and Jagmohan were messing up the situation in the Valley, Singh decided to appoint a special minister for Kashmir affairs. And the choice fell on George Fernandes.

While the Kashmiris agreed that Fernandes was a "good man", they were clear that the new minister could do little as long as Jagmohan was holding fort. "The appointment of George Fernandes gave conflicting signals to the people of Kashmir—V.P. Singh was wielding both the carrot and the stick simultaneously, and none with any real conviction," says a senior leader from the state. "Fernandes' conciliatory measures only caused a lot of confusion in the minds of people, and compounded the mess." What was worse, the Kashmir affairs minister soon found that anything he tried to do was hastily undone by the Mufti and Jagmohan. And, in less than a month of his appointment, he was ordered by the Prime Minister to stay away from Kashmir.

Yet again, V.P. Singh failed to take a firm stand on Kashmir. According to a Janata Dal leader, "V.P. Singh received all the wrong inputs; the bureaucracy in the state and at the Centre were still under Rajiv Gandhi's influence, and played a crucial role." State officials who had over the years, won the respect and confidence of the people were hurriedly sidelined: the Mufti continued to be advised by the same set of bureaucrats who advised Rajiv Gandhi on Kashmir. On his part, the Prime Minister was terribly confused about the allocation of responsibilities, which led to unseemly tension between Fernandes and Jagmohan.

And then, after equating the Governor and the Kashmir minister, the Raja decided to sack them both. "It was one of his most irrational acts," admits a source close to the former PM. While Jagmohan had to be withdrawn against the backdrop of the killing of the religious and political leader, Maulvi Farooq, in May, Fernandes was simulataneously asked to make a volte-face. The gang of three still prevailed, while Kashmir burned. And V.P. Singh had no option but to accept the moral responsibility for it.

Not once in his 11 months in power did V.P. Singh visit Kashmir. That could be explained by the fact that it would have proved futile, anyway. Unlike in Punjab, where large political gatherings and meetings are still possible, the situation in Kashmir did not allow for the people to come out of their homes to meet politicians, or for that matter, almost anyone who advocated India's cause. But even as allegations of police excesses poured in, the Prime Minister continued to give the Mufti and Jagmohan a free hand, almost keeping himself away from the crisis.

By April it became evident that Benazir Bhutto's government in Pakistan would do all it could to capitalise on the trouble in Kashmir. There was a strong possibility of another war with Pakistan over Kashmir in the last week of May, but fortunately, the war clouds blew over. But the tension on the border continued, and Jagmohan's claims that he had the "upper hand" were mostly empty. Trained militants continued to infiltrate into the Valley, and there was no sign of Pakistan giving up its support to the separatists. The pro-Pakistani Jamaat-e-Islami was gaining ground fast, overshadowing the more moderate JKLF and it seemed less likely that there was any possibility of a dialogue.

If the alienation of the Kashmiris was even more disturbing—the Kashmiri pundits had all fled the Valley. The pundits and Muslims who had for hundreds of years not allowed religion to divide them, began to hate each other. And Jagmohan is to be blamed for this too—he played into the hands of the Muslim fundamentalists. Here too, it is V.P. Singh who has to accept the responsibility and the blame, for not having had the strength to recall Jagmohan. And yet, every now and then, there was talk of starting the political process much to the anger and frustration of the people who knew that all such talk was sheer hypocrisy.

"The problem with VP was that he liked to go into so much of detail on any issue, that he was hardly able to deal with any of the issues," commented a senior Janata Dal minister and a close aide of the former Prime Minister. "He didn't delegate responsibility, and showed no initiative at all to solve the Kashmir problem." Corroborated Lok Sabha MP Saifuddin Soz: "V.P. Singh always listened when you went to him with problems, but he didn't know the art of consulting the right people, and worse, he consulted the wrong people."

The removal of Jagmohan and the appointment of Girish Chandra Saxena, a former RAW chief, was yet another signal to the Kashmiri people that there would be no deviation from the hard line on Kashmir. The Disturbed Areas Act was imposed on the state, which empowered security forces to destroy any place which harboured militants. And while Kashmir burnt—entire settlements and villages were torched with frightening regularity over the last three months—V.P. Singh fiddled. The Mandal Commission agitation was gaining momentum, and Kashmir was all but forgotten. The fact that 1.5 million people were affected by an indefinite strike since 15 September did not seem to bother him at all—it took a new Prime Minister to accede to the demands of the striking employees.

Chandra Shekhar, who had gained significant support in the state when he launched a scathing attack against V.P. Singh's handling of the situation following the killings at the funeral of Maulvi Farooq, became a hero overnight when he resolved the strike. "The mood is hopeful in Kashmir. Things will change for the better," states a senior bureaucrat. "There is strong indication that the Governor's advisers who have played havoc in the state, will go."

"We shall remember these 11 months as the darkest period in our history," says a Kashmiri politician. "It will take a long time for the wounds that VP had inflicted to heal, and it's not just the Kashmiris, but the entire country that will pay the price for it." •

THE REWARD, MY FRIEND, IS NOT IN THE SIZE OF THE ORDER BUT IN THE CHALLENGE OF THE JOB.

Profits, Kirloskar Electric never forgets, are not the primary function of any business. They are a by-product. Go out on a limb for your customers and you not only build technological muscle,the whole country gains confidence to take on more and more challenging jobs And the odd thing is, if you look after the product, the profits take care of themselves.

Take the case of the AC motorised gear units we designed and custom-built from scratch for Laxmi Machine Works (LMW).

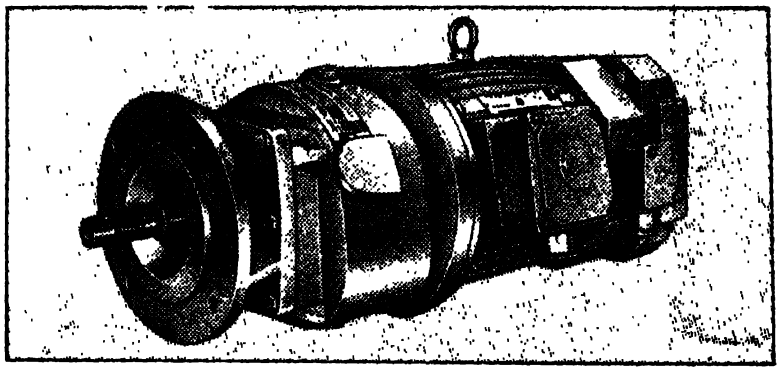
LMW are one of India's leading manufacturers of textile machinery. In 1983, they asked us to build AC dual speed motorised gear units for their doffer machines, most of which are exported. So far they had been importing these motors from Bauer of Germany.

Import substitution is one of the biggest bees in our bonnet. But these were not your run-of-the mill motorised gear units. Some of the specs were daunting and the client's expectations very high. Besides, these units had never been made in India.

The tougher the job, the more we want to do it. We got down to business. When we had got the prototype for the motorised gear units ready, we realized that it could be made even more compact. We re-worked on the prototype till its compactness was as close to the imported ones as possible.

But it was the gear cases which posed the biggest problem for us. Being so compact, they demanded maximum accuracies. It was touch and go there for a while but we licked the problem in the end.

Today on an average 400 of these motorised gear units are used by LMW both for export and for the home market on their doffer machines. They save about Rs. 30 lakhs on foreign exchange a year for the country.



But we didn't stop at that. We designed and custom-built motors for dust-collecting equipment for a sister-concern of LMW called Laxmi Automatic Looms. These motors replaced imported ones and saved another Rs. 30 lakhs in foreign currency.

But Kirloskar Electric is more than the sum of all the firsts it has earned over the years. We are India's leading industrial electrics and electronics company in the private sector. We make some of the finest standard AC and DC drives, transformers, welding equipment and systems, motorised gear units, equipment for defence, electronic control equipment, CNCs, etc. But the one single reason why we are the prime movers in our field is because the centre of gravity at Kirloskar Electric is the customer. Our hi-tech, engineering expertise, superior quality and reliability are all geared to anticipate and respond to his needs.

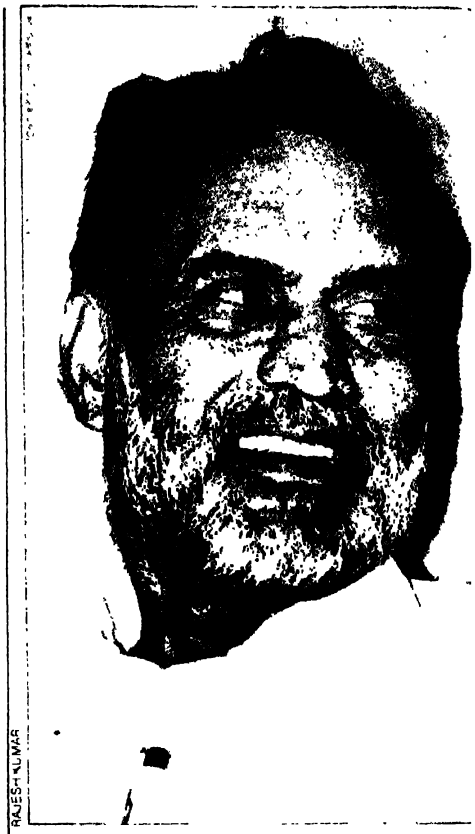
WHO'S IN WHO'S OUT

A guide to Chandra Shekhar's friends and enemies

There is nothing as constant as change. Ask R.P Joshi, the director of the Intelligence Bureau. Ever since former Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh and cabinet secretary Vinod Pande (who is Joshi's brother-in-law) chose him to head the bureau, Joshi had only one major political priority: to find out what Chandra Shekhar was up to.

The Intelligence Bureau's (IB) surveillance became so extensive that Shekhar was moved to complain to the press that his telephones were tapped and that bugging devices had been planted at his residence. A car-load of IB agents was always at hand outside Shekhar's South Avenue Lane bungalow to note down the names of those who visited the Janata Dal strongman and each time Shekhar ventured out of his house, an IB Ambassador followed him from a discreet distance. In those last, desperate days of the V.P. Singh raj after Shekhar staked his claim, the bureau redoubled its efforts. The Raja wanted to know what his rival's strength was and it was the IB's job to provide the answers.



Imagine therefore the chagrin of R.P. Joshi and the rest of the bureau's top echelon when the man who had called the shots for 11 months was removed from office. And Chandra Shekhar, who had been nothing more than a target of surveillance, suddenly became the Prime Minister!

To his credit, Joshi adapted quickly. Shortly after the President called Shekhar to form the government and before he was sworn in, the IB director made a hurried visit to South Avenue Lane. There was a certain poignancy to the meeting. Joshi and Chandra Shekhar have known each other for years, but ever since he became IB chief, Joshi stopped calling on the Janata Dal strongman. But now, he wasted no time in rectifying that error.

Neither man will reveal the details of what took place at that first meeting, but from all accounts, Shekhar was in a forgiving mood. Joshi had expected to be transferred, but was told instead that the new Prime Minister would review his performance before taking any decision. It was not his way to unsheath the long knife and lop off the head of everybody who had any connection with the V.P. Singh regime, Shekhar explained.

Joshi's experience has been typical. Almost from the hour that Chandra Shekhar was sworn in, the bureaucracy has expected a massacre. Apart from the fact that many of those in positions of authority actively worked against Chandra Shekhar and therefore felt they were in for the chop, there is the complex matter of the new Prime Minister's relationships.

As the head of a minority government, he enjoys office at the pleasure of the Congress(I). Rajiv Gandhi has his own list of favourites and hate-objects: to what extent will Shekhar be expected to respect that list? Then, there are the Prime Minister's backers. If V.P. Singh's faction of the Janata Dal is to be believed, then Shekhar is the candidate of Reliance Industries. Does that mean that the corridors of power will be packed with Ambani-men? And what about some of the Prime Minister's less savoury acquaintances? He has never hidden his Chandra Swami connection. Will the middleman-in-saffron now wreak some terrible vengeance on all those who once investigated him?

CHANDRA SHEKHAR

It is not his way to unleash the long knife and lop off the head of everybody who had any connection with the V.P. Singh regime, he explains

Moreover, exactly how close is Shekhar to the likes of Ambani and Chandra Swami? Will they really call the shots in the new dispensation?

So far, there are no clear answers to most of these questions. Shekhar has never been vindictive: that much is clear. As president of the Janata Party, he readmitted all those (Raj Narain, George Fernandes, etc.) who defected to Charan Singh to bring down the 1977-79 Janata government. More recently, he made up with Subramaniam Swamy, who attacked him viciously in 1983-84. And though Devi Lal conspired with V.P. Singh to cheat him during the leadership election last year, he appears to bear him no ill-will.

But equally, it is clear that he runs an open house, where anybody who has ever befriended him is welcome. Thus, even after he has become Prime Minister, his kutiya in South Avenue Lane is packed with the likes of

DHIRUBHAI AMBANI

Will Shekhar allow the corridors of power to be packed with Ambani-men?

CHANDRA SWAMI

Will the middleman-in-saffron now wreak some terrible vengeance on all those who once investigated him?

RAJIV GANDHI

He has his own list of favourites and hate-objects. Will Shekhar be expected to respect it?

Chandra Swami and Suraj Deo Singh, the controversial Dhanbad politician who is often described as a mafia don.

How much sway will these acquaintances have? Will they call the shots or, at the very least, issue instructions in the Prime Minister's name—perhaps without Shekhar's knowledge?

The bureaucracy is still assessing Shekhar. His meeting with Joshi has not passed unnoticed though, to an extent, it is balanced out by his obvious desire to be rid of cabinet secretary Vinod Pande. Shekhar had expected Pande to resign as soon as V.P. Singh lost the vote of confidence and was appalled when the pan-chewing astrologer, who had become India's second most powerful man, showed no intention of relinquishing the chair.

The Prime Minister made it clear to Pande that he wanted his own cabinet secretary and the man who had all but run India for 11 months finally got the message, agreeing to step aside once Shekhar had found a replacement.

But before he decided to fire Pande, the Prime Minister carefully weighed the arguments on both sides. His instincts were to sack as few people as possible. But Pande was a special case. There was little doubt that he had overstepped all bounds of propriety and decorum and behaved more like a politician than a civil servant. During the V.P. Singh era, he had helped draw up the regime's hit-list and actively pursued the Raja's vendettas. Worse still, he had taken on the job of planting obviously false 'news' stories with a coterie of friendly journalists. Many of these stories—including the 'scoop' that the Congress(I) was behind the anti-Mandal agitation—found their way to the front pages of newspapers.

By the end, even his civil service colleagues had lost respect for Pande. There were allegations of cronyism in appointments and the feeling persisted that IAS and IPS officers with Allahabad backgrounds along with those drawn from Pande's own Rajasthan cadre were getting all the promotions.

Even then, Shekhar was inclined to give him a chance, but when Pande showed no real interest in the tasks entrusted to him (among them, the negotiations to end the telecom strike), the Prime Minister decided he had to go.

Now, there is a long list of suitors for the cabinet secretary's post. Nearly everybody of consequence has his own candidate. Subramaniam Swamy has been pushing for T.N. Seshan, the former cabinet secretary, who V.P. Singh sent to the Planning Commission. Devi Lal would prefer S.K. Misra, the agriculture secretary. Misra is also backed by Mulayam Singh Yadav because his wife is a minister in the UP Cabinet. Gujarat chief minister Chimanbhai Patel supports H.K. Khan, his chief secretary, who is also said to be the candidate of Reliance Industries.

All these men stand a chance, but the two biggest favourites are industry secretary A.N. Varma and home secretary Naresh Chandra. Both are non-controversial officers with seniority on their side. So far, Shekhar has not indicated which of the two he prefers, but Chandra is thought to have the edge.

VINOD PANDE

Shekhar was inclined to give him a chance. But when Pande showed no real interest in the tasks entrusted to him, the PM decided he had to go

BHURE LAL

His responsibilities were the VP regime's countless FIRs. But now, he is a figure of no consequence

During V.P. Singh's time, much was made of the downgrading of the Prime Minister's Office (PMO). The Raja suggested that this demonstrated his commitment to Cabinet government. In fact, all that happened was that power passed to the cabinet secretariat. Vinod Pande ran the government by dealing directly with secretaries while their ministers were busy politicking.

Chandra Shekhar seems determined to ensure that he does not create his own Gopi Arora or Vinod Pande. The new cabinet secretary—whoever he is—will have no extra-constitutional authority and at the PMO, he has been careful to appoint a minister with executive responsibilities so that civil servants do not try and second-guess the Prime Minister.

Kamal Morarka, the Bombay industrialist and long-time Shekhar confidant, will be the most important figure at the PMO, but the secretary to the Prime Minister will continue to wield his traditional clout. Shekhar seems pleased with present incumbent B.G. Deshmukh's performance and may not remove him till his term expires. After that, one of the men who failed to become cabinet secretary will probably get the job.

There will be some other changes at the PMO. Over the last year, Shekhar has launched many attacks on the unfortunate Montek Singh Ahluwalia, the special secretary who functions as economic adviser to the Prime Minister. Despite Ahluwalia's unoubted brilliance, Shekhar sees him as a representative of the World Bank lobby. Since becoming Prime Minister, he has also come around to the view that all Ahluwalia does is run a parallel finance ministry.

All this suggests that whether or not Ahluwalia is sacked, he will no longer make much of a contribution to economic affairs. In any case, his views are at odds with those of S.K. Goyal, Shekhar's economic guru, who drafted that blistering attack on Ajit Singh's industrial policy. It is believed that Ahluwalia was instrumental in drawing up the industrial policy that Goyal and Shekhar took such exception to.

There is much speculation about the fate of two V.P. Singh cronies at the PMO. Prabhat Chaturvedi, an IAS

Chandra Shekhar's durbar

It's always open house at 3 South Avenue Lane

All Indian leaders tend to keep open houses, but Chandra Shekhar seems to carry that proclivity to extremes. At any time in the air-conditioned kutiya at 3 South Avenue Lane, you will find politicians, hangers-on, industrialists and journalists, all sitting around the MP from Ballia as he holds court. At times, Shekhar ignores all those assembled, favouring only a chosen few with a nod of recognition and a few words. At others, the gathering is marked with much life and laughter, as the Dal leader calls for vadas from the nearby Udipi shop and serves his guests himself. Sometimes, he may be conducting an interview on the phone, when the door opens to admit a dozen youngsters from Ballia. Barefoot—everyone has to leave his shoes outside—they troop in, touch Shekhar's feet and leave without any ceremony.

All of this may seem surreal to the outsider. But for the regulars at 3 South Avenue Lane, it's the usual story.

And you have to say this for Chandra Shekhar, that even after becoming Prime Minister—and despite the ubiquitous presence of

ASHOK VAHIE

R.P. JOSHI

The IB director was discomfited when Shekhar, who had been a target of surveillance, became PM officer of the UP cadre, was district magistrate during the Allahabad by-election in 1988 when V.P. Singh was elected to the Lok Sabha. The Raja brought him to the PMO with the rank of director Chaturvedi will either be shifted out now or given some routine responsibility where he has no access to information and can do no damage.

Bhure Lal's case is more interesting. A former army officer, he is not a member of the IAS cadre, but has got all his appointments because of the relationship he shares with the Raja. He was director, enforcement, when V.P. Singh was finance minister and later, became a joint secretary in the PMO. His responsibilities were the regime's countless FIRs and, along with the Indian Express' S. Gurumurthy, he helped examine Reliance's affairs.

Lal fully expects to be transferred out and certainly, the Congress(I) would like nothing better. On the other hand, Kamal Morarka gets on with him and may be able to work out some arrangement whereby he serves a few more months at the PMO before his secondment to New Delhi ends and he returns to UP. Either way, he is now a figure of no consequence.

Others at the PMO seem to regard their jobs as secure. Most Prime Ministers end up depending on Ronen Sen's grasp of foreign affairs and Shekhar too seems to get on with this personable, if low-key, IFS officer. Whether he stays or not really depends on the foreign ministry, but certainly, the Prime Minister will make no attempt to shift him.

Ever since Prem Shankar Jha resigned, the post of media adviser to the Prime Minister has remained vacant. (Though, as one of Shekhar's aides jokes, it remained vacant even when Jha occupied it.) Several journalists are lobbying for the job, but current indications are that it will be offered to a civil servant. H.Y. Sharada Prasad, the Sphinx-like former adviser to Indira Gandhi who has since miraculously metamorphosed into a witty columnist, is the obvious choice, but many of the PM's advisers believe that his bureaucratic, south Indian style is at odds with Shekhar's come-one-come-all cow-belt earthiness.

the Special Protection Group—he has tried to keep as open a house as he did before.

With one difference. Earlier, the kutiya used to be the haunt of such politicos and Shekhar loyalists as Yashwant Sinha, Harmohan Dhawan, Kamal Morarka, Digvijay Singh and, on his visits to Delhi, Mulayam Singh Yadav. But now, with the Janata Dal(S) government in power, most of these people have been assigned responsibilities which keep them busy all day, leaving a vacuum in the durbar.

SHOOTER

But no, the durbar hasn't been disbanded. Only the faces have changed. Instead of the Dhawans and the Sinhas, we have the likes of Indubhai Patel and Chandra Swami in attendance. And given Shekhar's inability to deny anyone access, it is difficult—even next to impossible—to keep the racketeers out.

The media maintain that given how often unscrupulous elements such as Chandra Swami are seen with Shekhar, he is bound to be influenced by them to some degree. And even if he isn't, being flanked by such people is not the best of images for a Prime Minister to have.

Shekhar's friends say in his defence that his tolerance is almost infinite and that he doesn't keep anyone out. But he will "never tolerate any nonsense or allow anyone to influence his decisions".

That may well have been the case when Shekhar was just an ordinary MP from Ballia. But will the same hold now that he is the Prime Minister of India?

In any bureaucratic reshuffle, the most keenly watched posts are those of the economic secretaries. Already, the lobbying has reached a crescendo in New Delhi with industrialists and politicians all trying to swing the appointments of their choice.

Two factors, however, suggest that there will not be a night of the long knives. Firstly, the economy is in such bad shape that nobody has time to waste in shuffling civil servants around. And secondly, finance minister Yashwant Sinha is a former IAS officer himself and respects his officers too much to play snakes and ladders with their careers.

Contrary to current speculation, the chances are that finance secretary Bimal Jalan will not be moved. For a start, his economic views are not very different from Shekhar's. Moreover, because of the endless jibes about Ambani and other industrialists, the Prime Minister wants men of integrity at the finance ministry. He knows that with Sinha and Jalan running the show, no businessman will be able to influence the workings of the ministry.

In recent weeks, Nitish Sengupta, the former revenue secretary who is a friend of Dhirubhai Ambani's, has been mentioned as a possible finance secretary. Now that it is clear that he won't get the job, there are moves to install him as revenue secretary again. But this time, it is Sengupta who is not keen on the job, arguing that he is too senior for it.

Nevertheless, it seems clear that R.L. Mishra, the current revenue secretary, will go—perhaps he will be reverted to his parent cadre. The current favourite to replace him is S.P Shukla, the commerce secretary. Though Shukla had close links with several key leaders in the last regime, he is a family friend of Sinha's.

A.N. Varma will not be shifted out of the industry ministry unless, of course, he becomes cabinet secretary or gets a promotion. Nor will most of the key officers of the economic ministries be affected. T.N. Pande, director of the Direct Taxes Board, will continue and even George Joseph, the director of enforcement who was brought in by Bhure Lal to keep tabs on the V.P. Singh regime's enemies, will not get a punishment posting—at worst, he'll get another Delhi-based job.

There may be some changes in the customs departments. M.M. Bhatnagar could be appointed the new chairman of the Central Board of Customs

Swami and friends

The godman has switched camps many times, but Shekhar has been a constant

If anything characterises Chandra Swami, it is his tendency to first befriend people and then fall out with them. He began by allying himself with the Rajiv Gandhi camp, forging close ties with such Congressmen as K. Natwar Singh and Romesh Bhandari. But Swami soon realised that Rajiv wasn't likely to make him part of that charmed inner circle. Hence, a quick switchover to the opposing camp, with Swami becoming a charter member of the Express lobby.

In his new avatar, Chandra Swami masqueraded as a friend of the Raja's, promised to supply the dirt on Bofors and even came up with a tape of a conversation he'd apparently had with Martin Ardbo, in which the latter had talked about Rajiv's involvement in the howitzer scandal.

But before anything could come of it, Swami decided that the Express lobby wasn't likely to emerge victorious in the on-going battle in the political arena. So, he crossed over yet again, this time befriending Gandhi's chum, Captain Satish Sharma. The duo allegedly dreamed up the St Kitts scam, which made headlines in the national press. Soon enough, the Raja and his cohorts—who had only recently been hailing the Ardbo tapes as a scoop—were calling the Swami a fraud, a charlatan and worse.

Through all of this, however, and Excise because of his honest image. And Digvijay Singh, the dynamic new number two to Sinha at the finance ministry, has pledged to clean up such cesspools as Delhi airport customs.

Perhaps the one ministry where there has been a full-scale spring cleaning is the law ministry. This has less to do with the new law minister Subramaniam Swamy's own views than with the general perception that the V.P. Singh regime ran the most politicised law ministry in history.

Of the law officers, only solicitor-general Ashok Desai acquitted himself well, while attorney-general Soli Sorabjee lost much of his credibility during his tenure. By the time he resigned, he was seen as a cipher who gave the ministry a veneer of old world-Parsi respectability, while hard-core political activists actually ran the show on his behalf. His unconscionable persecution of Sarosh Zaiwalla, whose firm his ministry fired when it was handling sensitive cases for India, has muddied his reputation. Zaiwalla's only fault was that he filed Ajitabh Bachchan's libel case against Dagens Nyheter (DN), a Swedish newspaper. Because DN had got its libellous information from law ministry officials, Sorabjee treated this as a personal affront and not only sacked Zaiwalla and company, but also refused to pay outstanding bills.

For Sorabjee, his spell in office will mark a sad interlude in an otherwise chequered legal career.

Among the other law officers whose resignations have been accepted are the four additional solicitor-generals: Arun Jaitley, Santosh Hegde, P.K. Goswami and Kapil Sibal. Of them, Sibal was handling Reliance matters, while Hegde was in charge of the Chandra Swami stuck by one man: Chandra Shekhar. While the pair were never friends, Shekhar was one politician who never denied the Swami access. And, surprisingly enough, the acquaintance never proved embarrassing to Shekhar (of course, there were the usual noises in the press) except on one occasion.

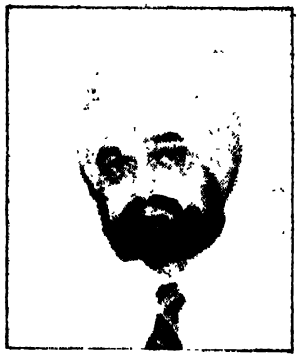
Indubhai Patel, another crony of Shekhar's and a long-time devotee of Chandra Swami, took the then Janata leader (in 1988) to Spain, where the godman introduced Shekhar to Adnan Khashoggi and Michael Hershman. At this meeting, Hershman apparently confided that the Government of India had asked him to investigate several Indian politicians during the time that Fairfax was making headlines in Indian newspapers.

Shekhar put Subramaniam Swamy on the task of attacking the government on that one. But no sooner had the controversy snowballed than Hershman recanted, leading to lots of red faces all around, Shekhar's prominent among them.



So much for past history.

But Chandra Swami, who'd been in hiding for months now, has suddenly resurfaced in Delhi. And visits Shekhar's durbar at 3 South Avenue Lane fairly regularly.

In that event, will the Government of India continue to persecute the much-maligned godman?

Larsen & Toubro case.

The key figure in all this is Arun Jaitley, the high-profile BJP activist who came to fame as the lawyer for Arun Nehru, Chandra Swami and the Indian Express.

As additional solicitor-general to the Government of India (GOI), Jaitley handled several controversial cases: Bofors, the A320, the HDW submarine, the St Kitts forgery, Ajitabh Bachchan's FERA case, the Devi Lal letters and even Chandra Swami, an old client of his. Since the Congress, according to the conventional wisdom, had something to hide on most of these, it was generally believed that Arun Jaitley was number one on the hit-list of the Shekhar government, in power because of Congress support.

What lent credence to this version was that Jaitley had been claiming to be on the verge of a breakthrough in the Bofors investigation. Judge Dieter Jan-Corrodi had declared in Zurich that bank documents relating to AE Services, one of the front companies in the case, would be transferred to India. The Congress had panicked on being told of this and insisted that it wanted him out. Shekhar had no option but to oblige.

The government, however, had a different story to tell. Jaitley's had been a political appointment and he had merely done the correct thing by resigning as soon as the V.P. Singh government fell. And the new regime had acted properly by accepting his resignation.

There was also some scepticism about the additional solicitor-general's claims of a breakthrough in the investigation. If reports from Zurich are to be believed, the documents the Swiss will hand over identify three foreigners as the entities behind AE Services.

This is open to two interpretations. One, that the Rajiv regime was telling the truth when it insisted that no Indian had got kickbacks on the deal. And two, that all the investigations had thrown up were names of more middlemen.

So, all talk of breakthroughs was slightly suspect.

Jaitley's friends, however, maintained that the government had shown an almost obscene haste in getting rid of him. Two cases had been filed against the government investigation on Bofors, and Jaitley was arguing for the GOI in both. A day before the hearing on one of them, the lawyer was told that his resignation had been accepted by the government. All the other additional solicitor-generals were informed later. So, why the hurry in Jaitley's case?

The government has its own view on the matter. As a source in the PMO says, the Swiss were dealing with the GOI, not with Jaitley as an individual or the Indian Express as a corporate body. And they will continue to deal with the government; the fact that Jaitley has lost his job makes no difference to that arrangement.

The government's new appointments also came in for a large measure of criticism. G. Ramaswamy, the new attorney-general, has appeared for Reliance Industries, leading detractors to claim that he is an Ambaniman. A.D. Giri, an advocate at the Allahabad High Court, is an old friend of Chandra Shekhar's. And his appointment as solicitor-general led to charges of cronyism.

New Delhi, on its part, maintained that both these men had impeccable legal credentials. And, in the ultimate analysis, that was all that mattered.

While there are other changes on the anvil, none of them seem likely to come about in a hurry. And an overhaul of the bureaucracy is unlikely going by what Chandra Shekhar told SUNDAY: "India has one of the best bureaucracies in the world. You can't blame civil servants if politicians are not clear what they want."

The Prime Minister, then, has an open mind on the subject and has given due indication of how he means to go on with his informal personal interaction with civil servants, even rousing them from sleep at times to relay his instructions.

Contrary to expectations, few decisions have been motivated by personal animus. Though, of course, there have been exceptions to that rule.

Kuldip Nayar, for instance. Nobody is quite certain what Chandra Shekhar has against the former high commissioner to London, but the bearded leader hasn't lost any opportunity to hit out at Nayar. When the controversy about the medical treatment accorded to Justice Sabyasachi Mukherjee was raging, Shekhar got up in Parliament to call Nayar a social climber.

It was clear, given past history, that once Shekhar became Prime Minister, Nayar would have to go. The high commissioner preferred to quit of his own accord, rather than wait to be fired. And his resignation was promptly accepted by the government.

The other to go was S.V.S. Raghavan, the chairman of Bharat Business International Limited (BBIL), the holding company comprising STC (State Trading Corporation) and MMTC (Minerals and Metals Trading Corporation). Even while the Raja's regime was in office, Subramaniam Swamy had made it clear that he suspected Raghavan of having links with VP. Not surprisingly then, as soon as Swamy assumed office as commerce minister, one of the first things he did was fire Raghavan.

Over the last week—despite the odd decision which seemed vindictive—Chandra Shekhar managed to stabilise his wobbly prime ministership somewhat. The failure to constitute the Cabinet for 11 long days and the allegations of his links with industrialists had done some damage, but Shekhar's image improved, if only marginally, as he grew into his role. His TV appearances impressed most viewers, with the Prime Minister holding forth cogently on the issues before the nation. And the coming together of the Babri Masjid Action Committee and the Vishwa Hindu Parishad at the negotiating table signalled a breakthrough on Ayodhya.

One of the reasons for Shekhar's growing public stature was the low expectations people had of their leaders in the present political situation. Nobody had thought much of Shekhar when he became Prime Minister and the man from Ballia built upon his slender advantage to surprise those who had underestimated him.

What helped in this regard was the fact that Shekhar had few illusions about his role in the scheme of things. He knew he was an interim Prime Minister, brought in to cope with a crisis situation. So, there were going to be no witch-hunts and no playing favourites. Instead, Shekhar intended to get on with the task of governance.

Intelligence Bureau director R.P. Joshi realised this during that first meeting with Shekhar, and it was this realisation that guided his behaviour.

This Prime Minister will tend to forgive—he has too much work not to. •

The crackdown

The Centre imposes President's Rule in Assam

The inevitable has happened. The Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) ministry in Assam finally paid the price for its refusal to read the writing on the wall. Hours before midnight on Tuesday, 27 November, and just five weeks away from completing a full term, the Centre dismissed the AGP government and imposed President's Rule in Assam. The Chandra Shekhar regime followed this up with other hard measures: the entire state was declared "disturbed", terrorist outfits like the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA) and the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN) were outlawed and the Armed Forces Special Power Act was extended to Assam. The purpose of all this was to restore a semblance of law and order in a state which was virtually held to ransom by the ULFA. At last, the crackdown had begun.

No one in the state was taken unawares by the move, least of all the deposed chief minister Prafulla Mahanta and his Cabinet colleagues. Even when "friendly" V.P. Singh was in power in Delhi, the Centre had repeatedly warned Mahanta to take steps to contain the ULFA menace. But the National Front government never dared to take the extreme measure since the AGP was a constituent of the ruling coalition at the Centre. All that, however, changed with the change of guard in Delhi. Chandra Shekhar proved to be a tough customer and soon after taking over, he summoned Mahanta to Delhi to do some plain speaking.

Back home in Guwahati, Prafulla Mahanta realised that there were two options before his government: either to make a serious bid to confront the ULFA or to face dismissal. The AGP preferred the latter. Perhaps because the ULFA was more of an asset than a liability for the party.

Not that Mahanta did not try to convince Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar that the situation in his state was not all that alarming that it was made out to be. Two other senior AGP members, Bhrigu Phukan and Zoi Nath Sharma, camped in New Delhi for days and even met Congress president Rajiv Gandhi and sought his help. But nothing worked and the Centre stuck to its stand.

On the morning of 28 November, the Governor D.D. Thakur issued a statement outlining the reasons behind the President's decision. "President's Rule has become a necessary evil," said Thakur, "in view of the continued indifference of the elected government towards the protection of lives and properties of the common people." The Governor further clarified that he was "nobody's agent," loyal only to his conscience and the Constitution. Thakur, who was deputy chief minister in Jammu and Kashmir during Farooq Abdullah's reign and is a personal friend of former home minister Mufti Mohammad Sayeed, also pointed out that during the last five-six months, the state administration had collapsed and in many places, terrorists had virtually taken over. But why didn't he recommend central rule before the situation got out of hand? Thakur said that he had advocated President's Rule in Assam long back but the previous government simply sat on the file.

What is significant, however, is that the Governor in his report to the President did not accuse the AGP of cooperating with the ULFA. He clearly gives the party the benefit of doubt. Thakur only listed hard facts in his lengthy report and concluded by saying that the same administration could be made more responsive.

BSF men patrolling Fancy Bazar area in Guwahati: tough measures

Whatever be the provocation for the imposition of President's Rule, political parties in the state have reacted to the move in a guarded manner. While the Congress(I) and the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) have publicly welcomed central rule, the ousted chief minister and AGP president Prafulla Mahanta blamed the Congress(I) for the "catastrophe". But the local press and political observers have described the imposition of President's Rule in the state as a creation of the AGP. What is perhaps more significant is that the AGP/AASU bandh call on 30 November in protest against the Centre's act evoked a mixed reaction. While the bandh was successful in the Brahmaputra valley, it was by and large a flop in Upper Assam—stronghold of the ULFA—and the Barak valley. And, even in the Brahmaputra valley areas, the spontaneous and enthusiastic response from the masses were lacking. Significantly, in Dispur, the state secretariat functioned normally because the Sadadau Asom Karmachari Parishad, so long considered a front of the AGP among government employees, kept itself away from the bandh call.

The ULFA guerrillas: on the run?

Most of the political parties which opposed President's Rule in the state did so on "ideological" grounds. Golap Borbora, president of the state Janata Dal, for instance, pointed out that he was personally against central rule anywhere in the country. But he quickly added that in the present instance, the AGP was to be held responsible. The state unit of the CPI(M) too is similarly opposed to central rule in Assam on principle. The party's aged secretary, Nandeswar Talukdar, however, blamed the AGP for providing the Congress-backed central government with an opportunity to interfere in the affairs of Assam. Promode Gogoi of the CPI was worried about the "excessive powers given to the armed forces". And the veteran Congress(S) leader, Sarat Chandra Sinha, wondered what made the AGP leaders surrender the government's authority to the terrorists.

The state units of the Janata Dal, the Congress(S) and to an extent the CPI(M) are clearly in a dilemma. Because, they were largely instrumental in convincing the previous National Front regime that the AGP and the ULFA were in league and it was largely on their report that the former home minister Mufti Mohammad Sayeed had more or less decided to hold polls in the state under President's Rule.

But the equations changed dramatically with the collapse of the V.P. Singh regime. And the state Congress(I) suddenly found itself in the driver's seat and Hiteswar Saikia, the shrewd APCC chief, is all set to exploit the situation to the hilt.

The Congress(I) may be in an advantageous position right now, but the left parties are not willing to take defeat lying down. And they are not ruling out a sympathy wave in favour of the AGP either. For, even though the initial reaction of the people to President's Rule has been hardly encouraging for Prafulla Mahanta and his party, the leftists think that the situation may change later, especially when the masses are exposed to the army's special powers. The communists, along with their democratic allies, the Janata Dal and the Congress(S), have already worked out a strategy: they have decided to launch a two-pronged attack. One against the AGP for dragging the state to a point of anarchy, and two, against the Congress(I) for its role behind the imposition of President's Rule in the state.

But from the look of things, polls at the moment seem a distant dream. Governor Thakur said that it all depends "on the cooperation of the people. As soon as normalcy returns, I shall return to my constitutional role, read books and listen to music". But Lt. Gen. Brar, the GOC-in-C, Eastern Command, and who is supervising army operations against the ULFA, however, was more forthright. "We haven't come here for a fortnight or a month. This is no picnic. We will stay here for some time. More soldiers are coming. We will make our presence felt in all the towns. We will also go into the villages. Our job is not only to flush out terrorists but to instil confidence in the minds of the people. And this requires time," Brar explained.

Ironically enough, the AGP leadership now feels that it is the army which can bail it out from its present woes. How? Simple enough. Already, people are complaining about army and police excesses. And the AGP is planning a series of protests to highlight this aspect. Moreover, the promulgation of President's Rule has given the party a ready issue. It can once again whip up Assamese sentiments against the "colonial designs" of New Delhi.

President's Rule in Assam may have yet another disastrous fall-out. The AGP is totally dependent on the AASU when it comes to building up an agitation. But over the years, there have been serious differences between the AGP and the AASU leadership. Now that both the organisations have a common enemy to fight, they may well bury their differences and launch a combined stir. Moreover, the ULFA, which is bearing the brunt of the army's operations, may now come out openly in support of the AGP. What this means for Assam is anybody's guess. ●

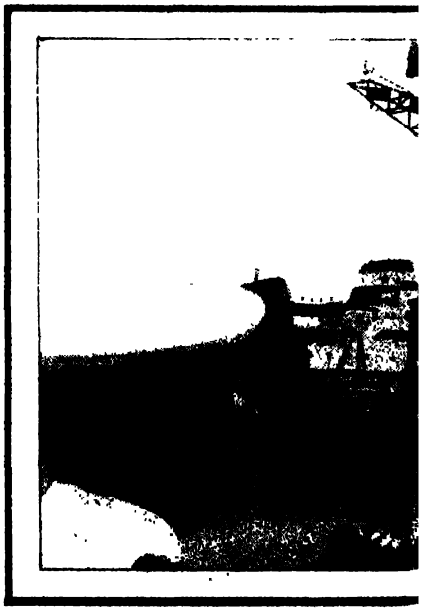
Sea is the limit

L. Ramdas finally takes over as the navy chief amid controversy



When Admiral Laxminarayan Ramdas took over as Chief of Naval Staff last week, a sordid chapter in the history of the Indian Navy was brought to a close. The battle of succession that preceded the navy chief's induction into New Delhi's South Block was unprecedented in the armed forces, and threatened to politicise military appointments for the first time since Independence. However, the new government was quick to realise that revoking the chief of naval staff-designate's appointment hours before he was scheduled to take over from Admiral J.G. Nadkarni, would only have led to more controversy, and perhaps even spark off a mutiny in the navy. Sources in the Prime Minister's Office admit that the decision to stand by the earlier government's appointment was taken at the highest level.

For the new chief of navy, his ascension meant the end of a battle that raged in the courts and shook the force. The genesis of the tension was simple enough. The chief of the Western Naval Command, Vice-Admiral S. Jain, was being superseded, and decided that he would contest the decision to make Ramdas the navy chief. The aggrieved Vice-Admiral, who was due to retire on 28 February last year, was given a two-year extension in order to broadbase the selection of the navy chief's post. This, according to his supporters in the government, implied that Jain was very likely to be the next chief. After all, the flag officer commanding-in-chief, Vice-Admiral Ramdas, was the junior of the two.

However, things changed dramatically when, some months ago, Rear Admiral Vishnu Bhagwat filed a writ petition in the Bombay High Court, sparking off an unusual controversy in the navy. Though the petition was filed to protest against the appointment of Rear Admiral K.K. Kohli bypassing Bhagwat's candidature, the 400-page document (filed by Bhagwat's lawyer-wife Niloufer) contained several personal allegations against the navy's top brass, and even went as far as to establish their alleged connections with foreign powers. Besides, there were also allusions to murky defence deals which Bhagwat claimed he was witness to. However, since most of the deals had been approved by President R. Venkataraman when he was either defence or finance minister, there was no question of examining those. "Did Bhagwat think he could instigate an inquiry against the President?" scoffs a defence ministry source. "The petition was hundred per cent motivated."

Among the officers mentioned by name in Bhagwat's petition were Jain, and the then navy chief, Admiral Nadkarni. Both, alleged the petitioner, had close links with the USA. The petition, significantly, failed to record that the other contender for the top slot, Vice-Admiral Ramdas, had three daughters who were all US green-card holders. Nor did it mention that one of the daughters, Kavitha, was married to Zulfiqar Ahmed, a Pakistani national whose father was allegedly in the Pakistan army. According to navy sources, Ramdas had failed to report the alliance as is customary, when he was designated chief. (It was later established that Kavitha's father-in-law had died twenty years ago and served in the Public Works Department.)

Another incident occurred in August that was seemingly unconnected with the main plot of the mur-

kv goings-on in the navy, but had significant bearing on the Jain-Ramdas tussle. The drowning of the warship INS Andaman on 21 August, when it developed engine trouble during an exercise in the Bay of Bengal, caused a furore; only gross negligence of maintenance or duty could result in a disaster like that during peace time. And Vice-Admiral Ramdas was supervising the exercise, which gave the pro-Jain lobby yet another excuse to attack him.

An inquiry into the episode was instituted, but navy sources are sceptical that the findings will ever see the light of day. It was unusual, say navy sources, to have a naval officer head such an inquiry.

While it became increasingly evident that Rear Admiral Bhagwat's (the officer is known to be a friend of the new Admiral) petition had considerably spoilt Jain's chances, Ramdas had the tacit support of the powers that be. So much so that the succession tussle took on ugly regional overtones, with allegations that the pro-Ramdas officers hailed mostly from the south, and that Ramdas himself enjoyed the support of ex-defence minister, Raja Ramanna, who was also from that region.

Less than 48 hours before the chief of naval staff-designate was scheduled to take over from Admiral J.G. Nadkarni, attempts were being made at the highest levels to revoke his appointment. The chief of the Western Naval Command, Vice-Admiral S. Jain, threw established norms to the winds and spoke personally to Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar about his problem when the latter visited Bombay for the "I love Bombay" extravaganza. On 26 November, Vice-Admiral Jain came to the capital and followed up his verbal complaint by filing a written one to the Prime Minister, who is also defence minister. It was feared that the PMO would try to influence the decision of the defence secretary, N.N. Vohra, but no such pressure was used. Ramdas was acquitted of both charges (that he was responsible for the sinking of INS Andaman and that his daughter was married to a Pakistani army officer's son), and the additional allegation that he had changed domicile on three occasions to derive various benefits through land deals from the governments of Maharashtra, Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh. The Vice-Admiral, who till the last few hours, was uncertain that he would make the grade, assumed office on 30 November.

Interestingly, the media was so involved in the succession tussle that two Bombay-based journalists, Abhay Mokashi and Madhukar Akodkar, filed a writ petition in the Bombay High Court asking for the reversal of the order to designate Ramdas navy chief, and praying that Nadkarni be allowed to continue till "such time as an appropriate and worthy successor" was found. The court dismissed all the three allegations in the petition the same day Admiral Ramdas assumed office with the usual ceremonial pomp and splendour.

One of the most decorated officers of Indian Navy (he was awarded the Vir Chakra after the 1971 war with Pakistan), Admiral Ramdas had perhaps never before undergone the trial of strength as he has in recent days. If for some reason, the government had revoked its decision, say navy sources, "there would have been hell to pay." ●

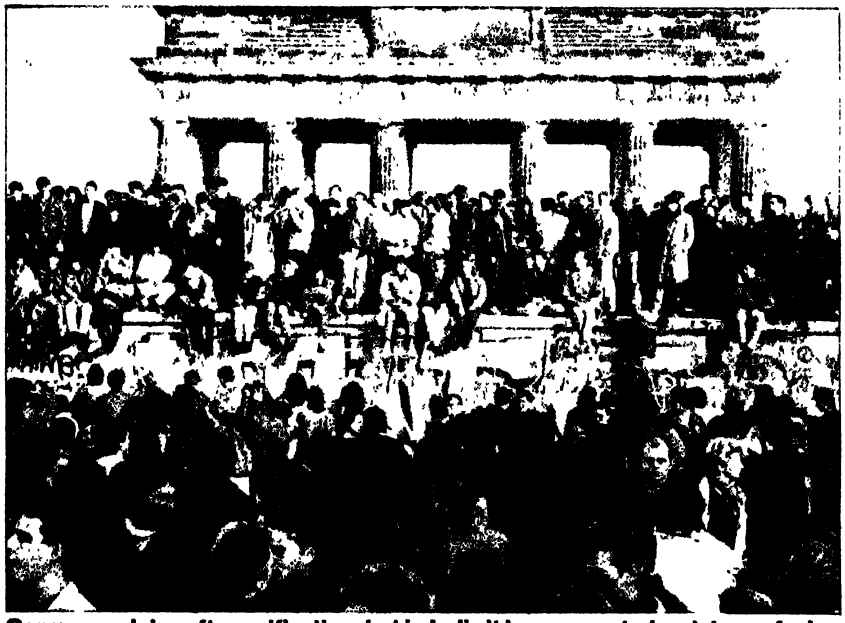
Arms and the man

The activities of a former GDR diplomat generate a controversy



German unification may have been viewed differently in different places—as a threat in the Kremlin, a triumph in Capitol Hill and an irritant in No. 10 Downing Street. In the corridors of New Delhi's South and North Blocks, however, it has generated mainly confusion.

Neither the external affairs nor the finance ministry is very clear about how unification will affect trade agreements that were signed between India and what was formerly the German Democratic Republic (GDR). For instance, much of GDR's exports to India was under the rupee agreement. Will (unified) Germany continue to supply the goods already contracted on the same basis?

A related—but just as important—question concerns the future of GDR-India arms contracts. Will Germany now honour the agreements? What if the sale of certain weapons is in contravention of unified German law (which is essentially that of the former Federal Republic of Germany)?

This question became a concern in Germany about two months ago. And the circumstances which led to it being raised were curious.

A couple of weeks before unification day (3 October), a diplomat of the GDR embassy, Volker Gafert, requested the foreign office in New Delhi for a long-term visa for himself and his family. His letter to the ministry said that he wanted to stay on in his private capacity, as the representative of Ingenieur Technischer Aubenhandel (ITA), allegedly a front organisation for the former GDR government. Gafert's letter of request suggested that, if allowed to stay on in India, he would ensure the completion of nine or so exsisting arms contracts between GDR and India.

Germans rejoice after unification: but in India it has generated mainly confusion

When Konrad Seitz, then ambassador of the FRG embassy, got wind of Gafert's request, he raised an alarm in Bonn. He is said to have briefed his government that Gafert, along with some other GDR officials, was attempting to set up an illegal trade in arms with India. The basis for Seitz's fear was simple. If Gafert had promised to supply the arms that GDR had contracted after unification, then he would probably be doing so in contravention of the law. For the laws in FRG—soon to become those of unified Germany—were extremely stringent about the export of weapons.

The story was soon picked up by the German press, which suggested that the Gafert connection may be used by former East German officials to smuggle arms into India. An article published in the magazine Der Spiegel in late October claimed, among other things, that:

- Gafert had promised to fulfil the contracts that GDR had signed for 13,000 machine-guns (4,800 of them being overdue), T-72 tanks and spares for MiG-21 combat aircraft.
- Seitz had briefed the West German government that Gafert was in league with members of Stasi, the East German intelligence service.
- Arms and ammunition belonging to the GDR army are suspected to have been secretly transferred before unification to other Warsaw Pact countries. Could Gafert and his partners be trying to profit from diverting these to India?

Predictably, Gafert denies the charges in the Der Spiegel article as "hundred per cent lies". When SUNDAY approached the former East German diplomat at his Vasant Vihar residence, he was visibly nervous and refused to answer questions. "I do not have the authority of my principals (ITA) to speak to the press," he said. A few things, however, are clear. He did approach the foreign office for a long-term visa as ITA's representative and his letter of request, according to one ministry official, did "hint" that he would help to complete outstanding arms contracts. Has the ministry granted his request? "His application is still being processed and no decision has been taken yet," says a senior external affairs ministry official. However, he admits that his interest was aroused by the controversy in Germany and says that a colleague in the Bonn embassy has been informally asked to "find out more".

As for the defence ministry, it is conscious of the controversy in Germany, but claims it has no direct knowledge of Gafert and his reported activities. "I can say categorically that he has not met me or any of my junior colleagues," says a top ministry official. Have any armaments—which were contracted with GDR—arrived in India after the German unification? "We cannot answer this offhand. We will have to check on this," he says

The ministry, however, does admit that there exist a number of contracts with GDR that haven't been completed. And while it seems uncertain about the future of these, it denies rumours in Germany that a large number of modified Kalashnikov light machine-guns were brought to India after unification. "We haven't placed an order for any such gun with GDR," says an official.

The German embassy—which is housed in the old FRG mission in Delhi—also claims that it has no knowledge of what Gafert is up to. Seitz is no longer in India having been recalled, but a senior diplomat told SUNDAY: "As far as the position of the government is concerned, all arms leaving the country after 3 October will have to meet the requirement of law. What happened before unification is of no concern to us."

Some Indian officials believe that the controversy is of little relevance to India—that whether or not a technicality of German law is flouted is the sole concern of that country. Says a defence ministry official: "A lot of planning goes into determining our defence requirements and it is in our interests that all contracts are completed. Otherwise, we will have to go through the lengthy process of finding other sources before meeting our needs."

Will Germany honour the GDR-India arms contracts? What if the sale of certain weapons is in contravention of unified German law, which is essentially that of the former FRG?

GDR FRG

Clearly, there are more questions than answers about what exactly transpired. But with the exposure of Gafert's alleged activities in Der Spiegel and the risk of further such stories in Germany—a television programme is currently being planned—it is best that the Indian government clarifies a few matters. Will Gafert get his long-term visa and, if yes, why? Have any arms—contracted with former GDR—arrived in India after unification? And how does it view rumours in Germany that arms are being illegally exported to India with the help of Gafert and his partners?

Understandably, Gafert himself will not throw any light on these questions. But the former diplomat has no doubt that he will be allowed to stay on in a private capacity in India. "Just wait and see," he told SUNDAY with an air of assurance. "My visa request is certain to be granted." As for the crucial aspects of the controversy, he is tight-lipped. "Why bother me with these questions?" he asks. "After all, I am a private and decent man and a very good friend of India's." ●

Little big men

There is more money in small business than ever before

• For years, 28 year-old Shyam Biswas lived a squalid life in a south Calcutta slum. His job– which entailed cleaning trucks for a lorry-owner– fetched him a mere Rs 500 a month, hardly enough to support himself and his ailing mother. Then, three years ago, he took the decision that changed his life. Biswas learnt how to drive and borrowed money to purchase a second-hand taxi.

Today, he lives in his own house, owns a colour TV and VCR and earns - after deducting the amount towards the loan- well over Rs 2,000 a month. Biswas doesn't have children yet, but has decided their futures. "My sons will go to good English-medium schools and choose decent professions. Perhaps, one of them will become a doctor," he says.

• When Mani left his village in Vedanthangal in Tamil Nadu as a eight-year-old, he never believed he could earn as much as Rs 3,000 a month. He considered the Rs 50 salary that he received as a domestic servant in a Madras household generous. After a few years, however, Mani realised that menial household work would never allow him to live a decent life.

In January this year, he invested Rs 700 in an iron and began his life as a dhobi. "I save about Rs 1,500 a month," says the 15-year-old with a delighted grin. Already, he has Rs 8,000 stashed away in the bank, is planning on entering into more lucrative 'businesses' and dreams of buying a motorcycle.

• On the face of it, Dhruv Dayal may appear a lowly chaatwallah. His 'shop' at New Delhi's Shah Jahan Road is a small kiosk and his chaat is doled out to customers under coloured parasols.

Dayal has found that business has improved vastly since he set up shop some 45 years ago. By his own admission, he has at least 2,000 customers a day, each of whom spends a minimum of Rs 5. This would mean that his annual turnover is in the region of a staggering Rs 36 lakhs. Dayal, however, is tight-lipped about his earnings. "Some paper had written about me a few years ago and since then, the income-tax authorities have been after me," says the enormously successful chaatwallah. All the same, he is proud that he lives in his own house in Delhi's Gulabi Bagh and that he possesses several cars, which are used to transport his merchandise.

For the really successful entrepreneur there are enough profits in small business to make any professional blush

You're a typical member of India's middle class. You reckon you've landed a good job and rake in something between Rs 4,000 and Rs 6,000 a month. Yet, you struggle—after paying the taxman, meeting your children's school fees and coping with the burgeoning costs of essentials—to maintain what you regard as a decent lifestyle. Yes, you have a colour TV, but you will have to save for months before you can lay your hands on that much-awaited VCR. As for the washing machine that your wife has been nagging you about and the holiday you have been planning for the family, these will have to wait for much longer.

Never mind, you're not doing too badly, you reason. But all the same, you are increasingly beset by a feeling of uneasiness. The taxi-driver who took you to work the other day happened to talk about the latest hit Hindi film he had just seen on his very own VCR. You have learnt from your wife that the 'family dhobi' has just built himself a house—tiny perhaps but pukka nevertheless—not very far from your own. And as for your favourite chaatwallah, who the kids love visiting at weekends, you've always known that he's been raking it in.

Call them what you will: the self-employed, the small businessmen or the minnows of the service industry. They are the panwallahs, the dhobis, the carpenters, the electricians, the taxi and autorickshaw drivers, etc.—that enormous number of people who comprise the economy's vast service sector.

Little or no economic data are available about them. As a group, it is too large, diverse and scattered to allow detailed statistical study—and exists largely as a subterranean, but sizeable, force in the country's economy. But all the same, the trends clearly indicate that it is doing far better economically than ever before.

Of course, few chaatwallahs make as much as Delhi's Dhruv Dayal. He is one of the best known in the city, enjoys a tremendous reputation for dishing out "superb quality chaat" and has been in the business for a few decades. At the same time, many taxi drivers earn far more than Calcutta's Shyam Biswas. In Delhi and Bombay, cabbies can earn anything between Rs 3,000 and Rs 5,000 a month—invariably tax-free.

But neither could have imagined that he would become as economically well-placed as he is. When the octogenarian Dayal set up shop in the Forties, he might have laughed if told he would be a millionaire someday. And Biswas was convinced he would never outgrow his Calcutta slum till he became a taxi driver. Like many other self-employed 'entrepreneurs' in the service sector, Dayal and Biswas have discovered that small is beautiful.

GAUTAM PATOLE

RAJIB BASU

At the top end of the business, small—as more and more people are discovering—can also be extremely bountiful.

For the really successful, there are enough profits today—whether in tailoring shops, small restaurants, chaat kiosks, dry cleaning stores or video libraries—to make any professional blush. Twenty years ago, it would have been difficult to compile a list of millionaire chaatwallahs, rich tailors or wealthy small restaurant owners. No longer. The key to riches appears to be the very same as that of any other business: hard work, maintenance of quality and entrepreneurial skill.

Take panwallahs, for instance. Pan-growing may have been a multi-crore agro-business for many years, but was there any money at all at the retail end—the lowly pan shop?

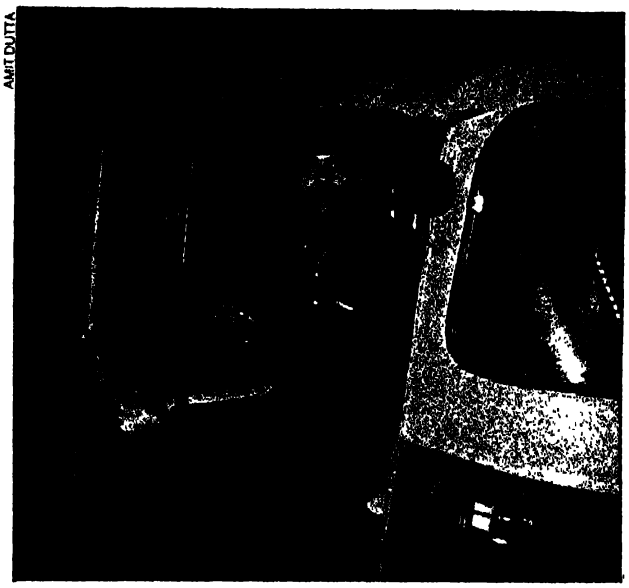
There is now and plenty of it, going by the experience of the Bhagwan Das family. Das, a refugee from Pakistan, set up a small kiosk in Delhi's Daryaganj soon after Partition. Today, his grandsons own a chain of Prince Pan shops all over the city—the better-known being the one at Daryaganj and the two at the posh Greater Kailash I market.

Despite their wealth, the Das grandchildren still sit behind the counter, roll pans and sell cigarettes. Their shops also stock popular imported goods, such as Head and Shoulders Shampoo, Kraft cheese and cans of Coke, Pepsi and 7 Up. Says Sagar Sharma, Bhagwan Das' 30-year-old grandson, who mans one of the Greater Kailash shops, "I have at least 1,500 customers every day."

Over the years, Prince Pan has become a household name in Delhi and the Das family is flush with money. Its members are rumoured to be the capital's highest tax-payers, own prime plots of land all over the city and have set up relatives in various other businesses.

As the Das family's experience with pan reveals, there is big money in the most unexpected places. Years ago, Vinod Kumar Tripathi's father quit his badly-paid job at the passport office in Bombay and began hawking kulfi off a wooden cart. His only selling point was the ice-cream's recipe, which was evolved by his wife.

It proved a popular formula. Now, Tripathi's sons—Vinod Kumar and his two brothers—own a kulfi factory and the enormously successful New Kulfi Centre, one of the hottest places in Bombay for the coolest ice-creams. The brothers do business in places as far-flung as Singapore and Hong Kong, cater to large parties thrown by the rich and the powerful and own a couple of cars. Says Vinod Kumar Tripathi: "My father's struggle has proved that with hard work and discipline even the poor can become rich."



Often, the extent of success depends on the entrepreneur's ability to gauge the customer's needs. Three years ago, Debi Prasad Rao, fresh from a hotel management course in the US, took over the affairs of the family's drab and down-market Anand restaurant—an Udipi-style eatery in central Calcutta. Recently, Rao improved the decor of his restaurant radically, raised the prices on the menu and smartened up the service.

The results were almost immediate. The daily sales trebled to between Rs 6,000 and Rs 7,000 and in its current, improved avatar, the restaurant is attracting more and more people every day. Rao now plans to convert the ground floor of his eatery into a western-style fast food centre aimed at yuppie college students. Says the restaurant owner: "It was the change in decor, in the ambience, which did the trick."

Prince Pan, the New Kulfi Centre and Anand are only three instances of the hundreds of very successful small businesses all over the country. But they prove that small—with the necessary amount of hard work and entrepreneurial ingenuity—can be big in terms of turnover and profits.

While not everybody is this successful, most economists agree that there is a general improvement in the lot of those who comprise the small service sector. The principal reason for this is attributed to the recent growth in income among the middle and lower-middle classes—the target groups of this sector. Says well-known economist Amit Bhaduri, professor at Calcutta's Indian Institute of Management: "The higher the income level, the faster the growth of the service sector. We have seen this happen in the West. This sector is likely to continue to grow with the recent liberalisation moves initiated in this country."

AMIT DUTTA

(From left) Sharad Yadav: drives his own taxi in Bombay; Anand: a change of decor did the trick for this Udipi restaurant; Narayan Das: a bank loan enabled him to earn a decent living

Economist Mihir Kumar Rakshit agrees, but feels that it has also a lot to do with the overall growth in the economy. "Over the past ten years, the economy has grown at a rate of five per cent per annum—a growth mainly concentrated in the metropolises. I think that this growth has now spilled over to the unorganised sector and one of the reasons for the prosperity is this."

Another factor is possibly the better distribution of bank loans. Says Bhaduri: "There has been a change from contract-employment to self-employment of late because of more liberal bank loans. The terms of credit offered now are favourable." Today, it is relatively easy to acquire credit for most small ventures—be it restaurants, medical stores or shops.

One group of people who have benefited tremendously from bank credit is the taxi and autorickshaw drivers. Says Calcutta's 24-year-old Narayan Das, who spent two years in unemployment before securing a loan from the neighbourhood branch of the United Industrial Bank: "I put in Rs 7,000 and the bank readily gave me the rest. It was as simple as that." (Das now makes Rs 2,400 a month after deducting the cost of gas, etc.) Adds Bombay cab driver Sharad Yadav, who bought his taxi for Rs 95,000 a few years ago: "The bank provided 75 per cent of the amount. I'm still paying off the loan, but owning a taxi is far better than driving someone else's—which I did for eight years."

The increased earnings in the service sector are attributed by economists to the recent growth in income among the middle and lower-middle classes

Yet another reason that may have led to the growth and success of the small service sector is the influx of people into the metropolises. Explains Bhaduri: "This leads to a rise in the number of people who are willing to go in for self-employment given the failure of the organised sector to provide enough employment opportunities. It also increases the demand of the service sector as these migrants have to depend on it for their sustenance." Adds professor Sugato Marjit of Calcutta's Presidency College: "People may come to cities in search of employment, but there are certain things that they cannot do without—be it food, pans, cigarettes or whatever. Hence, any rise in the population of the cities causes an increase in such demands."

Whatever the reason, there seems to be many more people making money in the small service sector than there were before. There may be no statistics to support this, few figures to bear this out. But have you ever tried asking your taxi driver, dhobi or chaatwallah how much he earns? •

"Some rationality has to be introduced"

Chandra Shekhar's economic adviser S.K. Goyal on monopolies, liberalisation, multi-national companies and more

"I am not looking for a job." This emphatic remark comes from Surinder Kumar Goyal, the professor of economics who is expected to either formally or informally, act as Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar's chief economic adviser.

Goyal, who teaches economics and economic policy at New Delhi's Indian Institute of Public Administration (IIPA), has known Shekhar for over 20 years, and shares similar views. Something, says Goyal, they realised when the duo got together to prepare a report on the role of Indian banking way back in 1965. Expectedly, the report talked about nationalising banks, more or less setting the tone for the Shekhar-Goyal vision for a 'futuristic' India.

Goyal feels that Chandra Shekhar will try and give the Indian economy an anti-monopoly, anti-multinational, free market orientation. "This," says Goyal, "is because of his faith in democratic socialism. He also shares my feeling that the Indian economy cannot be modelled on that of any other country."

Which is probably why he ran down the previous government's industrial policy proposals—though Goyal declines to comment, it is widely believed that Shekhar's critical utterances were penned by him—and is expected to stick to his stand. The thing is, both Goyal and Shekhar firmly believe in what they say, no matter that the tribe of nay-sayers far outnumber subscribers to their world view.

Goyal was born in Moga, Punjab, in 1933. Directly after he completed his PhD programme at the Delhi School of Economics, he went into academia. He taught at Kirori Mal and Desh Bandhu colleges, both in New Delhi, and later, took up several national and international advisory positions. Among them: economic adviser to the Planning Commission, and economic adviser to the government of Iraq between 1974-1976 (this could trigger helpful oil deals with Iraq). He came to the IIPA in 1971 and has remained with the institute. As he has remained loyal to the new PM. "Chandra Shekhar reads and studies ten times more than any politicians," says Goyal, "he has been a regular visitor to our library for years."

Whether Shekhar's reading will now translate into clear-cut and prudent policies remains to be seen. Also, will an old association translate into effective teamwork at the Centre? Goyal himself is reticent about the subject, and says he would much rather stick to academics and continue to guide the PM's economic policies as his friend. "Fortunately," says Goyal, "professors are well paid in this country. Though I cannot say what my precise reaction would be if an offer of joining the PMO or something came along this way."

It is not clear whether Goyal will continue to be Chandra Shekhar's economic spine (many hope he does not). But whatever the case, the professor with strong views is certain to play a major part, even if from the wings.

Goyal spoke to SUNDAY's Ritu Sarin in New Delhi last week, discussing subjects of crucial importance to India. Excerpts from the exclusive interview:

On Chandra Shekhar's economic priorities:

I think there will be a new thrust to economy soon because Chandra Shekhar is worried about the Balance of Payment (position) and the price situation. He will take up these things quickly, along with pressing political problems like Ayodhya and Punjab.

However, if like the last, this government thinks religion is far more important than economic issues then they too will become bogged down. The problem is that you want to establish your leadership which is considered illogical in the modern world. You want to go back to the Ram days when the world is moving towards the moon! This is the poverty of Indian politics.

On how Shekhar can survive:

Let me state one thing right away:

Chandra Shekhar can only survive if he takes radical positions and this goes for his economic policies also. He will not be allowed to stay in this country if he wants to behave like V.P. Singh.

Chandra Shekhar's aim will be to liberate the productive forces from the clutches of the monopolists and the bureaucracy. Only then can you get the system moving. Liberalisation is not what has been practiced but it is, for example, liberating the farmer from the clutches of the patwari and the policeman.

So, while I cannot say what exactly the Prime Minister will do in future, I know he would like to do something substantial. Prices still can be checked. And this does not mean prices of luxury goods alone. If the price of colour TV sets go up three times and the price index goes up by 0.1 per cent because of it, I don't think we need to worry about it. We have to be worried about the prices of the commodities which the common man uses.

On what the industrial policy is likely to be:

Chandra Shekhar will try and introduce a self-reliant growth of industries. More than being employment-oriented, the focus of the industrial policy would be on the consumer and the common user.

Liberalisation will continue. It will be similar to many of the things which are desired to be achieved. And it all depends on what your concept of liberalisation is. I think Chandra Shekhar's understanding of liberalisation is very different from Rajiv Gandhi's or V.P. Singh's understanding of it.

As far as I can see, Chandra Shekhar's view could be (based on the various discussions I have had with him) of this nature: that wherever (the) bureaucracy comes in the way of doing something, cut it out. Interface with the public should be as cordial as possible. If you wish to import, ensure that it is required. After having ensured that you need the item badly, don't put 20 clerks at work on the proposals. The process has to be speeded up in the right direction.

On the previous government's failures:

The V.P. Singh government could not prepare the negative and positive lists for foreign investments even in six months! Then what have they achieved? Where are these lists which they claim to have prepared? The word 'list' does not convey anything when the content of the lists is questionable. These have to be generated now and we have to decide in what form we want our industry to be liberalised.

On what liberalisation means:

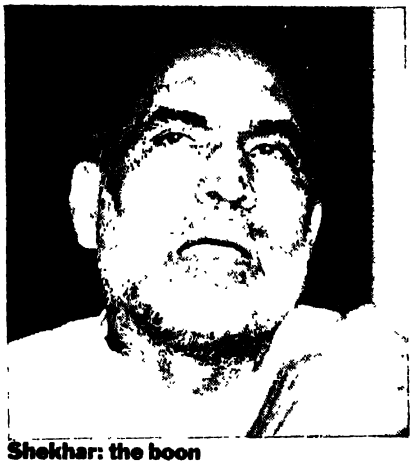
Liberalisation means promoting competition which implies curbing of monopolies. Therefore, if this government can have the guts the monopolies will have to be told that there cannot be any more price hikes at the cost of the consumer. If you have got a licence to double your capacity, then you must have a five per cent reduction on the prices also.

On the monopoly structure:

India's monopoly is a feudal monopoly. I think the state should be allowed to function as a state because the monopoly today is created by the states. It is a state promoted, protected and financed monopoly. There is no monopoly because of the internal strength of the monopolists.

Take for instance, the Tatas. They started off with steel production, but went into tea and now also petrochemicals. Do you think the Haldia project would have been passed if the state had not given the funds? Or could the Ambanis have come up without the support of the banks? Or the Birlas? 75-80 per cent of the capital of these large industrial houses directly comes from the state.

Some rationality has to be introduced into this structure. Tatas have to be told to identify five areas where they want to work. They can expand and therefore have a product monopoly. But you must cut down the prices and you will not be allowed to have a range right from Lakmé to shipping exports to tea. You have to identify your expertise and get all the help and concessions you want. I am against diversification as an excuse for expansion. The industrialists simply make a company sick, transfer the resources from one to another and expect the consumers to go on paying.



This type of irrational expansion or irresponsible action by the government will never be accepted in the USA or any other country in the West.

On the role of multinational companies:

Members of the V.P. Singh government have said they did not axe projects like Maruti 1000 because it would create bilateral problems. Then why did they want to talk of Bofors? If that was so they should not have touched anything done by the previous government. Then what were they there for?

What about Pepsi? In fact, Pepsi got more clearances during the period V.P. Singh was there than it had got earlier. I cannot understand this type of thing.

In my view multinationals do possess the following: they happen to have lot of capital with them. They are important, dominant constituents of the world economic system. They have rights on the abundance of technology. Then they also have plenty of resource potential in terms of information. Now, if they have all this and you need them you have to decide where you want them to come. But what has happened recently is that the multinationals have been deciding which areas they want to come in. The proposals need not come from Indians but from foreigners directly to the Foreign Investment Board. This was never the case earlier. This has to be stopped.

Multinationals are like a big giant, like an elephant. But you have to know its strength and weaknesses. In my opinion, multinationals are nothing but traders. We definitely need to have a re-thought about the role of multinationals in consumer products. Why do we need Dettol and a range of foreign cosmetic products? In these areas the local quality can be good and indigenous technology is available.

Instead, we should see if multinationals are prepared to come in the areas of bio-technology, superconductivity, genetic engineering and other such areas. And not simply come, but come, collaborate, and within a year or two we should be free of them. We should pay them the money but not permit them to control our economy.

On the public sector:

We have created public sector giants like the IDBI (Industrial Development Bank of India), ICICI (Industrial Credit & Investment Corp. of India), IFCI (Industrial Finance Corp. of India), UTI (Unit Trust of India) and LIC (Life Insurance Corp.) but they were created to promote industry in the private sector. So our emphasis is towards furthering of capitalistic development and we should recognise this fact.

The time has come for the definition of public sector to be revised. The labels have to be changed. The public sector must relate to the public and when I say public, I mean 80-90 per cent of the population of this country, either collectively or groupwise.

Singh: the bane

Ambani: the beneficiary?

In my opinion, the public sector has no logic to exist in (the) five-star hotel (segment). There should be one hotel only for entertaining foreign guests and all that. But to have the public sector spreading the Ashok culture is anti-public. And it is not a question of public sector or private sector, it (the five-star culture) should not be allowed at all. This culture is anti-national. Instead, we should have small hotels, sarais where you and I can go and stay.

I would like to inform you that among all the hotel properties in Delhi, it is the Ranjit Hotel (run by India Tourism Development Corp's Ashok chain) which has the highest occupancy rates. Not with Ashok Hotel, 80-90 per cent of the occupants stay on company expense in most of the expensive five-star hotels in the country. Was this the purpose of the public sector?

There is a distinction to be drawn between the government sector and the public sector. Today we think anything government is also public. But they are different. If you are going to have a public coffee-house, I will call it more of a public sector. So even our basic concepts are wrong. The clientele of the public sector has to be public. It has to be public, not in ownership but in service

The public sector has to serve national interests, not five or ten per cent of the public. Take Air India: if you need it, then call it government sector, I don't mind. But to call it public sector and then complain about losses and abuse, it is illogical. I am against the culture. It (elitism) is a crime in the public sector in any case, but equally a bad crime to allow it in the private sector. There is no justification for this in a poor country like India.

On the foreign exchange crunch:

I admit there is a crisis, but the question is: how did we create this crisis? Studying the past is important to evolve future policies. You name a commodity internationally—washing machines, video (recorders)—which is not being promoted here. If these are not being manufactured by multinationals, they are being manufactured through foreign collaborations.

Now, heavens will not fall if I am wearing a HMT watch and not a Titan. Is there anything wrong? Let the public sector produce the watches and sell them at Rs 50. At least the consumer will benefit. I respect Chandra Shekhar for the fact that he has already made a policy statement saying that austerity is a strategy. It is operationally necessary for us to have this strategy because through this alone you can cut down your liabilities on the foreign exchange front. You can maintain the trade balance if you cut down your imports first.

Fortunately, we are not in such a bad situation as we were in the post-Independence period. We meet 60 per cent of our requirements on oil. But if you look at one Maruti car, it consumes in a day petrol equal to what a village of 200 families consumes in a year. The last government introduced measures which were ill-conceived and they only created panic. Do you think all the diesel oil buying is genuine? People are hoarding. You see, the psyche of shortages accentuates more problems. Today, by your own actions and gimmicks you have created a psyche of shortages.

On the business-politics nexus:

There are lot of allegations about the role of moneybags in electing Chandra Shekhar but soon, people will know the truth. The so-called puritans and the moralists themselves seem to be pursuing policies which help only the big businesses.

It is the easiest thing to accuse a politician of being an agent of an industrialist without any evidence. All this talk about horse-trading is nonsense and I know certain things from inside. There is no denying that being a public man he (Chandra Shekhar) has met most important people in this country. See for yourself. When did he go abroad? He does not go and most of the MPs do go. What does this mean?

I can tell you that especially, if you are referring to the Ambanis, there is no obligation on Chandra Shekhar whatsoever. The Ambanis will try to create that (impression) or someone else might, but other than having met him once or twice over dinner, they have no links with him.

The proof of the pudding lies in the eating and if Bhagey Govardhan says he got Rs 50 lakhs why did he join back? This is all a creation of the press. You simply can't make an allegation because it looks interesting. No amount of money can alone bring a politician to power. Indira Gandhi was thrown out though there was no shortage of money with the Congress(I). Morarji (Desai) went not because of money. Rajiv came to power not because of money and similarly, Chandra Shekhar has become Prime Minister not because of money. ●

Time to act

The new government is moving, but is it moving fast enough? And with vision?

Machinations and movement. It is time to forget the first, and concentrate on the second. Because, while wheeling-dealing can give the wet-behind-the-ears government a few extra months of grace, movement is what might ultimately save it.

It is a month since Chandra Shekhar assumed India's control, and almost three weeks since he appointed his coterie of colleagues. (Here, it might be interesting to refer to the Chambers 20th century Dictionary, which says the word 'coterie' is originally French, and means "a number of peasants holding land jointly from a lord". Time enough to have read those files—to track what exactly went wrong during the previous administration—and time enough to have formed a course of action to at least try and save India from economic doomsday.

In order to do this, the government has to send out signals which say that it is trying hard to doctor all that is ill. Which includes just about everything from the Gulf crisis, oil and foreign exchange crunch, to policy decisions on imports and the multinational corporate world (very simply: no signals, no investment, no loans and therefore, no money). And also, those areas which are crucial for any country's economic well-being—communications and electricity. The situation:

The Gulf Crisis

Or

'Give us oil and money'

The best thing that could have happened to India has happened: Saddam Hussein has reportedly accepted George Bush's proposal to talk—instead of fight—about Kuwait.

Just in time. "For the US," says a senior Western diplomat in New Delhi, "the way out is to do something quickly. Either go for war or talk." If talks do not work out, say observers, the choice is simple. Fight to curb Hussein, because for one, Hussein is too dangerous to be left alone. And two, for the US, it is cheaper to fight a quick war than house its soldiers in Saudi Arabia for months on end. "In the event of a war," says the diplomat, "oil prices could go way over US$ 40 (Rs 720) a barrel, and that would be very bad for India."

India, along with the world, has its fingers crossed about the success of Iraq-US negotiations. Meanwhile, however, India is taking some precautions of its own. For starters, trying to swing a deal with Iraq whereby the Gulf country pays half the Rs 2,000 crores it owes India for projects fulfilled in oil. The deal has yet to be ratified by the United Nations, which has imposed trade sanctions on Iraq, but the general feeling is that as the oil transfer has to do with past deals, it should go through.

The second precaution, though by default, was to declare President's Rule in Assam last fortnight. This, along with possibly curbing the state's wayward politics and militant groups such as the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA) with army help, should also clear a major domestic oil production bottleneck. Oil India, the Oil & Natural Gas Commission and Indian Oil Corp. can go about their business pumping and distributing petroleum, and try to recoup the hundreds of crores of rupees worth of oil India lost to blockades and agitation in Assam.

However, even if the situation in Iraq and Assam return to normal, India needs money desperately. And the US$ 450 million it expects to get from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) is peanuts. According to government officials, private economists and analysts with foreign missions in New Delhi, India needs as much as US$ 5-6 billion (Rs 9,000-10,800 crores) in foreign aid and loans in the next 12 months to tide over its current economic crisis.

George Bush: talk or war?

No amount of fiscal juggling or industrial liberalisation is going to nullify this need. The joke in Delhi's bureaucratic circles is that it is very difficult to find any senior people around, because they are running around all over the world trying to "mobilise resources"—for example, in the US, UK and Japan for money, in South America for oil, and the USSR for both money and oil.

At home, the government is expected to take some stern measures, to shore up finances. To cut expenditure, to reduce excise refunds to the corporate sector—finance ministry officials say that currently, there is anything upto Rs 10,000 crores being refunded, plus there is Rs 6,000 crores or so tied up in litigation—and to severely limit imports.

Ministers and officials are still debating about the best way to achieve these ends. Whatever the case, there is expected to be some heavy duty opposition from the public sector, the private sector and most importantly, from numerous foreign governments. The good thing is that the PM, finance minister Yashwant Sinha, his deputy Digvijay Singh, and finance secretary Bimal Jalan are very hard nuts to crack.

Multinationals

Or

'Tough Luck'

Two examples are good enough to reflect the government's policies on this count: the ubiquitous PepsiCo deal, and the equally visible case of Union Carbide Corp's (UCC) liability in the Bhopal gas-leak/disaster case.

Iraqi soldiers: do they care about India's oil shortages?

The government's reactions on both issues could send some very disturbing signals to the investing world, particularly the US. Not a very happy portent for India, especially when it has to contend with US pressure vis a vis the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs and the threat of sanctions under Super 301

Pepsi Foods Pvt. Ltd—and its US-based associate—is very tense about Chandra Shekhar and his men tampering with its Indian presence. While Shekhar has not yet made any pronouncements about throwing Pepsi out, he had made his distaste for the company very plain in his pre-PM days. Shekhar's much-touted economic adviser Surinder Kumar Goyal (see interview on page 51) is as leery about Pepsi as he is about any multinational. And India needs money, say government officials, not fizzy drinks or cheese and potato snacks

Pepsi executives have been very quiet ever since Shekhar became PM - the stance seems to be we won't-complain-if-you-don't. Besides, Pepsi seems to be in a spot over its export commitments. Instead of direct exports of vegetable and fruit products as it had undertaken, Pepsi is now looking at the deal more as an export house picking up someone else's goods to export and bring in revenue.

Despite a possible uproar, it is quite likely that Pepsi may be left alone. For one, it is too deeply involved in Punjab's economic life—its agro-processing operation is located in the state. For another, even if it acts as an export house, it will help bring in foreign exchange. This may yet save Pepsi, but a policy word or two will help clear the uncertainty

The Bhopal case is far more clear cut, at least on the face of it. Following in the footsteps of the previous regime, the PM has passed the word around that the US$ 450 million 'settlement' —that UCC offered the government of India in 1989, when Rajiv Gandhi was premier - is to be contested In fact, it has offered attorney-general-in-limbo Soli Sorabjee a carte blanche to fight its case.

Whatever the merits of asking for more compensation—especially when the amount already delivered is still sitting pretty, with not a paisa disbursed as aid to victims—this is going to shake up multinational outfits and foreign investors some more. Forget UCC.

This is particularly touchy, and potentially explosive. To put it simply, investors are a little tired of waiting for liberalisation, easing of foreign investment norms, and assurances that India will do away with bureaucratic interference and politically motivated see-sawing. In fact, as former finance minister Madhu Dandavate told SUNDAY last month (see SUNDAY 25

Bhopal victims: protesting against the settlement

Whatever the merits of asking for more compensation from Union Carbide, it is going to shake up multinational outfits and foreign investors

November--1 December 1990), contrary to popular belief, no one is exactly queuing up to invest in India.

The US is nervous, the UK and Japan cautious, and the Germans have too much going on at home to bother with piddling amounts in India. The only bit of sustained interest appears to be from the French and the Swedes, who are more or less outclassed in their own continent. Besides, India perhaps presumes too much with multinationals. For instance, India is only one staging post in global strategies that these corporations practice, and they can always go elsewhere if India gets tough.

As General Motors (GM) did. The US automobile giant had seriously thought about tying up with Hindustan Motors in India. Only, the deal fell through earlier this year when GM decided it was not worth waiting for the Indian government to make up its mind, and moved to Indonesia. Despite labour costs being higher there.

Others could follow suit. And unless Shekhar moves quickly to step up domestic liberalisation and competition—about which he has done nothing at all, yet—India will be in a bigger mess. Tough luck.

Indian Communications

Or

'Don't call us, we'll call you'

Yes, more exchanges are going electronic. But no, India's "tall success rate", itself an indication of how bad things are, is nowhere near improved. The thing is, communications in India have as much to do with how well one telephone instrument connects with another, as it does with how well the communications minister connects with his bureaucrats and hordes of employees.

When V.P. Singh was around, and K.P. Unnikrishnan held the communications portfolio, it did not connect at all. Almost immediately after assuming office, the portly Unnikrishnan took on a jaunty Sam Pitroda, orchestrated his removal as chief of technology missions and the Centre for Developments of Telematics (C-DoT). Unnikrishnan also helped institute a committee of enquiry—the outcome is not public and may never be—against Pitroda's alleged nepotism, and was busy, goes the grapevine, trying to reverse Pitroda's anti-import stand for India's multi-billion dollar telecom industry.

Unnikrishnan did not survive the machinations which led to the Raja's ouster. Pitroda has. Though he suffered a heart attack last October, underwent a triple by-pass surgery at New Delhi's Escorts Heart Research Centre and is presently recuperating at his Lodi Estate residence.

Pitroda is also connecting pretty well, despite being homebound. He is in touch with his ministry—he is still telecom secretary and chairman of the telecom commission—by telephone, and luminaries, both political and corporate, constantly drop in to enquire about the laid-up telecom whiz's health.

This time round, Pitroda made no mistakes. Unnikrishnan was livid when Pitroda was a few minutes late in welcoming him to Sanchar Bhavan, and never forgave him. Pitroda was unable to welcome the new incumbent, Sanjay Singh, in person, but made sure that he congratulated him via telephone. The two have no grounds for friction, and when Pitroda returns to work in January, they are expected to harmonise pretty well.

Meanwhile, Sanjay's first test has gone off well. He broke the telecom employees' strike that paralysed India for the second time this year. And he is going around telling anyone who will listen that he is going to work very hard, and by the beginning of next year, telecom services will be in top shape, better than ever before.

And mostly, with domestic help. C-DoT has officially taken over the manufacturing of electronic switching systems (telephone exchanges) in Bangalore, a facility that French telecom giant Alcatel had hoped to get. (As it stands, Alcatel will have to be content with one factory it already has, in Mankapur, Uttar Pradesh.) All other multinational telecom operators—Siemens AG of Germany, British Telecom, Ericsson AB of Sweden, and a host of US companies, among others, will simply have to stay with whatever joint ventures they have. And future tie-ups will be strictly according to the government's diktat—at least that is what government officials say and industry observers fear. For, India cannot afford imports any longer, unless they come sweetened with very soft credit terms and conditions. For the moment, the homegrown, Sam Pitroda variety of technology is best.

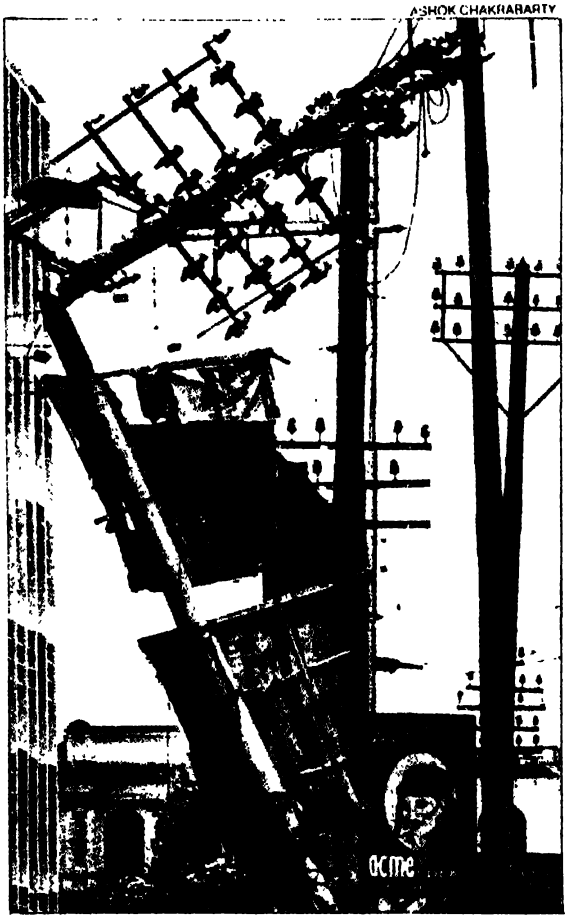
If Sanjay Singh can pull off his boast, and Pitroda delivers all, then India does not have to look elsewhere.

Power Problems Or 'Let There Be Light'



The highest electrified village in the world. Setting up super thermal power plants in record time. Reaching into inaccessible areas for path-breaking work in setting up power lines. 62,210 MW of power generated by public sector utilities alone, trebling the amount of power generated in three decades. Thriving private power companies This is India.

Turbines lying idle. Power being stolen, and one of the highest percentages of electricity loss—almost 22 per cent of what is generated—in the world. Inefficiency. Striking workers. A plant load factor of only 56.4 per cent, which means 43.6 per cent of capacity going to waste. Frequent blackouts. Large swathes of the country lying without power, affecting agriculture, industry and households. This also is India.

A man from Rajasthan who is a heavyweight in Janata Dal(S) politics. Is well-known in his state but little-known in New Delhi. A man who is hounded by womens' rights activists because he uttered words defending the practice of sati, even in modern India. And now, denies having said anything at all. He says he knows very little about electricity, though admittedly, he does know a lot about power. This is Kalyan Singh Kalvi, India's newest Cabinet minister for energy.

Kalvi has a problem on his hands: he has to supply enough electricity to meet the country's galloping demand. He will have to ensure that some work gets done towards installing 38,000 MW of power for the as yet stymied Eighth Plan period, between 1990-95. And alongside, deal with a reality that says there may be money enough only for 24,000 MW worth—or Rs 57,000 crores—if that.

ASHOK CHAKRABARTY

Planning for power: back to square one?

ASHOK VAHIE

Kalyan Singh Kalvi

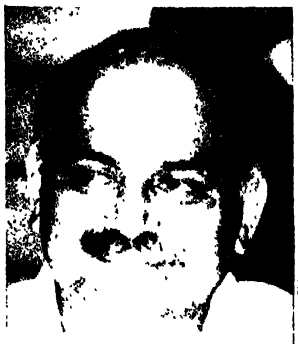
Arif Mohammad Khan

The new minister (above) will have to follow in his predecessors footsteps

Kalvi will also have to follow his predecessor Arif Mohammad Khan's example. Arif, in good sense, kicked off the process of further privatising the power sector. Kalvi will have to concretise it, as much as half the projected figure. He will have to entice entrepreneurs to move in, assuring them that the huge amounts of money they have to invest (an average of Rs 1.5 crores for every MW of generation capacity) will be well spent. He will also have to ensure that public utilities, which have a stranglehold on power distribution, distribute well and sans corruption.

Kalvi has to make sure work gets done towards installing 36,000 MW of power capacity for the Eighth Plan

He will have to clear the Central Electricity Authority's master plan which calls for an increase in capacity, a staggering 1,10,155 MW in the next ten years. He will have to. Otherwise, India's engines of growth—industry and agriculture—will be left with very little to work by. Besides, Kalvi will also have to realise that hydro-electric and solar power—in a world that is fast running out fuel to run thermal plants, and frightened of nuclear ones—are perhaps the most economic, safe and long-term alternatives.



Time there is not much of. For India and Kalvi. He has to move fast, but till now has not done a thing. For God's sake let there be light. ●

Perhaps no ministerial appointment has caused more consternation than the bizarre choice of Chaudhary Devi Lal to look after the tourism portfolio. Unusually, the ministry has been clubbed with agriculture. Wags have suggested that this is because Tauji can't tell an A320 from a tractor. Others have speculated that Om Prakash Chautala's on-going love affair with Minnie Mouse and the Disneyland that might result from that unnatural union, have led the Chaudhary to take the tourism ministry.

In fact, all the speculation is wide off the mark. Devi Lal is tourism minister only in name.

ASHOK VAIDYA

Mishra: bon voyage(s)

So, who really runs the ministry?

Step forward, S.K. 'Chappie' Mishra, agriculture secretary, one-time Bansi Lal acolyte and now Tauji's blue-eyed bureaucrat.

Mishra fancies himself as the father of Indian tourism on the basis of having built several motels on the highways of Haryana. He has been a notoriously unsuccessful boss of ITDC and a fun-loving civil aviation secretary in his time.

While he enjoys working with Tauji in the agriculture ministry, that job severely limits the number of jaunts he can make to the Carlyle Hotel in New York.

Hence, the deeply-felt desire to run the tourism ministry.

The night before the Cabinet expansion, an anxious Mishra persuaded Devi Lal to call up Chandra Shekhar and demand the tourism portfolio.

And now, it is Carlyle Hotel, here I come!

"No seriously, who are they?"

A prominent Bombay businessman's query about the new council of ministers, at a city cocktail party last week.

■ Only hotels

Nothing else, that's Lalit Suri's assertion. The much-maligned, alleged deal-maker of the Rajiv regime has resurfaced with a hotelier's tag. And a bonafide one at that.

While critics may question Suri's choice as one of the recipients of the 'Hind Rattan' award last month—gifted away by former President Zail Singh— for his outstanding contribution to the Indian hospitality industry, no one can deny Suri the prize he picked up a month earlier.

Suri: no more deals

Holiday Inn Worldwide awarded Suri its Torchbearer Trophy (Suri is chairman and managing director of the Holiday Inn Crowne Plaza, New Delhi), which is given in recognition of a hotel's good performance and high standards in customer service and profitability, among other things. In July this year, the Crowne Plaza had been designated a 'Superior Hotel' by the international chain. Not bad going—by any standard—for a hotel which is two years old.

As if to stress his new incarnation, Suri has also started a limousine service—with a stretched Cadillac, no less— for those who stay in suites, a la the good old US of A. For Suri, joke wags—though admiringly —it's no to Sumitomo, and yes to genuine hoteliering.

■ Livewire living

Videocon, the video, audio and TV company, has accomplished quite a fancy turn with their appliances effort, too. The Rs 400 crore-plus group has declared higher half-yearly results for six months ending September 1990, from the Rs 18.11 crores recorded for the same period last year. Net profit too has jumped, from Rs 2.46 crores for the same period last year to Rs 6.35 crores this year

The Dhoot family, which runs the set-up, should be happy. They have driven Videocon to near the top of the heap in India's consumer durables/electronics segment, consistently—and easily—drawn in funds from the capital market for expansion, and gained public appreciation. The thing is, they have also drawn flak for reaching for the sky too hastily, through allegedly unfair means. The last, if true, is hardly likely to deter the die-hard entrepreneurs, who are bent on doing an Ambani in the consumer durables field, and feel, say corporate observers, that hugging the fast track is the only way. ●

POLITICIAN OF THE WEEK

Maneka Gandhi

Minister of state for environment and forests

● The lady is back. And now, No Raja, so no fur caps. No Nilamani Routray, so no blubbery backtracking. And the greens are all gung-ho about their never-say-no-to-power patron saint. But unlike the last time round, when Maneka was content with existing bureaucrats handling brand new policies, she has ruthlessly shuffled the babus' jobs, as if to make them pay for not resigning from the V.P. bandwagon along with her.

She may also ruthlessly shuffle industrial clearances around, not content with looking after the Delhi zoo. Fortunately for India's industrialists, however, Chandra Shekhar is definitely not like Madhu Dandavate. Simply: Maneka can't dear-uncle the new lot like she did the old one. A battle royale? And another exit?

Promises, promises

What will become of Prasar Bharati now?

The Raja always insisted that, as far as he was concerned, the party manifesto was sacred. And, in accordance with it, the Janata Dal government would give priority to the task of granting autonomy to the electronic media. The Dal even had its time frame all worked out, with deadlines set for every stage of the project. The Prasar Bharati rules were to be framed by 31 October, notification of the rules was to be completed by 14 November, the selection of members of the governing body was to be accomplished by 31 December, the staff was to be inducted by 20 February, and so on.

But, for all that meticulous planning, things went quite disastrously wrong. And even before the Prasar Bharati Bill could be debated in the House, the Raja's regime had lost its credibility as far as its commitment to media autonomy went. With Doordarshan news bulletins devoted to projecting V.P. Singh and his favoured ministers such as Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav, nobody retained much hope about the Prime Minister making good his promise.

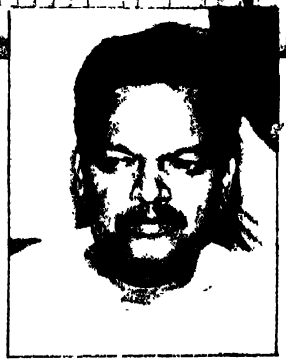
The public relations failure, though important enough in itself, was not all. The government couldn't even keep to its self-imposed deadlines. The rules were not framed by 31 October, for one. And when they were, they couldn't be notified without showing them first to the members of the board—which was nowhere near being constituted.

One of P. Upendra's last acts in power was to select Dr Pai Panandiker, director of the Centre for Policy Research in Delhi as the third member of the committee, which will select the Prasar Bharati Board. The other two members of the board, as prescribed by the Prasar Bharati Act, are the chairman of the Press Council and the vice-president of India. But, following the President of India's order that all appointments made after 23 October be reviewed, Chandra Shekhar, who is also information and broadcasting minister, will have to approve Dr Panandiker's name, or suggest a new nominee.

Until then, the constitution of the board will have to wait. Meeting the 31 December deadline seems near impossible.

The Broadcasting Council, comprising the president and ten members, hasn't been constituted either. Ever since the Act was passed, the I&B ministry has been receiving letters from eminent people offering themselves and their various relations for posts on the council, envisaged as a watchdog body. But no progress has been made on this front, because as a bureaucrat says: "The terms of the president and members have yet to be finalised. You can't select a big man until you know what you can offer him."

In fact, the I&B minister of state Subodh Kant Sahay, who doubles as minister of state for home affairs, appears inclined to delay the process even further. Sahay has mentioned in more than one interview that the electronic media should be deployed to fight the home ministry's battles. In that event, it would be in the government's interest to retain control of Doordarshan and Akashvani (All India Radio).



To the considerable mystification of bureaucrats in the I&B ministry, Sahay has already asserted that the Prasar Bharati Bill will be delayed. First, because there was almost no government for a month and second, because the constituting of the newly-notified Indian Broadcasting Service will take time.

Ministry officials dispute this. According to them, both reasons offered by Sahay are bogus. With a bit of hard work, Prasar Bharati could be delivered on schedule, they say. And, in any case, only 20-25 per cent of the work is done before the corporation comes into being. The formulating of regulations can be done later.

But, as is becoming rapidly clear, logistics are not the problem; the lack of political will is. And it seems extremely unlikely that anything much will be done on Prasar Bharati unless the government suddenly has a miraculous change of heart. •

Three wise men

Contrary to what Nikhil Chakravartty, George Verghese and Pran Chopra believed, V.P. Singh was not the answer to the nation's prayers

Myself when young did eagerly frequent
Doctor and Saint and heard great Argument
About it and about –but evermore
Came out by the same door where in I went!
The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam

When I was a mere slip of a lad, young, callow and fresh-faced, I turned like the infant Jesus to the East for Three Wise Men to ride out to me bearing the Gift of the Magi. And lo! They came Nikhil Chakravartty, George Verghese and Pran Chopra. Eagerly I would await the arrival of the diplomatic bag that would bring tidings of their carefully pondered good sense on the Great Affairs of the Day, the perusal of which, I was persuaded, would ensure that every day in every way I would grow better and better and better.

Now, as I slip into the evening or, at any rate, the tea-time of my life, I wonder whether it was wisdom new found that they bore me—or merely a Trojan Horse. For in those difficult days last December when I found myself parting ways with them over their perception of the iniquities of the Rajiv Raj and the dawning glory of their Raja's Raj, it was a problem, I confess –I confess– to cling to what I believed in when those who had taught me—so I thought– everything else I believed in were so cockahoop and so cocksure that my jehannam was their jannat. To differ with Gush-Gush Tavleen (the Hedda Hopper of Central Hall)—who, after all, merely recounts as considered political comment what she picks up at cocktail parties—I could take. But men of serious mien and beetle brows? Could they be dismissed in so cavalier a fashion? Perish the thought.

And so I have spent much of last week returning to what these three had to say in the heady days when the Man they had made King held out the Great White Promise—"This is the image that is bound to endear him (V.P. Singh) to the millions all over the country even if the smart set in Delhi chooses to be unimpressed." (Nikhil Chakravartty, The Telegraph, 31/12/89). As one of the "smart set" so execoriated—even if I don't attend quite the same twee gatherings as Gush-Gush does—the hour, I think, is upon me to eat the bitter bread of repentance—or suggest that others might begin eating theirs!

Of the three, I think it was Pran Chopra who, in his essay in The Illustrated Weekly Of India of 31 December 1989, best summed up the thesis the three were propagating –whether in concert or by mere coincidence, let us leave to others to judge.

Pran Chopra's point of departure was "the feeling among Congressmen that they are standing naked in the wilderness". Now, I grant that on his early morning walks in the urban jungle of Vasant Vihar, Pran might indeed have caught a Congressman or two in flagrante delicto (for, all evidence to the contrary notwithstanding, Congressmen—and, indeed, women—are, after all, mere flesh and blood). But if Pran was speaking metaphorically of hordes of Congressias waiting to be led out of the wilderness—clothed in freshly acquired Janata Dal raiments—surely it must be a little disconcerting for him to find that the only Congressmen seeking refuge elsewhere now are those who once thought they'd found the answer to their dreams in Vishwanath Pratap Singh! In the last 12 months in the "wilderness"(shame on you, Pran, for thinking that in a democracy to be in Opposition is to be in the "wilderness") not one Congressia of any significance has left the party. None, it appears, is aware of his nakedness. It remains only for Pran to kindly cover up his shame—it's showing!

Pran Chopra went on to argue that there was "a growing realisation in the Congress that it cannot return to power so long as its helm remains in the hands of Rajiv Gandhi ". Curious, isn't it, that those who most ardently wish to assist at the demise of the Congress are also the most ardent in tendering unsolicited advice on how it might best survive? Fortunately for the Congress, in that fetchingly obtuse way it has, Congressmen have a rather less apocalyptic view of impending nemesis. At any rate, no one in the Congress was blessed with the realisation that to Pran Chopra was so self-evident, with the result that it is that self-same helmsman and none other who is returning them to power, even as the frail bark which carries our Three Men in a Boat sinks gently into the special locker that Davy Jones reserves for those who grossly mislead their readers.

V.P. Singh was the helmsman continuously under challenge. Rajiv Gandhi's helmsmanship never came under challenge from anyone. Where then did Pran Chopra perceive the "move" to oust Rajiv

Pran's fantasies next led him to perceive "a move in the Congress to change the helmsman". The only helmsman who faced a continuous mutiny (which even his bounty could not forestall!) was the nakhuda whose cause Pran Chopra was so passionately championing. From the moment he started scheming to capture the leadership of the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party (and, thus, the prime ministership) to the day 11 months later when everyone on board from First Mate to bo'sun banded together to make him walk the plank, VP was the helmsman continuously under challenge. Rajiv Gandhi's helmsmanship never came under challenge from anyone. Where then did Pran perceive the "move" to oust Rajiv that he so confidently asserted last December. In his thoughts - or in his wishes? Or was he committing the cardinal sin permitted to no journalist of repute (Gush-Gush always excepted): to never let the wish father the thought"

This change of helmsman, Pran went on to argue "will spark a desire among large segments both in the Congress and the Janata Dal that the two cousins (oops, Pran, mind your language!) should come together again". Well, it is only the Congress desire never to change its helmsman that is now resulting in vast numbers of VP's camp followers (including our portly cousin, no less!— "cousin me no cousin", William Shakespeare, Richard II, Act 2, Scene 1) wondering when he will be permitted to jump ship!

All three—our homegrown Socrates, Plato and Aristotle—were quite taken up with their pet poodle. "Not only," intoned Pran, "are V.P. Singh's values closer to Nehru's than any other contemporary leader, they are closer to Nehru's than any past leader!" Pran, let it be remembered, is the country's senior journalist (he was in Hanoi that September day in 1945 when Ho Chi Minh proclaimed the Democratic Republic of Vietnam—that's how far back he goes! To end as a VP groupie: O tempora! O mores!)

"Altogether," concluded George Verghese in that engagingly portentous manner he has "the outcome of the general election provides much reason for optimism and hope. It is a harbinger of constructive change and a deeper commitment to democratic norms" (Indian Express, 1/12/89). What "democratic norms" might one ask? To which, in the same article, George has given this litmus test: "Confidence must be left to be determined by the House, and must and

Hey, did any of you see George sitting in dharna outside VP's soon-to-be-vacated quarters when he eked out his foredoomed end week after week, having the gall to actually ask the President—and not seeking your prior permission either, George—for time till the end of November to buy, browbeat or simply invite to the India International Centre all the supporters that he and his value-based cronies could garner? Democrat, George—or limpet?

Nikhil Chakravartty was even more forthright: "Where Vishwanath Pratap Singh has displayed a rare quality of statesmanship is in his allocation of portfolios. Particularly striking has been his appointment of Mufti Mohammad Sayeed as the home minister!" (Cross my heart and hope to die, I haven't made that one up: it's there for all to see, The Telegraph, 10/12/89.)

Where then do these Three Horsemen of the Apocalypse wish to lead our country? Away, they are clear, from that terrible thing, "a one-leader, one-focus, undemocratic party of highly centralised and personalised power" (Pran Chopra). Towards, it seems, that Great New Horizon that George has espied: "The country has clearly entered an era of coalition politics...The notion that a coalition or minority government is illegitimate, weak or necessarily unstable is quite unfounded. These myths need to be swiftly dispelled." True—but not, don't you think, George, quite as swiftly as V.P.Singh & Co. were dispelled? Sorry, George, but the fact is that unprincipled marriages of convenience, cemented only by hatred of one man—Rajiv Gandhi—are necessarily unstable, therefore weak—and, therefore, illegitimate. That is why your pious wishes notwithstanding ("What is significant about the new National Front government is that the predictions made so far- -liberally spread by the spokesmen of the Rajiv establishment (ahem, ahem,that's me he's talking about!)—that it would collapse by the sheer weight of contradictions between its two indispensable allies, the BJP and the left, have not come true": Nikhil Chakravartty, The Telegraph, 31/12/89) this lot collapsed even more ignominiously than the last lot. Pran Chopra was even funnier: "Their instinct for survival and the memory of their ten years in exile will help to ensure that no member of the triad (NF-BJP-Left Front) acts in a manner which may bring the whole triangle down!"

The fact is that what these three media pundits perceived as the Congress Party's weakness—an undisputed leadership, discipline, and a certain amorphousness in policy that makes Congress policy reflect a wider consensus—is the very strength of the Congress It is not a party that despairs when it is out of office—for it knows that, as it is the natural party of governance, it will return to power sooner rather than later—indeed, much sooner than later. Hundred and five years is a long time to forge an identity. It cannot be blown away with one electoral reverse.

It is only the Congress desire never to change its helmsman that is now resulting in vast numbers of VP's camp followers (including our portly cousin, Arun Nehru, no less) wondering when he will be permitted to jump ship

In sharp contrast, all the groupuscules brought together in the Janata Dal/National Front through sheer opportunism do not represent the "democratic, federal and coalitional" politics that so mesmerise Pran Chopra. It represents only a momentary coming together of transitional interests. They are not in it together because of any sense of common destiny but merely to grab whatever is going. In defeat, they would not hang together even a minute. In victory, they cannot hang together much longer. So, inevitably, as they jockey for power, intrigue against each other, lie, cheat and dissimulate, it becomes swiftly clear that as they cannot hang together, they must hang separately.

If these Three Wise Men, who, in the days before their present political dotage, had done so much to enlarge our understanding of ourselves, were not so blinded by their entirely irrational animus against one man, they would, I am certain, have seen that the V.P. Singhs and Arun Nehrus, the Devi Lals and Chandra Shekhars, the Sharad Yadavs and Ram Vilas Paswans could never have filled "the bulk of the middle stretch of the political spectrum" (Pran Chopra). Or proved the "overt coalition (that) could in some ways be stronger and more stable than the thinly-cemented Janata coalition that took office in 1979" (George Verghese). Or descend to the ultimate shame of Nikhil Chakravartty climaxing a life-time's service to secularism asserting: "There can be no viable prescription for curbing communalism without the active cooperation of the BJP!" (The Telegraph, 10/12/89). There was no "new alignment ...to bring the country back to the path of reason and understanding" (Nikhil Chakravartty). "Mr Gandhi" neither was nor is "the rejected leader of a rejected party" (George Verghese). And V.P. Singh's performance never did "release the flux" that Pran Chopra predicted would usher in "a time of creative change and rebuilding".

I have far too much respect for Nikhilda, Pran and George to wish them anything but all the best. But they must learn to distinguish between a truly viable "democratic, federal and coalitional" alternative to the Congress and every ragtag that comes along claiming to be that alternative. There is none in sight. I recognise that half a century is a long time in politics and all those who have been praying for a credible alternative to the Congress are beginning to despair of seeing such an alternative emerge in their life-times. But, as Nikhil Chakravartty so sententiously admonished Rajiv Gandhi last year, perhaps it is time our three long-reigning media Bourbons recognise themselves this year as they asked Rajiv Gandhi to recognise himself last year: "The Bourbon, even when displaced from power by the electorate, seems to be learning nothing and forgetting nothing." ●

The views expressed in this column are those of its author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress Party's position.

Poltergeist or prankster?

All glass objects shatter inexplicably in a Calcutta flat

The day, 18 October, began as any other in the household of Amiya Shankar and Tripti Roy, at Dum Dum, a northern suburb of Calcutta. Until the electric bulb in their one-room tenement suddenly burst into shards. The Roys were considerably shaken, but dismissed the incident as being caused by an electrical disorder of some sort. They changed the bulb, and thought no more of the mishap.

Only for a while, for soon such happenings became a regular occurrence. Over a period of 35 days, as many as 71 bulbs, several lantern chimneys and three tube lights shattered of their own accord. Says Tripti Roy: "Even the glass show case crashed against our bed on several occasions, breaking the glass panes." The concerned couple called in electricians, had the lines checked and even changed the wires. But, that didn't help either.

There was some suggestion that the construction work at the nearby metro rail site could be responsible, with the vibrations set up resulting in the damage. But none of the other houses in the vicinity, or any room in the Roys' building, experienced the problem. So that explanation was rejected as well.

Roy, a staunch Marxist, refused to believe that the incidents could be supernatural. However, much against his grain, he called in an ojha (exorcist) to see if his skills would work. They didn't.

Both scientific reasoning and exorcism having failed, those investigating the incidents began looking for other explanations. And the most credible of these revolved around the Roys' 16-year-old son Bubai. The teenager had always been present when glass objects shattered in his house. And nothing untoward had ever happened in his absence. Either, Bubai was up to mischief of some sort, or this was a classic case of the poltergeist phenomenon, in which a "restless soul" acts through the agency of an adolescent to cause varying degrees of mischief.

What gave credence to this version was the fact that the Roys sent away their son to his maternal uncle's house, and refused to let the press meet him. Said the father: "He is in a very disturbed state and we do not want to embarass him further."

SUNDAY, however, managed to track down Bubai at his uncle's house. The mischievously grinning boy wasn't in the least perturbed at being accosted by the media, but his uncle whisked him away almost immediately, saying: "You have found out what you had to from Mr and Mrs Roy. He can have nothing more to add."

According to the locals, however, Bubai wasn't at all disturbed by the supposedly supernatural incidents. Says one of his friends: "He seemed to be having a lot of fun, as if the whole thing was happening at someone else's house."

Such discrepancies abounded. The Roys differed on the dates when the incidents began to occur and when they sent their son away. All of which led Badal Chowdhury, the Roys' landlord, to say disparagingly, while pointing at the crowds gathered outside the building: "It is all a hoax and a complete nuisance."

Amiya Shankar Roy (inset) and the "haunted house"

Both scientific reasoning and exorcism having failed, people began looking for other explanations. And the most credible of these revolved around the Roys' 16-year-old son Bubai

A nuisance it certainly is, agree the Roys. "All kinds of people come into our house to question us about what is happening here."

Nobody, however, is sure about the answer. Were the incidents the work of a teenage prankster? Or, if one goes by Tripti Roy's version of the showcase falling on its own, were they caused by a poltergeist?

If the latter explanation is true, then the Roys have got off pretty lightly. These things can, apparently, turn really nasty at times.●

I Love Bombay

The much-awaited extravaganza disappoints

In the end, the "I Love Mumbai" extravaganza turned out to be just another tamasha. With over four lakh people crowding the Marine Drive-Chowpatty stretch to watch the action—a fashion show, a Kalyanji-Anandji nite, dandiya raas, a rock concert—the security arrangements made by the administration proved less than adequate. And as the crowd became unmanageable, breaking police cordons to have a closer look at the performers, the security forces resorted to stern measures to restore a modicum of control. They succeeded to an extent, but by then the sheriff of Bombay, Nana Chudasama, the prime mover behind the "I Love Mumbai" show, had egg all over his face.

The beginning itself had been less than fortuitous. No sooner had Chudasama and Dr Yusuf Merchant, drug rehabilitation expert, decided on a extravagana to take the anti-drug message to the city, than opposition presented itself. The Shiv Sena took great umbrage to the proposal, with mayor Chaggan Bhujbal maintaining that the show would be no more than a exercise toensure publicity for the sheriff, whom he called a "fraud". Demanding that the post of sheriff be abolished, Bhujbal said disparagingly: "This man (Chudasama) has contested three elections and forfeited his deposit in all of them. The rejection by the public has been total."

Well aware that he couldn't organise such a large affair as the "I Love Bombay" show without the support of the Shiv Sena, Chudasama began working on Bal Thackeray and Bhujbal. To assuage the feelings of the party, the extravaganza was hurriedly renamed "I Love Mumbai" and soon enough the Shiv Sena swung around, with Thackeray and Bhujbal present on the dais along with the sheriff when the show got underway.

While Dr Merchant's "recovering addicts" pounded the sidewalks, approaching business houses and artistes in the hunt for participants and sponsors, Chudasama began working on the Prime Minister (who was scheduled to visit Bombay on 25 November to unveil a bust of the late Y.B. Chavan) to get him to inaugurate the event.

Chandra Shekhar agreed, but criticism of Chudasama continued, with his detractors alleging that the entire exercise was geared towards securing the sheriff a third term in office.

Despite such negative pre-publicity, the show witnessed a record turn-out. From 4.30 pm onwards, the people started pouring in, and in an hour or so every vantage point was occupied. While colourful buntings welcomed Bombayites to the show, helicopters flew overhead, to shower confetti and cards with messages of goodwill on those gathered below.

The front-runner to the "I Love Mumbai" extravaganza, the Ananda and Tanusree Shankar performance at the Rang Bhavan, was warmly received by the audience. But it didn't prepare anyone for what was to follow on the 25th, when shows would be held simultaneoulsy at five venues

Trouble began even as Chandra Shekhar was giving his inaugural speech at the Marine Drive flyover, with Sharad Pawar, Bal Thackeray, Nana Chudasama, Chaggan Bhujbal and a host of MLAs sharing the dias with him.

Despite the negative pre-publicity, the show witnessed a record turnout. Unfortunately, the police couldn't keep the crowd in order

It was made out to be the show of a lifetime. But by the time it ended Nana Chudasama (seen here with various models), the prime mover behind the "I Love Bombay" extravaganza, had egg all over his face na, where the rock show was scheduled to be held, was threatening to get violent. "S.. the Prime Minister, start the music," some of the youngsters began shouting. And the rest of the crowd appeared to agree with the sentiment.

Backstage, there were further complications. The police insisted on shifting the cars of some of the band members. But the musicians were adamant that their cars should stay, for fear that the restive crowd would destroy them otherwise. Members of the bands, Mirage, 13 AD and Rock Machine told the police: "You shift those vehicles and we don't play."

By this time, the crowd had gone totally out of control, with the police trying to restore order with their lathis.

The Prime Minister finally wound up his speech, in the midst of all the confusion, and Sharad Pawar pulled the trigger on the flare gun. Just then the lights went out: the crowd had unearthed the cables. Only after the fault was remedied could the show get underway.

At Chowpatty beach, the venue of the Kalyanji-Anandji nite, however, the mob had gone totally hysterical. As many as 1,00,000 people had turned out to watch their favourite stars, and they broke down the barricades and fought one another to get a better glimpse of the action. Compere Tabassum could only look on helplessly, and ask the crowd to calm down at periodic intervals. But the mob paid little attention to her pleas and those sitting in the special enclosure fled in terror as it began surging towards the stage.

Soon, chappals were being thrown at the performers, prompting Amjad Khan to declare, a la Gabbar (Sholay) Singh, "Bahut jaan hai tum logon main. (You people have a lot of energy)." Jackie Shroff, Sonam and several others sang and danced while pandemonium prevailed. Even the pleas of Dilip Kumar were lost in the confusion, though Kalpana Iyer did try to introduce some light humour, picking up one of the chappals and dancing with it for a while.

When the lathi-charges didn't work, the policemen took off their belts and began whipping the hysterical crowd. It was at this point that Amitabh Bachchan arrived after dinner with Chandra Shekhar, Bal Thackeray, Nana Chudasama, Sharad Pawar and others at Raj Bhavan. And all hell broke loose. The police simply gave up; it was only the cordon thrown around the stage that prevented the crowd from injuring the mega-star in its enthusiasm.

The fashion show, with Shymak Davar and Rave among the performers, was as much of a fiasco. When models like Meher Jesia sauntered on stage, bare shoulders, midriffs et al, the crowd went totally—as one viewer put it— "sexerk". The police had to throw around their lathis yet again. Unofficial sources had it that six people were injured in the melee and had to be hospitalised later.

In the midst of all the confusion, members of the All India Youth Federation went around shouting such slogans as "Black money show", while 64 of them courted arrest.

The Marathi programme, with Sunil Gavaskar officiating as chief guest, and the Gujarati folk dance and music show were, perhaps, the only events to go off without incident.

The intial bit of the "I Love Mumbai" extravaganza was featured live on television. But if the show was bad, the coverage was downright disastrous. After showing viewers a brief glimpse of the various shows, the announcer said: "Now that we have taken you to all the other venues, let us get back to Kalyanji Anandji."

Meanwhile, back at the "I Love Mumbai" site, the show continued. The 20x20 feet screens functioned well, until the mob destroyed one and badly damaged the other. Nine electrically-lit floats, each containing an astounding 1,40,000 bulbs started from the base of the Marine Drive flyover and moved towards Wilson College where the rock show was being held. Two hundred brightly-lit boats floated on the Arabian Sea and fireworks arranged by the Moranis were watched by a crowd estimated at 5,00,000.

But in all the confusion, the anti-drug message was lost somewhat. Nobody, however, missed the irony in the show being sponsored by such concerns as manufactured liquor and cigarettes, which are as addictive as drugs, though in slightly less harmful way.

At around quarter to 12, the five venues fell silent, and the crowd, much the worse for wear, went home to sleep it off. Sheriff Nana Chudasama bravely declared that despite the problems and the obvious shortcoming, the extravaganza had gone off well.

And nobody had the heart to contradict him on that one. •

Victory at last!

India wins the Chandigarh Test against Sri Lanka amidst controversy

So, India has won a Test match after a drought that lasted 14 matches. At the moment it does not matter who the opponents were—a team from Timbuctoo would fit the bill if it were an accredited Test side. It is true that Sri Lanka is going through a process of rebuilding its own side the one that played at Chandigarh looked both jaded and weak. But the fact remains that India has won its first Test in almost two years.

There will be happy memories for Mohammad Azharuddin, who has played six tests as captain without a victory For Venkatapathy Raju, it will be a match to cherish, as the 20-year-old left arm spinner from Hyderabad bagged the man-of-the-match award. He captured eight wickets in the two innings that Sri Lanka played, in his third Test appearance.

NIKHIL BHATTACHARYA

Tillakaratne bowled by Venkatapathy Raju: spinning India to victory

But much more than the innings and eight runs victory, the match will be marked for the unique achievement of Kapil Dev, who captured his 376th wicket to level with Ian Botham of England. Now he is the second-highest wicket-taker in the world after Sir Richard Hadlee. For an Indian pace bowler to achieve this feat is by itself remarkable. Having done it despite playing half his 110 Tests on the unhelpful wickets of India makes it a far greater feat than Botham's. It is now just a matter of time before he surpasses Botham, but it will take a great deal of fortitude and a generous dose of luck before he gets past Hadlee's 431.

All said and done, however, this was not just a Test match of achievements. The selectors seem to have been unable to shrug off the reasonings and attitudes of former chairman of the committee, Raj Singh. The latter had kept talking about a "team for the Nineties"—even as he left out some youngsters without allowing them to settle down. He used the excuse of inducting youngsters so that old war-horses like Mohinder Amarnath could be eased out.

Kapil Dev (above) captured his 376th wicket to become the second highest wicket-taker in the world

Raj Singh's successors went one step ahead. It is one thing to exclude a senior player altogether from a Test squad. It is quite another to include him, only to keep him in the reserves, so that his only touch with the Test would be an occasional stint as a substitute fielder or a towel man accompanying the drinks trolley!

This is what happened to Arun Lal. The opener from Bengal was kept in the squad presumably to silence the vociferous Cricket Association of Bengal, clamouring for representation in the national side from a champion state. The CAB took it for granted that Lal would automatically be in the playing eleven.

The question of Arun Lal remains intriguing. Azharuddin claims that he can only voice his opinion—it is up to the selectors to pay heed to his advice or ignore it. Legally speaking, he is right. But when a mere comment of the Indian skipper is taken so seriously that the very institution of a "cricket manager" for the squad is abolished, it seems strange that if he insists on the inclusion of a player, the selectors will choose not to listen.

It follows, therefore, that Arun Lal wasn't wanted by anybody. And that could include the East Zone representative, Russi Jeejeebhoy, because even if he had wanted Lal in the squad, it didn't show. And Azharuddin queered the pitch further by telling a journalist, that for the Pakistan series, he would insist on regular openers. One would really like to know whether he considers Arun Lal a regular opener or not.

The question of age is regularly bandied about, when a player is to be axed. When you can have a Colin Cowdrey recalled at the age of forty, to play a Test, surely Arun Lal is not too old. Blooding in youngsters is alright, but only up to a point. The primary issue is putting the best team on the field—regardless of age.

A related issue was that of Ravi Shastri. The former captain and now almost permanent vice-captain of the Indian team did not get to bowl a single over in the Test against Sri Lanka. The cricket manager on the England tour, Bishan Singh Bedi (axed since), shot off a few comments after the match, which startled players and spectators alike.

He said that Ravi Shastri had refused to bowl, a statement vehemently denied by the player, who wasn't appeased even after Bedi had tried to rephrase the charge by saying that, "If I were in your place, I would have taken the ball from the captain and bowled—after all, this was a spinner's paradise." Ravi Shastri was peeved, to say the least. It was a preposterous charge, not to speak of the insinuation that all was not well among the players. •

Weekly fair

Calcutta's Maidan plays host to a mela every Sunday

• Eight-year-old Mukhtar's head is buried deep in the ground, while his body strikes a contrortionist's pose above it. In a couple of minutes his lungs, unable to expell air, will be fit to burst. But by then, it will be Ekhtar's turn to perform the feat. And at the end of the day, the pair will have collected Rs 5—10, more than their parents will by begging.

• The balancing beam is a bit of crude effort, but frail Shibu performs his act with due finesse. Tossed on to the first beam, he somersaults before returning to terra firma, to the sound of thunderous applause.

• Ramdhan places a small tin vessel on the ground. And his faithful dog Moti climbs on it on all fours. The master places another vessel, and yet another, all of which the dog climbs on, without dislodging the pile. A small oil tin and a mobile oil container is added on. And Moti is more than equal to the task.

You'll find all this and more at the Dharamtalla ka mela. Staged on the grounds adjoining the Ochterlony Monument (popularly known as the Shahid Minar), the fair, with its magic shows, amateur circuses and fortune-tellers, attracts hordes of spectators, the odd foreign tourist among them, every Sunday. Only a stone's throw away from Calcutta's five-star hotel, the Oberoi Grand, on the city's busiest throughfare, Chowringhee Road, the mela attracts street-performers from all over the country, who display their art before the largely lower middle-class audience, in order to eke out a living of sorts.

But this Apna Utsav is spontaneous: there are no organising committees, no clearances by the ministry of culture, no media blitz or international exposure. Yes, the fair was the subject of a documentary, by a group of young filmmakers under the banner of Shape, shown at the Berlin Film Festival a couple of years back. But that came later; the fair itself has been a regular feature at Calcutta's Maidan for as long as anyone can remember, on the performers' initiative alone. Doing the rounds of the city through the week they congregate at the mela every Sunday, to perform the same tricks before a larger audience.

Among them are the young boys Ekhtar and Mukhtar (they of the being-buried-alive trick) and Dhanir-am and Phoolmati, the husband-wife team from Banaras, who've performed all over north India. Their daughters Munni and Sharda, are part of the act, dancing gracefully in the manner of Russian ballerinas.

Devi Singh, from a remote hamlet in Rajasthan, has wonder cures on offer. He sits with an assortment of colourful solutions before him and a bottle with a bright-yellow solution in it. According to Singh, it is magar-mach ki charbi (crocodile fat), which can, apparently, cure any pain under the sun. All this for Rs 5 only, which you can pay after the medicine has done its work.

Among the astrologers and fortune-tellers (some with trained parrots to pull out the magic card), sits B.K. Roy, selling shells from the Andamans. On another corner of the Maidan Ramdhan is regaling audiences with his wonder dog Moti, who jumps though a ring of fire only after his master assures him, "babu log paisa dega"

But the earnings vary greatly from one performer to another. While Ramdhan makes about Rs 100 on a good day, others have to make do with half that amount or even less. For, while everyone crowds around to see the tricks being performed, the crowd has a way of melting away quite miraculously when the collection bowl is passed around. And, to make matters worse, a cut (hafta in local parlance) has to be given to the police to ensure a trouble-free existence. All in all, the going is not easy.

ASHOKE CHAKRABORTY

Ramdhan and his wonder dog Moti

ASHOKE CHAKRABORTY

Mukhtar performs before bemused bystanders

It is a high-profile life, though. For, every Sunday, people in great numbers arrive at the mela, standing six-deep at places to watch the shows. The audience isn't upmarket, comprising largely rural folk from Bengal and the adjoining state of Bihar, who've arrived in the city, looking for work.

For Subodh Ram, a peon at the Telephone Bhavan, a visit to the fair is tantamount to a trip down memory lane, such melas being a regular feature in his village. Harish Kumar Pathak, a schoolteacher, has different motivations. "I prefer this to TV or movies," he says. "This is a live show, with greater entertainment value."

But whatever the reason, the crowds keep coming in every week, to gaze in wonder while the performers go through their repertoire, the sound of their drums audible above the city traffic. •

Chandra Shekhar at Male: a great hit

COMMUNICATION SKILLS

He began sedately enough, reading from a prepared text, in his accented English. But, to the surprise of all assembled at the concluding session of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) in Male (and the delight of Mulayam Singh Yadav), Chandra Shekhar soon set aside his notes, to hold forth in a mixture of Hindi and Urdu.

The extempore effort was a great hit, with delegates, and heads of government, cheering loudly after the Indian Prime Minister was through. Though, Nepali premier K.P. Bhattarai did turn to the King of Bhutan,Jigme Singhe Wangchuck, to ask if he'd understood Shekhar's address.

Only 60 per cent of it, the King confessed, somewhat abashed by his ignorance.

Chuckled Bhattarai: "If I decide to speak in my language, I think Mr Chandra Shekhar will understand 70 per cent of it. I'm not sure about the others."

IN THE NAME OF RAM

First, Uma Bharti's audio-cassette, with its inflammatory rhetoric on the Ayodhya issue, made news. And now, a video-cassette on the same subject, produced by Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) member, Dr J.K. Jain has become the centre of a controversy.

It was Insaf party chief Syed Shahabuddin, who took the lead in insisting that the cassette, a product of Jain Studios, was meant to incite the "Hindu community and mobilise it for the demolition of the disputed structure at Ayodhya", and should be banned. In a letter to Prime

BACK TO THE PAVILION

For Arun Lal, it was a dream come true. After years spent in the comparative wilderness of domestic cricket, he had been selected to open for India in the solitary Test against Sri Lanka, on the strength of his impressive scores for Bengal.

But, as is usual with Lal, the dream died fast. On the day of the match, while Lal was at work on one of the practice wickets, the selectors, led by Naren Tamhane, inspected the wicket. And decided that in view of its under-prepared nature, an extra bowler was required.

Arun Lal: pipped at the post, again

This meant that a batsman had to go. And so, exit: Arun Lal.

Said a disappointed Lal after being dropped: "I don't know how I'll spend the next few days. I am so disappointed. It was a shock for me because I was sure of playing and hadn't got any hint that I would be dropped."

And, at 35, he can't really count on being selected again.

Syed Shahabuddin: ban the cassette

Minister Chandra Shekhar, Shahabuddin wrote that the film contained false propaganda about the "martyrdom of 3,75,000 Hindus since 1526", and would further inflame passions in the already surcharged atmosphere.

Dr Jain hasn't responded to the charges as yet. But the situation shows all signs of developing into a battle royal, once the BJP video doc gets his act together.

FRAUD!

The fraud had been detected three years ago. Enquiring about a donation she'd sent earlier to the Missionaries of Charity, a foreign donor discovered that her money hadn't arrived at all. Mother Teresa promptly registered a case with the detective department of Calcutta police.

Investigations revealed that a peon in the postal sorting office at Dum Dum, in cahoots with two nationals of Bangladesh and one of Singapore,was perpetrating the fraud. The money sent to the Mother's organisation eventually found its way to bank accounts in Singapore, opened under false names, and was siphoned off by the crooks.

SUMMIT OF THE DOLLS

When the Berlin Wall came down, Poorna Sonawala, a student at Bombay's Cathedral School, didn't quite realise how important a part the event would play in her life.

For, soon after traffic was restored between the two Germanies, a young East German girl dragged her mother to the West to buy a Barbie doll! Hearing of this, the manufacturers decided to hold a Barbie Summit in New York City, attended by children all over the world.

Leo Mattel Toys Inc. held a world-wide painting and short essay competition to select the representatives from each country. In India, 10,000 schoolgirls participated in the competition. And Poorna Sonawala won the first prize—and the coveted trip to the Big Apple—with a painting of a globe surrounded by children holding hands.

So, Poorna's off to the summit, which will include a conference on world freedom and peace. The participants will also produce a video cassette on the impact children have on events, and send it to leaders all over the world.

Poorna Sonawala: Barbie is best

And, no doubt, Poorna will present a copy to Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar. ●

Water, water, everywhere...

■ For those in the drought-striken areas of Rajasthan, drinking water has always been a priceless commodity. And, to add to their problems, the little water available proves too salty for consumption.

With this problem in mind, the Central Salt and Marine Chemicals Research Institute (CSMCRI) at Bhavnagar, Gujarat, has come up with a vehicle equipped with scientific apparatus which can transform saline water into salt-free tasty liquid. What is noteworthy is that the project, the first of its kind, employs the process of 'reverse osmosis' which is feasible, both technologically and economically.

The desalination project will reach into the heart of arid areas, converting upto 10,000 litres a day.

With CSMCRI playing a pivotal role in trying to solve the drinking water shortage prevalent in rural areas, the day is not far off when crystal clear saltless water is available in every home.

SEPARATED AT BIRTH?

Sonam

Shilpa Shirodkar

The long stint at the top has left Sridevi unbelievably smug. For, instead of resenting newcomers such as Nagma she goes out of her way to help them.

Of course, Nagma's is a special case. Sridevi has known her ever since she was a kid (Nagma, that is, not Sri), and the southern star had played the lead in her father Chander Sadannah's film Aulad. (Nagma insists that Sri never plays a star with those who know her well.)

And, for what it's worth, Sridevi has recommended the newcomer to Saroj Khan for dancing lessons.

We suppose we're in for a repeat of the Rekha-Sridevi relationship, with Sri playing patron saint this time.

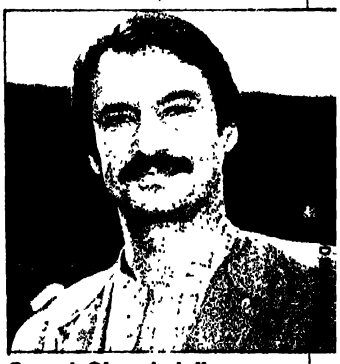
And thank God, she doesn't have a steady boyfriend whom Nagma could steal.

Sridevi: who's scared of Nagma?

All those who've been wondering who is going to be the replacement for Kimi Katkar, can give their brains a rest. For the answer lies with Mama Katkar, who has decided to transform her latest client (Tina Katkar, for the benefit of ignorant souls, is a dress designer) Rupa Ganguly into a Kimi clone.

Surprisingly enough, the Draupadi of the small screen doesn't seem to mind too much, for she has even hired Bali, Kimi's former secretary to handle her dates, providing for yet another parallel with the Jumma chumma girl.

So, the next time you see a buxom Rupa cavorting on the screen, don't be too surprised at the sudden and somewhat miraculous improvement in her physical attributes. Mama Katkar has this obsession with padded dresses—and not just at the shoulders, either.



Rupa Ganguly: Kimi clone?

If insider reports are to be believed, Rakesh Roshan has volunteered to complete Gurudev, the film Vinod Mehra left unfinished.

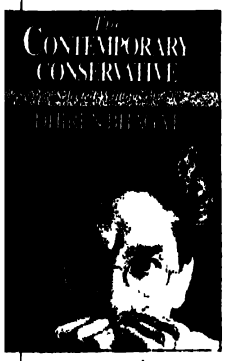
If the plan does work out, Kiran Mehra may well find her dream come true. For, Vinod's young widow has vowed that she will see her husband's task through, if it's the last thing she does.

And now that the industry has decided to rally around the Mehras in this hour of grief, it may not be as difficult as when Vinod attempted it.

Guess who's been talking to anyone who listens about his problems with the Enforcement Directorate. No, you're wrong, it isn't Him, but that old side-kick Suresh Oberoi, whom one would never suspect of warranting such attention.

Suresh Oberoi: dollar trouble

Apparently, Oberoi had been part of some entertainment show or the other in the States and had been paid for his pains—and the audience's—by cheque. The bank refused clearance to the actor, so Suresh asked his brother, resident in New York, to try and recover the money. He managed to do just that and sent over the amount to Oberoi in India via the Punjab and Sind bank. The Directorate, however, got wind of the fact and began hassling the actor.



Oberoi insists that he's paid tax on the amount and that he's being needlessly victimised.

But surely it's worth it, if only for the publicity?

THE BHAGAT INTERVIEWS

N.T. Rama Rao, Maneka and Rajiv get the treatment

What made Bhagat's interviews so memorable was the fact that he dared ask questions that nobody else did, provoked his subjects into indiscretion, and then quoted them verbatim to their considerable embarrassment. Predictably, none of the interviewees cared to repeat the experience. But his irreverant style made for a great read.

Dhiren died at 31, crashing his Maruti Gypsy on Delhi's Willingdon Crescent. But some of his best interviews ever done for The Illustrated Weekly Of India and The Sunday Observer with Maneka Gandhi, N.T. Rama Rao and Rajiv Gandhi, have been included in a collection of his writings, The Contemporary Conservative (published by Viking). SUNDAY publishes some extracts.

Maneka Gandhi

Q: After Sanawar you studied at Delhi University, didn't you?
A: Yes, I went to LSR (Lady Shri Ram) where I did political science. I did one year there and then I got married.

Q: What were your political views at that point?
A: Zero.

Q: You didn't learn very much from your doing political science then?
A: No.

Q: So, when you married Sanjay Gandhi, you didn't have very clear political ideas.
A: I had none. I had none. It wasn't a matter of clear or not clear. I just had none. You must remember I was from an army background. Ninety nine point nine per cent of my relatives didn't have the faintest idea what's going on. Then I got married.

Q: Mrs Gandhi now suggests she disapproved of you from the beginning. Were you aware of her disapproval?
A: No. I wasn't aware of it at the time. She was very nice to me. I hardly knew her, you know, because my mother was very strict and she always insisted I was home by 9.30 p.m. So I had dinner with the family and then used to be dropped back. And at dinner, I mean, you hardly, I don't know... In any case, I was very, very young. I wasn't even 18.

Q: Later, in 1975, did you and Sanjay urge her to declare the Emergency?
A: That's not true at all. In fact, it's another, er, it's another silly story. Because I remember when the Emergency was declared, I was on holiday in Kashmir with a friend of mine and I came back much later and I didn't have the faintest idea.

Q: Kashmir seems to have been a very convenient place to go to...
A: I think lots of people in Delhi go there in the summer. Anyway, then I came back...and then I came back...I don't remember when I came back, and I didn't have the faintest idea what was going on and I didn't change my lifestyle or anything, so I still hung around in jeans and went to college and attended college from nine to five. And nobody, it never made any difference to anybody in college, because we were as, in JNU, in my class particularly, as ignorant of what was happening.

Q: Ignorant of the Emergency in JNU!
A: In my class. They had all finished school and they were two years younger to me, they were little, little children, and we talked about German, about how we could wangle scholarships to Germany and... (Laughs).

Q: I was at Elphinstone College in Bombay then and I too had just joined college but nobody could talk of anything else but the Emergency...
A: It was something like...For me it

When the Emergency was declared, I was on holiday in Kashmir with a friend... I didn't have the faintest idea was something like, in the eye of the storm, see nothing. I was the least, you know, being politically unaware, and...I was zero. I wasn't interested at that time. Gradually, yes, it cropped up.

Q: Didn't you think your husband's behaviour during the Emergency was, to say the least, controversial?
A: Controversial? To you. Not controversial to me. Now you're asking what are called, pointed questions, you've already made up your mind about what you want to ask, what you want to hear. It's nothing I'm ashamed about, that I have to lie about.

Q: When did you first become aware of politics?
A: You are asking me when I became aware. I became aware when Sanjay was at the receiving end. I felt what was being done to Sanjay was totally unfair.

Q: How would you know if it was unfair? You've said you weren't aware of what was going on during the Emergency so how could you be so sure he was being unfairly blamed?
A: I felt Sanjay was being made the scapegoat for everything. Ultimately, everything came back to Sanjay. The chief ministers shared no blame, the ministers shared no blame, the government shared no blame...all the people in charge were now on the other side accusing Sanjay.. If you remember in those two years he was blamed for everything.

Q: You say that after the '77 elections you began to identify yourself with the politics of Sanjay Gandhi. Did this identification proceed from personal considerations of being his wife or did it proceed from some sort of ideological commitment?
A: Now you're talking absolute garbage. Every single thing that happens in life stems from something personal and we try to cloak it in very, very, very heavy terms like 'ideological'...I know everybody in politics is in it because of something personal. Everything you do starts from something personal, not because you're ideological, but because you're interested...

She (Indira Gandhi) was very nice to me. I hardly knew her, you know, because my mother insisted I was home by 9.30 pm

Q: What I want to know is, did your support for Sanjay Gandhi's peculiar politics, stem from some prior ···
A: Look, I don't know what you're trying to manoeuvre in this interview but what I'm saying is at JNU, during the Emergency, I had absolutely no idea. Even after the Emergency, I was concerned with what was happening to Sanjay after the Emergency. So don't go round and round and just come back to, did you support the Emergency or not, because that's basically what you want to ask.

Q: Looking back at it now, do you have any regrets about the Emergency? Do you feel that things should have been done differently?
A: My main regret about the Emergency is that I think Sanjay, well, not Sanjay, I think the government made one very, very crucial mistake: that is, they cut off all feedback to them. I'm sure they weren't monsters sitting there or inhuman people or anything like that. I'm sure if they had the feedback they would have been able to correct anything that was going wrong at a very early stage, if it was going wrong.

Q: You said 'Sanjay, well, not Sanjay, the government': but do you feel it was also Sanjay's mistake to cut off feedback?
A: I'm sure it was a mistake of Sanjay's in the sense that, if he wanted, if he had, if he felt, well, let me see, that, press censorship was unnecessary, he could have done something about it.

Q: Did Sanjay oppose the decision to go in for the '77 elections? Did he think that a mistake?
A: I don't think he had a say one way or another. It was a government decision.

Q: What do you have to say about the following letter you are supposed to have written to your mother: 'I hope uncle Minna dies a gory death, I have run through all my schemes of kidnapping his children, poisoning his wife's food etc., and now I give up'.
A: Yes.

Q: Do you deny you wrote that?

I became aware (of politics) when Sanjay was at the receiving end. I felt what was being done to Sanjay was totally unfair

A: Certainly not (smirks). I never denied that at any stage. You're bringing up something that's been finished one year ago. Of course I had written it. I'd written it when I was 15 and it was a very, very public school, immature letter. And, it was written to my mother who was going through a lot of family problems...And I was in school, I think I was in Xth standard, or the XIth standard. There are so many things everyone writes to their parents in their letters...

Q: Well, I've never written anything of this sort. Don't you think this sort of letter could hound you in later life, when you stand for public office?
A: I don't think so. It's a letter written by a little girl...

Q: I am now going to ask you about a report in a Delhi paper last year. In an article Mohammed Yunus wrote...
A: I'm not going to comment on that at all. Because I just think it's not worth commenting on at all.

Q: You don't think it's worth commenting on at all? Do you think it's all false?
A: Unfortunately you've picked up from the papers all the things that come out as gossip. You haven't picked up a single thing that is factual (raises her voice). No, it's not. You are interested in gossip. I have already said the whole thing seems to have come from a very sick person.

Q: Your father, I gather, during the Emergency...
A: No. You're just interested in gossip. You haven't asked me a single question that I even consider serious. Ask me proper questions. So many interviewers come and they ask me proper questions.

Q: What sort of questions do you consider proper?
A: Just general...questions. I don't know. I'm not going to give you something like that.

Q; OK, I'll ask you a 'proper' question. What do you think of Chandra Shekhar's padayatra ?
A: I think it's a good idea.

Q: Would you support him in his attempts to become Prime Minister?
A: Not just on the basis of the padayatra.

Q: On the basis of his record of 20 years in politics?
A: Er, I don't know.

Q: When I ask you a 'proper' question, you say you don't know. What sort of questions do you know about? I know very well that you are not going to make a new policy statement of your party in this interview. So what do I ask you about?
A: You're the one asking.

Q: Right. That's why I think it's proper to ask you questions about things that have appeared in the press about your life, to get your views on these events.
A: No. I don't think it's proper at all. Why don't you ask me something that has wider interest?

Q: Well, I think you're a very, young person and I don't think you're in a position to make very important remarks about wider things. You have played a rather limited political role so far.
A: Then tell me Dhiren, why are you here doing the interview at all?

Q: Because you are arguably the most important person of my generation in the country but your importance stems from your strange biography. That's why I am asking you about your life. As you said, everything you do starts from something personal...

The Illustrated Weekly of India
2 October, 1983

From the beginning I have been godly minded...From the age of six I used to recite the Bal Ramayana

N. T. Rama Rao

Q: You are dressed as a sanyasi now. But what about your childhood? Can you recall any moral lapses? Did you ever lie or steal? Or were you always saintly?
A: There have been many temptations in my life but I have observed strict discipline. I was tempted once by a short knife and I had taken it. But again I thought, I should not take it without their permission. So then I put it in the original place.

Q: How old were you at the time?
A: I was just twelve years old.

Q: How did you acquire your knowledge of mythology and religion?
A: From the beginning I have been godly minded.

Q: One of the most important roles in your career was the one where you played Lord Venkateshwara of Tirupati. That's when a lot of adulation began...
A: Yes. I was concentrating all the time then. Now you can see also. These days of course on account of all the political...I used to concentrate like this. (NTR falls silent, stares at the opposite end of the room, transfixed.) Within five minutes I can outfocus any person.

Q: Outfocus?
A: I can see a blank. I don't see any

When I used to keep concentrate (on the sets) I would say: ready... They used to all pindrop silence detail. I don't think of any man also (still staring). Opposite I can outfocus you also. I won't see your image. Just you will become a blur. Just outfocussing. You will become a hazy figure. Without any detail.. Without any ear or eye or anything...Now I am slowly getting you also outfocussed.

Q: Where is your concentration?
A: (Transfixed.) I am not seeing Mr Parvatala Rao also .Without closing my eyes, I would .

Q: Blank out?
A: Yes (unwinds, stops staring). This is what I did in the Lord Venkateshwara film. All the artists tried to close their eyes in meditation. You see also sadhus are closing the eyes. Whenever they are doing tapas or meditation or concentration they put padmasana and sit closing the eyes. I have tried in my life to open the eyes and outfocus anything before me.

Q: When you meditate what do you concentrate on?
A: God.

Q: An abstract God? Or an image in your mind?
A: It is just a light. That is my approach for meditation. As an artist, my dear sir, concentration is very important. Kala. It is so pious and so worthy. Last picture of mine, Bobbilipuli, when I was shooting the climax I asked the director to close the doors. It was my fortune also they used to love me so much. Anybody comes they used to sit at a distance from me, they never used to smoke before me. They never came with chappals before me. When the climax we are doing I concentrated for one-and-a-half days. The film consists of nearly 3,000 feet above (goes into a trance).

When I used to keep concentrate I would say: ready. They used to shoot. Again I used to concentrate on my next shot, take my mood and say: OK ready please. They used to all pindrop silence.

Q: It is said you can stay awake for stretches of 72 hours...
A: Yes. Pracharam at election time, I stayed awake then.

Q: That's unusual enough. But more unusual than that is your ability to sleep. Your friend the actor Gommadi claims that once in Vijaywada you slept for seventy-two hours straight.
A: Ha, ha, ha. Now if I wanted to sleep I could also sleep on this floor.

Q: For 72 hours?
A: Yes. Sleep means sleep.

Q: But that's not human. It's like a bear in hibernation.
A: Eating also. I can't stay back from eating. For forty-one days I stayed back from eating after I became chief minister. And if I want to do it I can eat five times a day even Q: You became a vegetarian on 14 April this year. What prompted the decision?

A: When I put on this (points to his bhagwa bhes) I want to kill down all the emotions and everything.

Q: What were the precise reasons that prompted you to take sanyas?
A: I want to be above want. No self want to me. Nothing can tempt me now. And I can't use my power, which God has given, for any of my individual benefit.

Q: There has been this story about how some astrologer has recommended that you wear a sari at night. Do you wear saris at night?
A: I am very very sorry for the human mind. It is a mean thing to say. Treacherous also. Treacherous. Treacherous.

Q: How is it treacherous, this story? After all, even if it were true that you were wearing a sari at night, so what of it? It's not as if they were alleging corruption.
A: Ha, ha, ha. Our sages they are wearing a sari even, even our Shankaracharya. It is a special style of sari wearing.

Q: So it's hardly a shameful practice...
A: Why night time? If I want to wear it I can wear it in the day time also. I am not a coward. What is there? What is there? It is my taste, my beliefs.

Q: After all you wore a single earring in public despite the jibes in the press that it was a homosexual symbol...
A: Yes. Nobody is empowered to interfere in my private habits.

Q: In press circles much is made of the fact that you have never denied wearing saris.
A: Nobody asked me so far. They have been writing their own fantastic tales. First time you have asked me and I have denied

Q: Which rishi's life would you wish to emulate?
A: The rishis, only Vishwamitra. That is the life (Laughter)

Q: I gather there has been some problem with your latest film, the one with the somewhat unwieldy title Srimad Virat Potuluri Veera Brahmendra Swami Jeevita Chaitra.
A: It is a picture directed, produced by myself. I have even acted five parts in it. I have acted Ramanuja, I have acted Buddha, acted Vyaman and I have acted Veer Brahman. From age to age so many saints have come and served humanity by their preachings.

Q: Why did the Censor Board cut the film? Was there a political problem?
A: I don't know. Even now it is before the court.

Q: In a film about a saint what sort of scenes could the Censor Board object to?
A: I don't know. That's where I got piqued also. It's not at all a commercial film. It's just as a last picture of

Why night time? If I want to wear it (a sari) I can wear it in the day time also. I am not a coward mine that I have taken with all my dedication to art and to a great saint who has forecasted everything. Brahman has forecasted everything, like astrology.

Q: I gather the saint Brahman wrote the following line yadavamundalu rajamelathasu and this is a richly ambiguous line: either it means that worthless people will come to rule or else that a husbandless widow will. Which meaning have you preferred in your film?
A: (Smiles). It's all right. Let's not go into the details. I think it may affect the living persons.

Q: Was there an objection to the enactment of this prophecy?
A: The dialogue there was objection to was thera meeda bommale digi vacchi adhikaramunu chelayistharaya. This is from Swamy Veerabrahman's Kalagnanam. It means some images from the screen, that is cinema artistes, will come down and will take the reins and rule the country. And I have put one insertion of Reagan and one of MGR.

Q: What have you got against Sathya Sai Baba? I ask this because in your film, I say your's because it was directed by you, Kondura Diddina Kapuram you had the actor Satyanarayana depict a baba very like Sathya Sai Baba who turns out to be a fraud. A baba with curly hair...
A: No, no, no. There are so many babas in the country. I have nothing to do with Sathya Sai Baba. I am not having any prejudice with any person

Q: Are you a devotee of Sathya Sai Baba?
A: No (firmly). I am not devoted to any man.

Q: The day you won the elections you said in an interview: 'I am an admirer (of Mrs Gandhi) since she is a great leader also. Personally I adore her. She is a great leader and I accept her as one.' Why do you adore her? What qualities in her do you find so attractive?
A: She is the befitting daughter for a noble personality whom we adore. And she is acquitting herself.

Q: Befitting daughter—that's not enough. You bestowed great praise on her. Why?
A: Let us jump over that question.

Q: Why?
A: I will answer you later. For you only I will answer, one day.

Q: There seems to be a parallel between your chief ministership in Andhra and Khomeini's rule in Iran. Both of you came in on the wave of popular support. And even today, no matter what the intelligentsia may say, 80 per cent of the people, the masses, have Khomeini firmly in their hearts.
A: Correct.

Q: Likewise in your case. Would you accept this parallel?
A: Yes. My strength is the people.

Q: There is another parallel. Khomeini too came in on a populist banner and before he achieved power he too had entered into an informal alliance with the left wingers, the Mujahideen, quite like your support for the Naxalites in the disturbed areas of Karimnagar, Warangal and Adilabad. But after achieving power he wiped them out.
A: Yes. But first also I have not approved of the Naxalites.

Q: Before we conclude, one last question. Where did you acquire political awareness? From books? Which political theorists do you read?
A: I go my own policy practically. I don't follow anybody. I'm telling to you very frankly: all my policies are my own.

Q: But you were a student of economics once. Everyone reads books as a student. Who were your favourite political authors?
A: Political author practically I can say Karl Marx.

Q: Marx! But he was a materialist. How did that fit in with your world view?
A: Yes, materialism. I am basing myself on that only. I can't depend upon riches. Riches are nothing.

The Illustrated Weekly of India

Rajiv Gandhi

Q: What was the first language you spoke? Hindi or English?
A: I don't remember but I think it was Hindi.

When did you start speaking English?
A: (Long pause). I can't remember (laughs). Let me think...I think when I was about five or six. I can't remember before that, maybe we started before that.

Q: With whom did you speak to in English, your grandfather, your mother, which particular person?
A: Well, school. At home we've always spoken Hindi, well Hindustani with spatterings of English thrown in.

Q: What were the children's books you read?
A: Yes, I think we read more children's books, English children's books.

Q: Well, which ones do you remember?
A: Winnie the Pooh. Then what was that called, the rabbit...

Q: Brer Rabbit?
A: No, Brer Rabbit was the comic. No the other one...You know the one I mean. They have just made a film. Beatrix Potter. I've forgotten the names of the books.

Q: When did you first go to Britain?
A: It was 1953 or 1955. I must have been eight or ten.

Q: Did you accompany your mother?
A: Grandfather really. We both, mother and us.

Q: Was this on a state visit?
A: Yes.

Q: What are your memories like?
A: Was it the Coronation in '53? Yes.

Q: Do you remember anything of the Coronation?
A: No, I remember being left out of everything (laughs.)

Q: How did you find Cambridge? Trinity is a large, bewildering college. I know people who've cracked up there in the first term because they don't have enough people to talk to...
A: Yes, it is difficult to get to know people there, it is so large.

Q: How did you find your way around?
A: There were a lot of Indians there from school, others that I knew from Delhi, so it helped, not just in Trinity but in Cambridge.

Q: How long were you at Cambridge?
A: Three years. 1962-65.

Q: What degree did you read for?
A: Mechanical Science.

Q: May I ask what class you got?
A: Zero, flunked out.

Q: What do you mean?
A: I didn't get a degree.

Q: You didn't do it or...
A: No, I did it but I didn't get a degree, I didn't do well enough.

Q: What did you spend most of your time doing? I remember a remark which Tariq Ali picked on and made capital of in his book, I think it was a passing remark in an interview Arun Singh gave to Imprint 'We were the Beatles generation.' Did you listen to the Beatles at all?
A: (Smiles). Of course we did. Everybody listened to the Beatles in those days.

Q: There is something that happens to most Indians who go abroad for University education. Perhaps for the first time they become aware of India. At home they just take the country for granted, but abroad they begin to see India in a different way: there is a distance, of course, but also the amount of printed matter that is easily available...they begin analysing their own experience of India. Did this happen to you?
A: Yes, it did happen. But I don't know how much depth I went into because being my grandfather's grandson it did put me in an awkward position vis a vis India.

Q: Such as? Were you expected to know certain things, to have certain attitudes?
A: Well, on the one side, yes, and simultaneously I was considered to be biased, to be pro-government...

Q: Who were the musicians you listened to?
A: Miles Davis a lot, Coltrane. What's his name?...Stan Getz—but not the new Stan Getz, the older Stan Getz.

Q; What sort of books did you read in those days? I don't mean University books because those you weren't reading...
A: (Laughs.) Those we weren't. I've forgotten (pause). The normal rubbishy books, yes.

Q: Marie Seton in one of her last pieces of journalism I think wrote last Christmas in the Spectator, among her memories of you in that period, one summer she said you were helping her proof-read...
A: Yes, I did the proof-reading of her book on my grandfather.

Q: She wrote that you said to her that till you had read her book you had not been aware of the role of your family and the Congress party in the Independence struggle...
A: Yes (laughs).

Q: Do you remember anything else of that period? What was it like to be in England then?
A: It was great fun, certainly (laughs).

Q: You moved to Imperial College then. How long did you spend there?
A: I spent less than a year. I went down, I took up flying, then I came to Delhi. While I was in London I started flying.

Q: About the Emergency, I'd like to recall the remarks you made at your first national press conference on 5 July and later in the Rajya Sabha as the Monsoon Session opened. One thing that struck me about the hullabaloo was it seemed the press had got the wrong end of the stick...
A: That was what I thought (laughs).

Q: I thought it was clear but not so clear in the headlines and commentary that when you made your initial remarks they were about the proclamation of the Emergency, not what happened during it. This was the point you reiterated in the Rajya Sabha...
A: You see there are two quite different things. One is having the powers available, to be used when required. I think the powers must be available because there are situations when some powers are required by a government which it must use and this was recognised by the Janata government which was born out of the

Basically people want discipline which is sadly lacking in India today...Discipline is one of the most important things that a country has to have

Emergency and was very violently against an Emergency. But when they amended the Constitution they left this bit within, they didn't remove it.

Q: Well, I realise you think the proclamation of the Emergency was valid. What was there with the way the Emergency developed that you didn't care for?
A: A lot of things just went wrong.

Q: What sort of things went wrong?
A: Basically, I think the government lost control of the administration, of what the state governments, of what the other politicians were doing. What it also did was cut off feedback.

Q: Through censorship of the press?
A: Well, censorship, maybe a certain amount of fear psychosis.

Q: Don't you think these sort of things might happen in any Emergency?
A: Only if it goes on for an extended period. If it had finished off in a few months it would have been okay.

Q: Were you at the time in favour of it being lifted early?
A: Well, I was not very much for the proclamation of the Emergency at the beginning. But there was very definite positive fallout in the infrastructure and other sort of development areas during that period. And if it had been withdrawn earlier...

Q: What date do you think, middle of '76?
A: (Pause). Six months would have been enough.

Q: What do you think about the Family planning programme?
A: That went totally out of hand.

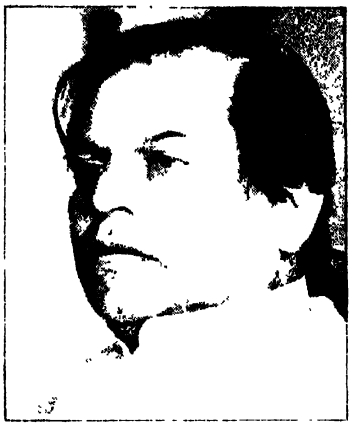
Q: That went out of hand later?
A: But there also I don't know how much it went out of hand and how much it was believed to have gone out of hand. It is very difficult to draw a line. But the fact is that propaganda-wise it very definitely went out of hand.

Q: It was widely thought at the time and we were told this later as well that your brother thought it was a mistake calling the elections in '77. What were your views at the time? Did you think it was the right decision?
A: Yes, I think it was the right decision to call the elections. I think the elections should have been held on schedule a year earlier. But if you ask me whether the Congress was going to win or lose I knew the Congress was going to lose.

Q: And you told your mother as much?
A: I told my mother. So did my brother.

Q: What did she think?
A: I don't know what she thought. I don't think she was sure of winning, I mean, that I know.

Q: Coming to corruption in India, would you care to make some sort of comment on the proliferation of corruption in the country, what you think the causes are?
A: (Pause.) Well, there is a certain shift in the moral standards which one has to accept with fast development, a change in the social set up. So there are these tensions which do lead to this. But we have not really taken enough steps to correct it.



Q: By 'we' do you mean your government or all governments?
A: No, I mean all governments. And I have started taking some now but one has to...the problem that one really faces is.. that are you going to be hard enough to upset the apple cart in trying to straighten things up or are you going to play it a little softer.

Q: There is so much corruption that your own governor has reported back about it to you. How do intend to make an example of cleansing public life?
A: We already have certain systems which are established. Unfortunately, people don't like using them. Also, a lot is said about corruption. For example, Antulay was accused of all sorts of things. The high courts have more or less cleared him, not completely but certainly in certain areas. Now suddenly the people who were accusing him say that the high courts are not reliable. Now who is reliable? You have to rely on somebody to give you an answer. Like Bhajan Lal for example. Now we put a retired judge to look into the charges and he said there was nothing to pursue. Again the newspapers don't want to accept that. Now if they are not going to accept the verdict of judges then we are really in deep trouble. And the fact is that we have got certain institutions, but people are unwilling to use them. In Kerala, for example, I was given a large chargesheet against a minister. I said, why don't you give it to the Lokayukta who's here and who is established? And the Lokayukta is a judge but they don't want to do it. Because they have to give it in as an affidavit and then they are held accountable in case it is wrong.

Q: Don't you think, can't you conceive that the judges might be corrupt?
A: In which case there is no way we can stop it. You have to rely on someone. And so far there has not been a major accusation against the judges or the judicial system of corruption.

We put a retired judge to look into the charges (against Bhajan Lal) and he said there was nothing to pursue. The high courts have cleared him (Antulay)... The newspapers don't want to accept that Fourth-rate estate?

Too much is being made of the assault on journalists at the swearing-in ceremony

Are Indian journalists, particularly the Delhi-based special correspondents who rub shoulders with the high and the mighty, a special breed? The hue and cry over the 'brutal assault' by Rashtrapati Bhavan security personnel on the media persons who were 'prevented' from covering the swearing-in ceremony of Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar's council of ministers raises some interesting questions:

Did the media persons reach the venue on time? Didn't they know that huge crowds were expected at the ceremony? Did they believe that whatever be the circumstances, the authorities were duty-bound to keep the seats reserved?

While the assault on the media persons is to be condemned, are the complainants as innocent as they are made out to be? Veteran journalist and columnist, Inder Malhotra has this to say on the happenings: "By now, the sordid facts are well-known. It was a section of my own colleagues in the capital's press corps, which, throwing to the winds every norm of decency and decorum, shouted objectionable slogans in the President's presence at a solemn state function. Doubtless, the agitated media persons had grave provocation. For the 'crime' of being late for the function, they had been treated very roughly by securitymen. But for Heaven's sake, whatever the provocation some places and some things ought to be sacred." While condemning the excesses of the security personnel, Malhotra has a word of advice for his colleagues: "Sometimes we too tend to behave as a law unto ourselves. We feel entitled to every privilege but obliged to follow no rule. We ought to remember that the fourth estate has a duty not to reduce itself to a fourth-rate estate."

Sound advice indeed. Some of the slogans shouted by irate journalists make it clear they have short memories. One of the journalists shouted at V.C. Shukla and wanted to know if the infamous Emergency had again been clamped. Doesn't this gentleman remember how the 'free and fearless Indian press' behaved during the Emergency? And when one of the newly sworn-in ministers promised an inquiry into the happenings, another journalist derisively wondered if it would be similar to the Bofors inquiry. Well, we all know how the press reacted to the Bofors scandal!

The same kind of drama was enacted (with a less disastrous climax) when the Prime Minister visited Bombay on 25 November. Reporters and photographers, who had gathered uninvited at the Raj Bhavan where the Prime Minister was having dinner with some of the city's 'intellectuals', became restless and began blocking the road when the dinner invitees started trickling out. Finally, through some VVVIP influence, the angry press was allowed into the Raj Bhavan where they protested against the police high-handedness to the chief minister, who pointed out that the press was usually not allowed when VVVIPs were staying at the Raj Bhavan. Finally, Chandra Shekhar came out to meet the press and this was the result of the question-answer session:

Enforcing a common civil code -- He had not applied his mind to the issue.

Ayodhya kar seva on 6 December -- The issue was being dealt with.

Bomb explosion at V.P. Singh's

Veteran journalist Inder Malhotra says: "For the 'crime' of being late for the function, they (journalists) had been treated very roughly by securitymen" meeting—Violence must be condemned.

Stability of his government—No one is in a position to say what would happen in the future (He should have sung 'Que sera...que sera...).

Cabinet expansion—He had not thought about it.

Maharashtra Janata Dal (S)—The problems would be sorted out.

Big deal, eh! Was it worth making all that fuss about not being admitted to Raj Bhavan?

Out of touch

How elitist is our English press! Vir Sanghvi in SUNDAY faults Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar's obsession about poverty particularly in the 1990's, as being an unhealthy preoccupation with the ideas of a bygone era. "His critics believe that he clings to the rhetoric of the socialist 1950's: a distrust of multinationals, a hatred of consumer goods, a misunderstanding of the role of market and childlike faith in the value of the public sector. At a time when the socialist world is busy reconstructing itself, such an attitude seems to be hopelessly out of time with the times."

It makes one wonder as to what kind of a world some of our journalists are living in! Don't they open their eyes and observe what is around them? 1950's or 1990's, poverty is the major issue in this wretched country. The gap between the rich and the poor is also steadily widening. The rhetoric of the socialist 1950's, which is aimed at bridging this gulf, has equal relevance today. As for multinationals, no one objects if they introduce the latest technology in India. But they have been allowed to manufacture and market an increasing variety of luxury consumer goods.

Thank Heavens the poor in India are unable to read what is written about them in the elitist English press. Otherwise, we may well have a class war in the society. On a sillier level, columnist Shobha De suggests that Chandra Shekhar engage an 'elocution teacher' to help him pronounce the word 'law' because he persists in saying 'la'. So along with planning experts, technological wizards, let's have a Prof. Henry Higgins at the Prime Minister's office.

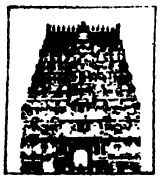
Exceptions to the rule

Surprisingly, two veteran political pundits have said things about Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar. K.R. Malkani, the RSS-intellectual was in jail along with Chandra Shekhar during the Emergency and came to know him well. He feels that Chandra Shekhar who had risen from the ranks without being a raja or a rani's son could make a good Prime Minister. Chandra Shekhar is for the upliftment of the poor without being a Mandaliser. He has consistently supported Nepal's struggle for democracy. Malkani predicts that Chandra Shekhar can be expected to be more practical and less devious than V.P. Singh and also pats him on the back for defending the BJP positions—on principle. Chandra Shekhar had said that the BJP was right in walking out of the last meeting of the National Integration Council after the V.P. Singh government had deliberately leaked out a misleading interpretation of the BJP's position on the locus standi of courts in the Ayodhya issue.

Columnist Shobha Dé even suggests that Chandra Shekhar engage an 'elocution teacher' to help him pronounce 'law' because he persists in saying 'la'

Girilal Jain (Sunday Mail) who, these days, toes a stronger BJP line than even men like Malkani, offers an interesting study of the Chandra Shekhar-Mulayam Singh alliance. Of course, they have come together only because of their shared antipathy for V.P. Singh, Jain points out.

The Prime Minister has followed the Acharya Narendra Dava-JP kind of socialism: Both the Acharya and JP had strong Hindu roots. The former wrote exhaustively on Hinduism and the latter, while taking up the cause of morality in public life in the 1970's, leaned heavily on the RSS philosophy which he came to respect. On the other hand, Mulayam's mentor, Ram Manohar Lohia, was in every sense the opposite of the kind and gentle JP, revelling in harsh and often abusive denigration of those with whom he chose to disagree. Jain argues that it was the Lohia factor which drove JP out of politics during a crucial period in the history of the country.



Democracy is alive

While there is no shortage of doomsday oracles, veteran political observer Ajit Bhattacharjea (Sunday Indian Express), finds nothing unusual, undemocratic and unstable in the present political situation. The Lok Sabha debate on the motion of confidence in the Chandra Shekhar ministry, according to him, was an elevating experience with almost every speaker expressing faith in the Constitution. "Parliamentary decorum was observed with minor lapses despite the unique significance of the situation. I do not recall a major crisis handled better before in terms of constitutional and parliamentary procedure. Contrary to the pessimism exuded by several commentators, domestic and foreign (and those who swear by the Economist) democracy is alive in India, and capable of coping with political crises that would splinter many other countries or lead to military rule!"

Now, that is what I call cheerful optimism. Do I hear Nikhil Chakravartty gnashing his teeth? ●

Karunanidhi makes a frantic bid to cling on to power

TAMIL NADU

The DMK government was shocked. Trouble was expected, but surely not so fast. Chandra Shekhar had hardly settled himself in the prime ministerial chair when he threatened to impose Central control over Tamil Nadu, apparently because the law and order situation in the state was deplorable. Jolted into action, the Tamil Nadu police swooped into a Tamil Tigers' hideout in the early hours of 30 November, seized one revolver, some kerosene and some medicine, and arrested 11 militants.

The charges against chief minister M. Karunanidhi were not new. Time and again, he had been accused of sheltering the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE). And this time he was charged with threatening the state's peace by not restraining the LTTE at all, especially along the state's southern coastline. Added to this was the zero performance of the DMK in the last Lok Sabha polls, the food crunch and the trouble brewing over cheap liquor.

With friend V.P. Singh's exit, Karunanidhi is in a tight spot, especially since the the Congress(I)-AIADMK alliance is up in arms against him. The BJP too is against him and is pressing for a White Paper, which Karunanidhi had promised earlier, on the activities of the Eelam militants in the state. Only the left parties seem to be siding with him. Undoubtedly, the LTTE issue poses the greatest threat to his government. And the charges have been coming from unexpected quarters.

On 15 November, the naval chief designate, vice-admiral Ramdas, announced to the media that in the last three or four months, the Navy apprehended about 100 Sri Lankan Tamils engaged in smuggling and gunrunning across the Palk Straits, but were let off by the state government. The state should take definite steps to flush them out, he said, but the administration was singularly uninterested in taking any steps.

Karunanidhi: in a tight spot

The accusations were splashed on the front pages of most local dailies. And Karunanidhi got busy denying them. "It is now the turn of a naval officer," he wailed, "to join the chorus of politicians who have been on this smear campaign against us." He also explained that of the 100-odd Lankan Tamils handed over to the police by the navy, 58 were proved to be genuine refugees and sent off to camps, while the remaining 42 were found to be crew, and allowed to return to Sri Lanka. Besides, they were certainly not smuggling arms—only rice, onions, chillies, kerosene, petrol and Lankan currency had been seized from them.

The defence went on. The central agencies like the Intelligence Bureau (IB), Research and Analysis Wing (RAW) and the Navy were present in the coordination meetings held by the state government. How come they never complained there, the chief minister wondered. Finally Karunanidhi sent off revenue minister K. Manoharan to personally convince Chandra Shekhar that the law and order situation in Tamil Nadu was far better than in some other states—for example Andhra Pradesh, where the Naxalites were going on the rampage almost every day. Besides, if the LTTE posed a problem today, it was because the Indira and Rajiv Gandhi regimes had funded it earlier, the DMK pointed out. And even as the AIADMK raised the alarm over the LTTE's activities in Tamil Nadu , it was printing posters of Tiger hero Prabhakaran, and endorsing his demand for a separate state.

Manoharan did his job well. He even called on "old-friend" Devi Lal, now comfortably back in the deputy PM's chair. Probably reminding the Tau of the good old times when he had flown to Madras within hours of being sworn in, last year, to be the chief guest at Karunanidhi's daughter's wedding. And, of course, the huge crowds at the farmers' rallies organised by the DMK for the Tau.

"But would Devi Lal be willing to stake his post, which was restored to him thanks to Rajiv, just to protect Karunanidhi?" asked an AIADMK official. The Opposition is busy reminding people that in 1980, when the ruling AIADMK had secured only two seats in the parliamentary elections, the Congress government at the Centre, then siding with the DMK, had dismissed the AIADMK government in Tamil Nadu. The same logic would ask for the dismissal of the DMK government since the DMK had failed to secure a single seat in the last Lok Sabha elections.

So, although the PM has assured that he would not act against the state government "under pressure" from outside quarters, Karunanidhi is hardly assured.

With reason. Recently there was the embarrassing charge by Lankan defence minister Ranjan Wijeratne, that the LTTE was ferrying across at least ten boatloads of arms and ammunition from Tamil Nadu to Sri Lanka every day. Besides, there have been reports that barely a couple of weeks ago, the Tigers ferried six Maruti Omni vans across to Sri Lanka from Thanjavore. Then there was the embarrassing episode of a national news agency being asked to withdraw news on LTTE arms smuggling. The Rameswaram correspondent of the United News Agency (UNI) had reported that some LTTE men, carrying heavy weapons, had arrived in motor-boats. An alarmed state home secretary, R. Nagarajan, immediately had UNI withdraw the news. Thus the Rameswaram despatch had a quiet burial.

Yet another example of the government throttling the media if it threatened the peace of the LTTE was the transfer of S. Samudram, news editor of Doordarshan. Regarded by the CM as an anti-LTTE man, Samudram earned Karunanidhi's wrath when he refused the CM's request to black-out the report on the LTTE's massacre of Muslims from the news bulletin. A livid Karunanidhi allegedly complained to the then information and broadcasting minister P. Upendra, and Samudram's transfer to All India Radio came through recently.

So, Karunanidhi prepares for his Delhi trip on 3 December, apparently for the National Front presidium, but presumably also for a talk with the PM, as a last-ditch effort to save his seat.

And in view of the present disheartening developments, the CM has published an emotionally charged poem in his party organ, Murasoli, on 22 November, significantly titled Nilaiyatrathu. It means 'impermanence'. •

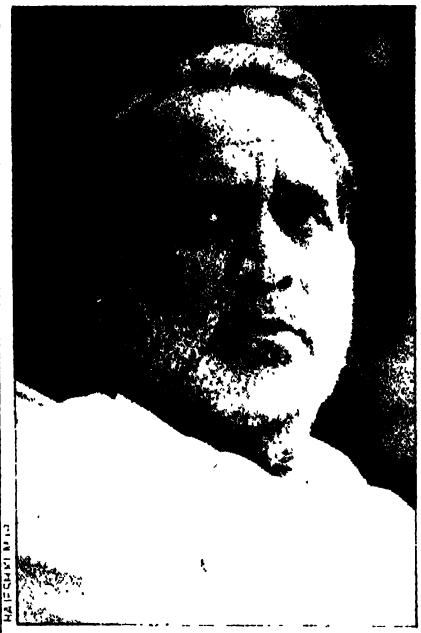
Crossing swords

Chandra Shekhar wields the stick, while militants brandish the gun

PUNJAB



Chandra Shekhar has decided to act tough in Punjab. This was evident from the swoopdown on top Akali leaders in Chandigarh and other parts of the state, just before the scheduled all-party meeting at Anandpur Sahib on 25 November. The government also banned the meeting. It was a well-planned operation: among those who were detained by the police were Simranjeet Singh Mann, Gurbachan Singh Tohra, Prakash Singh Badal and Tota Singh.

Nonetheless, a somewhat truncated conclave of Akali leaders was held in Anandpur Sahib, despite the ban order. Most Sikh organisations protested against the ban, but the government stood firm. According to an official spokesman, the ban had been imposed, as the government had information that the Anandpur Sahib meeting had been convened "with a definite intention of announcing a subversive programme of action intended to create disruption, disorder and a situation of confrontation with the government so as to encourage the secessionist forces..."

Though Mann and his colleagues had also been detained by the V.P. Singh regime, there was a difference this time. Mann had been arrested earlier for defying prohibitory orders and participating in a march towards the Golden Temple. But that was after V.P. Singh gave him a long rope in trying to play the Mann card to win peace in Punjab. But Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar is keen on showing that he is following a diametrically opposite policy. However, the clampdown negated the possibilities of the various Akali factions coming together and isolating the militants. And though the leaders were released after four days of incarceration, a near total bandh was witnessed in Punjab.

In the meantime, the killings in the state have gone up to a frightening level—averaging 25 a day since the middle of this year. Significantly, more Sikhs are being killed these days than earlier. And many of them are being liquidated for being suspected informers.

On 24 November, the security forces in the state received a major setback when Harjit Singh, the superintendent of police (SP) of Tarn Taran was killed in a mine blast. Harjit Singh had spearheaded many successful operations in Tarn Taran and had figured on the hit-list of the militants for some time. His killing marked the beginning of a new pattern in the crime scenario in the state. The mine which had been dug beneath the highway close to the SP's house was detonated by remote-control, killing Harjit Singh and his three security guards instantly.

Chandra Shekhar:muscle flexing

In fact, Harjit Singh's death changes the complexion of VIP security in the country. Immediately after the incident, a high-level body reviewed security arrangements in Delhi. Officials present at the meeting even contemplated the requisitioning of anti-mine tanks for the Prime Minister and director general of Punjab police since even Harjit Singh's bullet-proof jeep had been easily blown up by an explosive. •

Mystery shrouds the brutal murder of two nuns

MAHARASHTRA

It was like any other day. On 15 November Sister Veronica Sylvia (42) and Sister Priya (32), two nuns who lived at Sneha Sadan, in Mistry Apartments, off Jogeshwari East Highway in Bombay, set out on their usual work. While Sister Sylvia left in the morning to teach at the Infant Jesus Primary School, about 300 metres from the apartment, Sister Priya left for her sewing classes at Mahakali Caves Road.

The nuns had other responsibilities too. They looked after 25-odd street children who came to Sneha Sadan to be taught and fed. For the two sisters, the day ended just as all other days. At around 9 pm, they bade good-night to eight boys who slept in a hall adjacent to their room and retired for the day.

Next morning, the boys awoke at 7 am. But to their surprise they found that the nuns were not yet up and ready. So they went and knocked on the door of the room in which the Sisters slept. There was no response.

Something was clearly amiss. One of the boys went round the house and peeped through the windows and what he saw made him blanch from shock. Sister Priya was sprawled in a pool of blood and near her lay Sister Sylvia.

The boy ran to inform Father Juze D'Souza, the parish priest and principal of the Infant Jesus school. The priest rushed to the house, looked through the windows and saw the ghastly sight. Later, he had the door opened and entered what he describes as a "butcher's shop". By this time the word had spread and other members of the clergy had arrived. "I have never in all my days, seen anything like this," says Father Juze. "It was a nightmare. There was blood everywhere, the place smelt of something forbidden, something dangerous."

When the police arrived the members of the church were in a sullen mood. They refused to let the cops inside till a lady doctor and women police personnel arrived. The stabbings, the police later said, could have taken place any time between 10 pm the previous night and 7 am on 16 November.

The bodies were handed over to the church authorities after the post-mortem had been done, and on 17 November the two nuns were laid to rest. The Christian community was shocked and outraged. Nearly 7,000 people turned up at the funeral and many were visibly angry. "If this were to have happened to a Hindu or a Muslim there would have been hell to pay," said a bitter Father Juze.

KAMAL VASAN

The nuns before the burial: murder most foul

On 18 November, Christians were in for a bigger shock. The Times of India, Indian Express, Samnaa, Nav Bharat Times and a host of other publications carried reports, which, according to a local priest, were like "a knife through the Christian soul". The reports stated that the two nuns were used to "frequent sexual intercourse" and one of them had contracted a sexually transmitted disease. The stories were apparently based on a leaked report of the post-mortem.

There was a howl of indignation from the Christian community, and Cardinal Simon Pimenta denounced the reports, while the police denied that there was any truth in them. Suddenly the murders were not important anymore. Sleazy stories about the nuns' supposed licentiousness took over and attributed the murders to a lover's jealousy.

Dr Pritam Phatnani, honorary professor of forensic medicine at Tilak Medical College, in Sion, Bombay, who was initially requested by the joint commissioner, crime branch, Arvind Inamdar, to help out with the case says, "I don't know how this leak happened. That is for the police to find out. But what I can say is that somebody jumped the gun. A firm conclusion can only be reached after the full text of the report has been read. The language of post-mortem reports is such that things can easily be pulled out of context, and this leads to many twists and turns." Inamdar himself appears bewildered by the leak. Later, police sources stated that an officer had been transferred "and pushed upstairs elsewhere". Inamdar, however, still maintains that the search is on to find out who planted the story.

Meanwhile, the police picked up three suspects who, sources aver, had nothing to do with the murders. The "breakthrough" that the police promised was still to materialise. The post-mortem report will now come from the State Forensic Science Laboratory at Kalina, where the genital swabs of the murdered nuns were taken.

The motive behind the crime still remains unclear. Testifies Father D'Souza: "House number four and six where the nuns were staying fell under the parish of Infant Jesus, of which I am the priest. Like everyone else, I do not know why the two nuns were murdered. There have been no servants, so the 'sacking' theory does not apply. There is no property problem, because the property belongs to the Sneha Trust. And let me assure you there is nothing to rob here. There could be a man who was frequently seeing one of the Sisters. This could be a link. I think the police is following this lead. But whatever the truth is, it must be told."

One of the boys living in Sneha Sadan has something interesting to tell. Raj Kumar is not sure, but he feels that there could be a connection between what he had seen and the crime. "At 4 o'clock in the afternoon (15 November)," he says, "I saw a man following Sister Priya. I was going to play when I noticed him. The grounds here are big and there are many trees and bushes, and Sister Priya did not see him. He was not a heavily built man. He was wearing a bush shirt and had light eyes, like a cat. He also had a moustache. I watched him for some time and went to play. How was I to know that the two Sisters would be murdered that night?"

Says Inamdar: "Right now there are a lot of wild rumours. The police will get the man or men who did this. It is a matter of time." But people such as Father Placid Fonesca, director of Sneha Sadan, and Father Thomas Cano of Saint Thomas' Church in Goregaon, Bombay, seem to have no faith in the police. "It is going to be a difficult case to solve," asserts Cano, and adds, somewhat dejectedly, "It is all in the hands of the Lord."

And he makes no bones about his bitterness. "The time has come for a re-evaluation. If it had been any other community, the press would not have dared to print all those stories. It is time we woke up to our weakness," he says. ●

Dengue reappears with a vengeance in Calcutta

WEST BENGAL

On the pages of the 'death register', a slim bound volume at the paediatric ward of the Calcutta Medical College Hospital, are printed the words "peon book". The "peon book" tells the daily story of tragedies, including the 18 deaths since the middle of September, deaths which could have been avoided if the state government and the Calcutta Corporation had reacted quickly when the news of a dengue outbreak first trickled in.

Instead, the authorities chose to turn a Nelson's eye to the problem dismissing the dengue outbreak as a non-issue. "People are creating a fear psychosis. Everything is under control; everything is being done," said Subodh De, mayor-in-council, health, of the corporation as the death toll began to rise and severely handicapped doctors fought to save young lives. The state authorities today insist that the death toll is only 12, while 18 young children have died at only one hospital. "Many dengue cases have been wrongly diagnosed as encephalitis, while many other children have died without treatment," a young doctor at the Calcutta Medical College said. "The death toll stands at 17," Dr Manish Chakraborty, the leading virologist at the Tropical School of Medicine told SUNDAY on 28 November.

From the grimy, congested houses in central Calcutta were reported the first cases of dengue, a disease spread by the Aedus Aegyptus mosquito, in September. "The disease has spread to the equally congested areas of north Calcutta and to the southern fringes of the city like Jadavpur and Behala and the adjoining districts of Howrah and Hooghly," said Dr Chakraborty. Most of the children who have died were suffering from dengue haemorrhage fever (DHF), a particularly virulent form of dengue. "The patients suffer from high fever, suffer severe body-aches and you see rashes all over their bodies. And they vomit blood, not much, just a few drops perhaps," says Dr Pranab Bhowmick, a well-known paediatrician.

But the Calcutta Corporation's promise to eradicate mosquitoes remains only a promise, as garbage piles up all over the city and sanitation systems are on the edge of collapse.

After ravaging the city in the early Sixties, when 700 people—mostly children—had died, dengue had disappeared for nearly 20 years, returning briefly in 1983 when parts of east Calcutta were affected. But in 1987, four leading scientists stressed the "need for careful surveillance because of a possible threat of dengue haemorrhagic fever as experienced in Indonesia..." The article was published in a leading medical journal, but the authorities did not heed the warning. Today, as young children continue to die, the Calcutta Corporation has finally begun "an education programme" and has started spraying insecticide in fits and starts. Though state youth Congress(I) workers complained about the state of affairs to the Governor, Dr Nurul Hasan, and the Congress(I) municipal party and dissident CPI(M) leaders are up in arms, there is no immediate improvement And the deaths of children (those between the ages of three and six are most vulnerable) may only increase. ●

The government's education policy trips the tribals

TRIPURA

Their mother-tongue is driving them to despair. The tribals of Tripura, who are being reduced to a demographic nonentity by a slow but incessant flow of non-tribals from Bangladesh across the border, are beginning to realise that Kokborok—a language spoken by eight major tribes in the state—is impeding their development.

The problem lies not so much with the language itself as with the government's education policy. Way back in 1978, when the Left Front wrested power in the state, the new government made Kokborok the medium of instruction in all primary schools in the tribal-dominated areas. The move, in the face of it, was unassailable and certainly populist. It enabled tribal children to study in their own mother-tongue and opened up possibilities of raising the literacy level.

But therein lay a catch. The left regime did not care to introduce a link language that could help the students continue their studies at the secondary level, where the medium of instruction was Bengali or English. It took a few years for the incongruity to really show up. And when it did, the tribals hoped that the Congress(I)-TUJS alliance, which elbowed out the Left Front in February 1988, would correct the anomaly.

But things have only gone from bad to worse. According to the Tribal Students Federation (TSF), about 40 to 45 thousand tribal students, unable to cope with the abrupt change in the medium of instruction, have dropped out of school so far. The tribals are badly outnumbered in the field of education—just as they are in most other spheres—and this high dropout rate makes them feel sceptical about the system itself.

What is more shocking is the manner in which the tribal schools are run. The TSF, which has about 50,000 students under its fold, complains that the teachers running these institutions are grossly underqualified. Many of them lack secondary-level education, the TSF leaders point out, and say that residential schools in the Autonomous District Council areas are on the verge of collapse.

Members of the Jana Sanghati Parishad (JSP), an organisation of scholars and social activists, corroborate the TSF charges. According to a JSP functionary, the Congress(I)-TUJS alliance, headed by Sudhir Ranjan Mazumdar, bought peace with the Tripura National Volunteers (TNV) by promising to rehabilitate the militants by offering many of them jobs as teachers in Kokborok schools. The outcrop of this accord was that many TNV activists, who could barely boast of having primary education, were inducted as teachers.

The TSF also resents the use of the Bengali script for Kokborok and advocates the use of the Roman script instead. The Bengali script was, obviously, chosen to promote communal integration and ward off Christian missionary influences that are associated with the Roman script. Today, however, the younger tribals insist that the Bengali script does not match the phonetic nuances of the Kokborok language and are demanding the formation of an expert committee to settle the controversy.

Tripura tribals: in a limbo

What really irks the tribals is their abysmal success rate. According to M.L. Kolor, the TSF vice-president, only about five per cent of the tribal

A train to Bangladesh

A new broad-gauge line is opened between India and her neighbour

It was an event tinged with nostalgia. A train from India to Bangladesh—the first since Independence—steamed out of Singhabad, in Malda (north Bengal), towards Rohanpur across the border on 24 November. The 60-wagon goods train, carrying ballast and stone chips for the Bangladesh Railways, brought back memories of pre-Partition days when trains ran freely between these stations without having to cross an international border. Today, that boundary remains an inviolable reality, but the broad-gauge line, restored at the cost of Rs 5 crores by the government of India, has brought the two countries closer.

The Singhabad-Rohanpur railway link is not the only one of its kind between India and Bangladesh. There are two other broad-gauge links between the two countries under the Eastern Railway, and the Northern Frontier Railway. However, this is the first time that a train actually went into to Bangladesh from India after more than four decades.

One important reason behind the restoration of the railway after so many years is that the Indian Railway Construction Company (IRCON) has bagged a part contract in the $600 million Jamuna bridge project in Sirajunj in Bangladesh. The project requires huge quantities of stone chips and ballast, which can now be supplied by India, since the major stone quarries in eastern India are located close to the Bangladesh border and are well-connected by railways.

students pass the Madhyamik examination and, those who do, fail to compete with the non-tribals. And in a state where there are few job opportunities outside the government sector, the tribals are finding themselves being increasingly marginalised due to lack of adequate qualification. So, what they are now demanding is a scientific language policy and not political patronage. ●

Life after Hailakandi

The communal spectre haunts the Barak Valley

ASSAM

Prafulla Mahanta had refused to learn, and in the end he paid the price. When Hailakandi town in south Assam succumbed to communal violence, all that the former chief minister did was to send a Cabinet minister and rush five platoons of armed police to tackle the situation. The virtual nonchalance with which Mahanta faced the communal challenge was wholly in keeping with the casualness that marked his approach to the ULFA menace, and his detractors in New Delhi fully exploited this weakness of his to extend President's Rule in Assam. In fact, besides the activities of the ULFA, the Hailakandi clashes, which broke out on 17 November and claimed 15 lives, also influenced the Centre's decision favouring a spell of President's Rule in the state.

That Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar was worried about the developments at Hailakandi was evident from the fact that he summoned the director of the Intelligence Bureau for a midnight briefing on 17 November. The clashes figured again in the crucial high-level meeting at the PM's Race Course Road office where the fate of the Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) government and possibilities of holding Assembly elections on schedule were finally sealed.

The imposition of President's Rule has not, however, driven the fear out of the people's mind. The question now being asked is whether the new dispensation will be able to cement the fractured relations between the two communities. The distrust and the feeling of acrimony between them have become so acute that even responsible citizens are unable to shrug off the sense of suspicion. Even the administration seems to be affected by the communal divide, with police and other officials being split along communal lines.

The residents of the town and the adjoining rural areas where the trouble had spread are appalled by the partisan stand the police and district officials had taken. Hindu officers had, in some cases, scuttled police action in Hindu-strongholds and Muslim officers did likewise when it came to taking action against offenders belonging to that community. Equally disturbing is the fact that the adivasi tea garden workers also became embroiled in the conflict.

People feel that the situation would have remained under control had the government imposed curfew on 17 November itself when the first spell of clashes rocked Hailakandi. Instead, the government chose to wait till the next day. The army was called out on 18 November, but was actually deployed 24 hours later. Says Nurul Huda, district secretary of the CPI(M): "This lackadaisical approach to the situation by the district authorities appeared intriguing.

And if the administration had indeed sunk to such depths, will President's Rule make a difference in Hailakandi? ●

Santanu Ghosh/Silchar

Earlier attempts by the Government of Bangladesh to import boulders and stone chips by barges from Malaysia had proved too costly and cumbersome. Says Ashoke Sengupta, adviser to the Indian Railways, "We hope that we will get the contract for supplying materials for the construction work of the river bridge and for that we now require the shortest railway link between the two countries."

The inaugural run, on 24 November, from Singhabad, was an occasion for celebration. Villagers from neighbouring villages turned out in large numbers to witness the historic flag-off and slogans of India-Bangladesh friendship rent the air. The train, loaded with ballast from Bakudi, reached Singhabad around 11 am. And five hours later, it left for Rohanpur, driven by the two locomasters from Bangladesh.

The train was received by M. Abdullah, the divisional railway manager of the Paksey division of Bangladesh Railways, and was greeted with slogans like "Bharat-Bangla moitri amar rahe (Long live India-Bangla friendship)". Abdullah even went as far as to say that it won't be long before passenger trains start operating between the two countries. And surely, people on both sides of the border look forward to that momentous day. ●

Lucky numbers: 5, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North

PISCES (21 February—20 March)

A favourable week for most of you. Scientists and doctors might do well. Minor problems are likely to bother you, but they will soon tide over. A short holiday may improve your health.

Good dates: 13, 14 and 15
Lucky numbers: 3, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: South

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—ARIES

The Aries man is far too dynamic and willing to take up challenges for the Scorpio woman is taking. She is farsighted and prefers security, and would like her partner to be more steady in his professional life. This difference in attitudes might lead to trouble.

Man of the people

Kamal Morarka, minister of state in the Prime Minister's Office (PMO), perhaps, best qualifies for the man of the people tag.

Unlike the Raja, who made much of refusing security and then made the residents of Delhi wait endlessly at busy intersections while his motorcade got right of way, Morarka went through with his expressed intention.

Soon after the Bombay-based industrialist was sworn in, assorted guards wielding sten guns landed up at his Teen Murti Lane residence. An appalled Morarka asked them to please leave: when he needed security he would ask for it.

The securitymen, however, refused to budge, saying that they were there on orders, and couldn't leave until instructed to do so by their superiors.

Kamal Morarka: no to security

A couple of phone calls later, the minister of state was rid of them. How long this state of affairs will last in, however, anyone's guess.

The man who came to dinner

You have to hand it to Shatrughan Sinha. Nothing fazes the man. Last week, the Governor of Maharashtra hosted a formal sit-down dinner for the Prime Minister. Bombay's elite (J.R.D. Tata, etc.) attended and were told to leave their wives behind because the Governor wanted a small gathering.

Hardly had the guests found their seats (there were place cards in front of each plate) when there was a commotion at the door.

Enter, Shatrughan Sinha followed by two producer chamchas. "Hello yaar!" he shouted to obviously embarrassed friends who were already seated before making his way to the Prime Minister's chair.

A surprised Chandra Shekhar looked up, only to be enveloped in a bear hug by a beaming Sinha. "Main aapko milne aaya hoon (I have come to meet you)," he explained somewhat unnecessarily, adding, "Chalo yahen hi khaana kha leten hain (Come lets eat here)."

The discomfited Raj Bhavan staff wondered where to seat the booming

There was more to come. "Arrey, Pehlaj, tu bhi aaja (Pehlaj, you come over as well)," he yelled out to one of his chamchas while the other needed no further invitation. The Governor's staff now had to find three places for three uninvited guests. Finally, they were seated near the ADCs.

Eventually, it dawned on Shatru that, perhaps, this was not an impromptu film party. "There are invitations, or what?" he asked another guest. On being told that, yes, there were, he demanded sceptically, "show me the card, then!"

Only after the situation became clear to him that Sinha realised that he had committed a slight breach of protocol. But seeing as dinner was already being served and he was quite hungry, he decided to stay on.

CHECK-LIST

Chandra Shekhar's chief minister friends

- Bhairon Singh Shekhawat: An old friend of Shekhar's, Shekhawat is indebted to him for organising defections and saving his government. The Prime Minister is now calling in a favour, asking the Rajasthan chief minister to mediate in the Ayodhya dispute to get the VHP leaders to agree on a compromise.

- Sharad Pawar: The Maharashtra chief minister was the first to host a lunch to felicitate the new Prime Minister. And when Chandra Shekhar went to Bombay soon after being sworn in, Pawar was at his side throughout, making his closeness to the PM clear. But the CM may find his equation with Shekhar suffering now that he seems to have incurred the wrath of the Ambanis.

- Mulayam Singh: It was the UP chief minister's support that enabled Chandra Shekhar to rustle up sufficient numbers to beat the provisions of the Anti-defection Act. Shekhar did his bit for Mulayam by arranging for Congress support, when Yadav's ministry faced defeat on a motion of confidence in the House. Shekhar was even willing to offer the CM the home portfolio at the Centre, but Yadav chose to remain in UP.

- Chimanbhai Patel: Coordinated matters between 10 Janpath and 3 South Avenue Lane in the run-up to the change of government. Shekhar was properly grateful and consulted the Gujarat chief minister closely on the formation of the Cabinet.

Piracy on high seas

The saga of Dr J.K. Jain's video-cassette on Ayodhya (see Spotlight on page 68) gets curiouser and curiouser. Apparently the BJP member had produced a record number of cassettes, hoping to sell them for a steep Rs 180 and raking it in.

But, unfortunately for the video doctor, Madan Lal Khurana took care of that one. Khurana, an old enemy of Jain's, set his son up to sabotaging the doctor's project.

Dr J.K. Jain: losing out to M.L. Khurana

Khurana junior, who owns a video-cassette shop in Palika Bazar, made hundreds of pirated copies of the Ayodhya film, selling them for a measly Rs 70, each.

And effectively cut into Jain's profits

Meham and the media

The Prime Minister may have fought shy of appointing Kalyan Singh Kalvi minister in charge of women's welfare. But, if appearances are anything to go, we may soon see Om Prakash Chautala functioning as the official party spokesman.

At present S.P. Malviya is performing the task of briefing the press. But now that he's also petroleum minister, the arrangement has begun to seem less than perfect. After all, it doesn't look too good if a Union minister addresses assorted hacks on party affairs every other evening.

Hence, the search for a new spokesman.

Enter, Om Prakash Chautala. No sooner had the victor of Meham realised that the post was up for grabs, that he began attending every press briefing called by the party. Chautala would sit by Malviya's side as he answered the queries directed at him, slipping in his two-bit worth whenever the opportunity presented itself.

S.P. Malviya: making way

One evening, however, the Chaudhary's eldest son got more than lucky. Malviya failed to arrive for the briefing, and Chautala held court in his inimitable style.

His performance couldn't have failed to impress, for the current gossip in political circles is that Chautala will soon be appointed official party spokesman.

Much to the consternation of the Delhi press corps, no doubt.

BAROMETER

All the AICC(I) general secretaries—how they rate

Balram Jhakar: Is the only Jat leader of consequence left in the Congress. Hence the importance accorded to him by the high command. Jhakar is making the most of his new-found prominence, hanging out at 10 Janpath most of the time.

Mahavir Prasad: After messing up in Karnataka, Prasad finds himself consigned to the dog house. Though the bonsai version of N.D. Tiwari is consulted on those states ostensibly in his charge, the party leader has frozen him out of all else.

H.K.L. Bhagat: Has been placed in charge of the Congress Working Committee and the party's parliamentary board. Visits Rajiv Gandhi at least thrice on an average day, and is sent for press briefings (instead of Gadgil and M.J. Akbar) whenever an important announcement has to be made.

C.K. Jaffer Sharief: Though officially in charge of UP affairs, Sharief hasn't visited the state more than twice in the last six months. Party leaders of Uttar Pradesh have complained to Rajiv about the general secretary's unavailability, and the fact that he spends all his time in Bangalore, nursing his constituency.

The Raja vs Advani

The fight between the Janata Dal and the Bharatiya Janata Party continues. This time, the prize is the coveted post of leader of the Opposition.

With the Congress out of the way, both V.P. Singh and L.K. Advani have begun lobbying to be appointed to the post. The Raja asked Speaker Rabi Ray to treat his party and the communists as one block in the House. VP would thus qualify as leader of the single largest party, and could be appointed as leader of the Opposition. The former Prime Minister was convinced that, given his good equations with Ray, he would be able to swing this one.

But the BJP wasn't resting idle either. The chief whip of the party, Laxmi Narain Pande, wrote a letter to Ray arguing Advani's case. But the Speaker went off to Bhubaneswar, without responding to the BJP's request.

Pande then approached the secretary-general of the Lok Sabha, K.C. Rastogi, asking that the leader of the single largest party (BJP) be appointed to the post, forthwith. Rastogi countered that everything was up to the Prime Minister, whoever he approved of would get the nod.

The Raja, then doesn't appear to be in with a chance.

All the Prime Minister's men

The Prime Minister is a new hand at governance (The new team, 25 November—1 December). Chandra Shekhar's Cabinet is made up of the old and the new. Either way, the ministers know little about administration and less about politics.

It is unlikely that Chandra Shekhar will be able to formulate any policy without consulting Rajiv Gandhi.

Merely ousting a leader and then assuming the chair without any commitment to the country does not necessarily assure the nation of a good government. It would be better if Chandra Shekhar makes political survival his first priority. The next step would be to serve the people with the help of the Congress(I).

Nandadulal Roy Chowdhury, Kharagpur (West Bengal)

■ How successful the Shekhar government will be at governing will be proved through its actions. Chandra Shekhar has to keep in mind the myriad problems facing the nation.

It wasn't the best of beginnings, for Shekhar took 11 days to form the ministry. But now, he has to get down to the task of governance. One can only hope for the best.

B.N. Bose, Dum Dum (West Bengal)

■ It would have been better for Chandra Shekhar if he had given ministerial berths to members of parties that are allied with the Congress(I). These smaller parties have an abundance of qualified people, something which cannot be said for the Janata Dal(S).

At this stage, the formation of a consensus government seems a good idea in order to further the national interest.

Arvind Kumar Padhee, Varanasi (Uttar Pradesh)

■ The credibility of the new ministry comes into question. Chandra Shekhar has taken an unusually long time to constitute his ministry. Several vital portfolios are still in the hands of the Prime Minister himself

Chandra Shekhar as well as his Cabinet colleagues are new entrants in the field. A fair chance should be given to the new government. It is hoped that they will be able to solve the country's many problems. Just give them a chance.

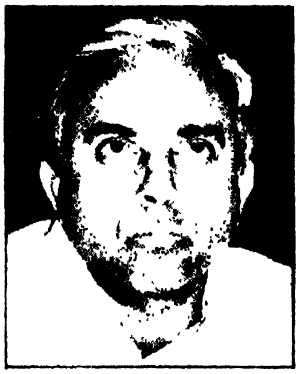
Kali Charan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ Shekhar took all of 11 days to form the Cabinet. And after this delay, the team that was formed was not at all inspiring. But now, Shekhar has no more excuses, the problems he has been talking about for so long have to be tackled right away.

S. Ahmed, Allahabad (Uttar Pradesh)

Tough times ahead

The special report (Mulayam survives, 25 November—1 December) has rightly pointed out that it was largely due to Mulayam's efforts that Chandra Shekhar could effect a formal split in the Janata Dal and become the Prime Minister. Now, the chief minister of UP has to modify his policies on Mandal and masjid in order to save his position. Though Mulayam has won the confidence motion with a comfortable majority, he will not find the going easy with N.D. Tiwari of the Congress(I) waiting in the wings.



D. Dutta, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Justice and caste

The story of 'ripper' Chandran was shocking (Reprieve for a ripper, 11—17 November). The killer should not be spared and he deserves the death sentence. The murderer is being spared just because he is a Harijan. It seems the lives of the victims are of minor importance. Even more so, because certain killers are of a certain caste. So much for justice.

Anshuka Gulati, New Delhi

■ The report was simply shocking. The very fact that a murderer has not been sent to the gallows is not only an appalling piece of news, but it beats all sense of logic. Did Dr Ambedkar, at any stage, mention that a criminal should be let off the hook on grounds of his caste? So far, we have been hearing about just reservations, but now it seems that reservation will extend to other areas as well.

N.B. Naik, Hubli (Karnataka)

Divine endorsements

Khushwant Singh is a public figure who is truly secular. He can afford to laugh at our religious and political leaders (Hunting the guru, 25 November—1 December). Nowhere in the world are the names of gods and goddesses used in vain. In India, however, the names of religious figures are used in advertisements and what not.

Khushwant Singh: truly secular

It is questionable whether the names of religious figures add to the value of a product.

Ananda Sen, Varanasi (Uttar Pradesh)

Will Shekhar last?

In the analysis (The options, 25 November—1 December), several possible scenarios were drawn up regarding the future of the present government at the Centre.

I predict that Chandra Shekhar will break the Congress(I) and that he will remain in power until the winter of 1994. He will eventually make a reappearance, but this time with V.P. Singh as his political ally.

Bhupendra Visham, Nainital (Uttar Pradesh)

Mid-term polls?

The cover story (The making of the Prime Minister, 18—24 November) hits the nail right on the head. The emergence of Chandra Shekhar as Prime Minister bodes ill for democracy in India. V.P. Singh has been replaced by a person who is a political opportunist. The major casualty is the concept of value-based politics. The elevation of Chandra Shekhar to the prime ministership establishes that rot and decay has entered Indian politics.

What Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal have done for narrow political gains and selfish interests is shameful. The present set-up at the Centre does not make for cohesive policies or a stable government.

The only way out is a mid-term poll. The victor in such an election will at least have political legitimacy

Shashank Shekhar, Meerut (Uttar Pradesh)

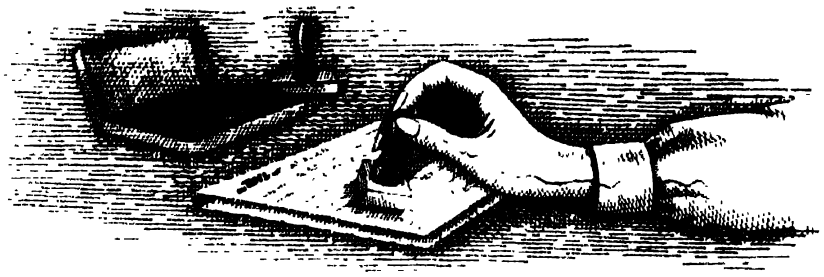
Benazir Bhutto: out in the cold

All in the family

The MD seat scandal in Karnataka and the indictment of R.K. Hegde and his son by the Dayal Commission (The family way, 11—17 November) reveal the state of affairs prevalent in our society. It is essential that any scope for manipulating admission to professional and academic courses should be eliminated.

A. Jacob Sahayam, Thiruvananthapuram (Kerala)

Chandra Shekhar: are his days in office numbered?

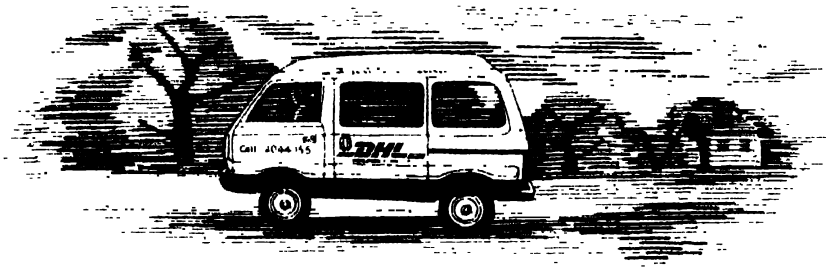


A defeat for democracy

The special report (Benazir bites the dust, 4—10 November) proves one thing: 11 years of Zia-rule had gone deeper into the hearts of Pakistanis than 11 months of the movement for the restoration of democracy, led by ousted Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto. The defeat of Benazir's Pakistan People's Party in the recent elections marks the end of democracy in that country. Besides, this will again give an impetus to Muslim fundamentalism and establish the supremacy of the army.

The low turnout of voters on election day and the alleged mass rigging resorted to by the ruling Islamic Jamhooree Ittehad went against Benazir. But what perhaps really sealed Benazir's fate was the fact that she doesn't come from the Punjab province, which alone sends as many as 115 members to a House of 207 seats.

Lakshman Sharma, Rourkela (Orissa)



The name of the inventor of Petrosol (High on gas, SUNDAY, 2—8 December, 1990) is Swapan Kumar Sen, not Das. The error is regretted.

Hindus have nothing to fear but the myths about themselves

I have often wondered why someone like Arun Shourie, who otherwise is the most companionable of human beings, should become insensitive and intemperate when discussing faiths other than his own. In his writings and lectures on the subject, there seems to be a compelling need to portray Islam, Christianity, Sikhism as narrow, cruel, close to fanatic; and Hinduism as generous, all-embracing, close to perfect. One sometimes feels he is playing a variation of a child's game: my religion is better than yours.

Can there be a connection between the drive to prove Hindu spiritual superiority and the crusade to erect a Ram temple at Ayodhya by destroying a mosque? Girilal Jain recently berated Westernised liberals for refusing to take account of the "civilisational conflict" that has characterised Hindu-Muslim relations and which is at the heart of the impulse animating the Ram Janmabhoomi campaign. Civilisational conflict? If you contemplate the idea, visions of two cultures, two philosophies, two riddles to existence, locked in bloody, unyielding struggle dance before the mind's eye. One does not have to be a JNU scholar to accept that, yes, such a conflict did and does exist, and that Islam in purely military terms always emerged victorious from it. The hated invader sneaking in through the Khyber Pass conquered while the invaded accomodated, adjusted and absorbed. To put it crudely, the Hindus fought and lost, fought and lost. Defeat being the sole constant in the endeavour. By insisting that the Babri Masjid be physically demolished are the vanquished trying to win at least one battle?

Islam first entered India in 711 AD when the Ummayad, governor of Iraq, launched a punitive expedition of 6,000 Syrian horses and an equal number of Iraqi camels against the rajas of Sind. The leader of that expedition offered only one option to the locals: convert or perish. In 997, Mahmud of Ghazni began his raids into the Punjab plains "zealously smashing countless Hindu temples, which he viewed with Islamic iconoclastic fervour as abominations to Allah, and looting India's cities of as many jewels, spices and women as he and his hordes of Turkish cavalry could carry back across the Afghan passes". (Stanley Wolpert: A New History of India.)

According to Wolpert, in 1025 the Hindu inhabitants of Somnath stood "calmly" watching the advance of Ghazni's army towards their temple city's walls, confident that Shiva, whose "miraculous" iron lingam hung suspended within a magnetic field inside Somnath's "womb-house", would protect his worshippers from harm. Some chroniclers maintain that 50,000 Hindus were slain on just that day. In the town of Kanauj alone Ghazni is reported to have razed 10,000 temples. "It is not difficult to appreciate the legacy of bitter Hindu-Muslim antipathy left by raids that may have taken one per cent of that toll," adds Wolpert.

Convert or perish, then, was the stark message of successive Muslim dynasties for the next 800 years. Although outnumbered, the invaders exploited better deployment of cavalry and the mounted cross-bow to quell resistance. While Hindu kingdoms flourished sporadically, Ghazni onwards, the Muslim in India was unmistakably, the ruler and to be a Muslim was to belong to the ruling class. The British also relied on the sword to promote their faith but simultaneously subtler methods were used to win the hearts and minds of the non-believers. As one missionary noted, Hindus were less interested in Biblical instruction and spiritual food and more in free rice. Thus, in the Hindu psyche, conversion to Islam was a matter of life or death, while embracing Christianity was a matter of History is immutable. The sins of Ghazni, Babar, Aurangzeb cannot be visited on their heirs living in Delhi. If Hindu India sets out to settle scores, beginning with the temple at Ayodhya, then the nation is heading towards disintegration free rice and gainful employment.

Alas, the advent of British rule did not substantially alter the traditional equation between the governor and the governed. The English showed a distinct partiality for the "erect and straight-forward" Mussalman, while the "slippery and inscrutable" Hindoo was distrusted. Even someone like E.M. Forster who wrote with rare sympathy and understanding about an ancient civilisation besieged by corrupt imperialism, was never at ease with Hindus—a discomfiture that resulted in the only caricature in A Passage To India: Godbole.

Freedom and sovereignty should have heralded the birth of a changed relationship between the feuding faiths, but it was not to be. "Mother India" was vivisected amid rivers of blood on the basis of religion, and even in the aftermath, Hindus continued to nurse their feeling of inferiority; a sense that even in their own country they were disadvantaged. A new evil called secularism arrived, courtesy a conspiracy hatched by rootless Hindus, atheists and leftist idealogues, and once again Muslims were upgraded in the name of "composite culture" and "unity in diversity". Thus the unequal relationship was perpetuated. Minorities Commission, Article 370, resistance to a uniform civil code, Meenakshipuram-type conversions

ASHOK MAZUMDAR

Despite the shrill warnings of L.K. Advani, Hindu elan is intact. It is based on self confidence born out of numbers and a shrewd assessment of intrinsic worth with monies from Saudi Arabia, Iran-style fundamentalism were living proof that despite a Constitution that promised equality to all religions, some were more equal than others.

Behind all the talk of civilisational conflict and "minorityism" lies a more potent grievance. Free Hindus in a Hindu-dominated India have been unable to avenge a thousand years of humiliation at the hands of Muslims it is no coincidence that the champions of the Ram temple use words like "shame", "insult" "honour", "pride", to buttress their claims. And they are enraged that the secular consensus forbids even a symbolic victory at Ayodhya to those who have seldom known victory.

I may have encapsulated history rather glibly, I may have got the nuances wrong, but I have done justice to the BJP-VHP notion of injury. The stakes are too high for genteel euphemisms. One reason why the secular majority in their country is full of self-doubt, questioning the very basis of Indian nationhood, is our reluctance to address the psychological dimension of a religious revival whose appeal and durability can no longer be ignored.

Fortunately, the Hindu rage, the Hindu sense of impotence has left a substantial section of the community unimpressed. History is immutable. What has happened has happened. The sins of Ghazni, Babar, Aurangzeb cannot be visited on their heirs living in Old Delhi. If Hindu India sets out to settle scores, beginning with the temple at Ayodhya, then the nation is heading towards speedy disintegration.

Make no mistake, despite all the propaganda purveyed through audio cassettes, Hindu rule in India is total and absolute. They are the unchallenged masters of the nation's political, economic and military might. No Muslim industrialist figures in the top 40 business houses in the country. The defence forces hardly have any Muslim representation; in the civil services, the para-military forces, in the judiciary, much the same picture prevails. For the next century at least, no Muslim can aspire to the highest elective office, not even deputy prime ministership. Hindus dominate not only because they constitute over 80 per cent of the population, but because they have securely in their grasp all the instruments that help rule a sovereign state. So, who is oppressed and who is the oppressor?

Moreover, the much sought after reversal of rules has in fact taken place. Muslims in India have been reduced to second-class citizens, not through deliberate design but on account of their lack of interest in education and high commerce. In terms of status today, the rulers of yesteryears are on par with scheduled castes and tribes. Whatever their rate of multiplication (another mischievous fabrication) they are never going to be a threat to those who have the commanding heights of the state firmly in their hands.

Despite the shrill warnings of Mr Advani and Ashok Singhal, Hindu elan is intact. It is based on self-confidence born out of numbers and a shrewd assessment of intrinsic worth. The real and only danger for the Hindus is if they fall prey to the fictions spread by the new proponents of Ram—that Hindus in their own country are 'slaves', that they are powerless to assert their will in a land they technically own. The Hindu 'mission' to correct the indignities of history is a creation of a fevered and dangerous imagination which insists on living out the past at the cost of the future. Hindus have nothing to fear but the myths fostered by Hindus about themselves.●

What's the difference?

The new-look Illustrated Weekly of India disappoints

It is a bit difficult to write about the 'new-look' Illustrated Weekly of India. How much of a new look anyway? The 16-page broadsheet pullout issued with the main magazine could be following the Churchillian dictum, 'This is not the end. This is not the beginning of the end. This is just the end of the beginning.'

We had been anticipating an entire broadsheet version of the Weekly with lots of colour and topicality. To be frank, the step by step transformation left me cold. Most of us would like to watch a gorgeously costumed, bewitchingly bejewelled Madhuri Dixit on the screen but not a version at different stages of her make-up and costuming!

THE ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY OF INDIA

Rajiv plumped for Devi as PM

Arrest of Calcutta Sikhs backfires on cops

The Weekly's transformation was to make it more topical. Here, the new avatar fails badly. The paper has nothing new to say

The broadsheet had its plus points. The layout, for the most part, in keeping with the Weekly-under-Pritish Nandy tradition, is excellent. On the front page sketches are used imaginatively. Every page has photographs, sketches and interesting titbits tucked under 'Briefings'.

The Weekly's transformation, we were told, was to make it more topical. Here, the new avatar fails badly. The lead story on Rajiv Gandhi plumping for Devi Lal as Prime Minister is dated, speculative and weak. The inside pages are not much better. There is a startling absence of hard news and topicality. Chautala and Disneyland, Punjab, Karnataka politics, Shekhar on Mandal or the ULFA....the paper has nothing new to say.

Also, most articles continue to be academic and plain dull, in fact almost like those which appear in the Weekly. (Vandana Shiva discussing the validity of the West's claim to more stringent intellectual property laws at the international level !!!) And why have the 'Private Eye' and 'Deep Throat' snippets, when they appear in the magazine too?

The edit page has a stimulating piece by Pritish Nandy on the probable success of Chandra Shekhar, despite a hostile press. The arts section offers a lot of variety. But horror of horrors, can you visualise a weekend paper without any sports news? A really bad miss.

To sum up. The 'eventually' approach has not cut much ice. If a new look Weekly is promised to the readers, it should be given at one go and not in bits and pieces. After all, which other newspaper chain has the facilities, the personnel and the infrastructure as the Times Group? The present two-in-one publication, with the broadsheet made to look the poor cousin (with no colour at all), fails to make an impact.

Best in the business

New Delhi's premier daily, The Hindustan Times, may not be a very readable newspaper, but its legal correspondent, Krishan Mahajan, is one of the best in the business. His despatches on major Supreme Court and High Court rulings, bar vs bench controversies and allied legal issues can be understood and appreciated even by an average newspaper reader. Mahajan's profiles of legal luminaries are always interesting. Take the recent one on our new attorney-general, Ganesha Iyer Ramaswamy. Do you know that his family has been in legal professions for three generations and he is a devotee of Lord Ganesha with one of the finest collections of Ganesha idols! Add to this, Ramaswamy's fondness for vodka, cigars, his 20,000-volume personal library of bhajans and a concern for the poor. Thank you, Mr Mahajan, for simplifying complicated legal issues and bringing them to the level of the average newspaper reader.

Football passion

Everyone knows that football and Calcutta are made for each other. Naturally the centenary of the famed Mohun Bagan Athletic Club is a major sporting event and I enjoyed reading The Telegraph's eight-page, colour supplement on the event. Former player Pradip Chaudhary writes on the honour and glory of playing for Mohun Bagan. "Politics could be my profession but my first love has always been Mohun Bagan," declares Jatin Chakraborty, the stormy petrel of Bengal politics, who once did a Scarlet Pimpernal act during his days in the Opposition when there was an arrest warrant for him, just to watch an important East Bengal vs Mohun Bagan match. Jatinda's passion for the Club was so pronounced that on the few occasions when he visited the hated rival East Bengal Club's ground, he was greeted with boos and shouts of "Traitor Jatin, go back"!

One of the greatest obsessions of the 300-year-old city were the Mohun Bagan vs East Bengal matches for which overnight queues formed at the grounds defying even heavy rains. The advent of TV, however, has robbed

Calcutta soccer of much of its charm, argues Patik Guha It is nothing to being actually present on the scene of action, and because of TV, there are no longer the overnight queues.

Shattering misconceptions

Those who are familiar with the fondness of Times of India's Swaminathan S Anklesaria Iver for long names, would have expected his column in the Sunday Times of India to be headlined, "Swaminathan S Anklasaria Aiyarnomics". But he calls it only 'Swaminomics' (It is rumoured that the paper will soon have other columns like 'Prafulvironment' by Praful Bidwai, 'Arvindosophy' by Arvind N Das and so on)

In ja recent piece 'Politics and Reliance', Aivar shatters misconceptions about share prices, particularly of Ambani's Reliance For instance, during Pranab Mukherjee's (an Ambani favourite) tenure as finance minister, the price of the Reliance share was quite modest It touched a record high in mid-1986 when V P Singh was the finance minister The price crashed after VP's exit from the Cabinet but moved up steadily after Singh was voted back to power So what is the gist of Swaminomics? As for share prices, political influence does matter, but less than what people think. Corporate performances and the stock market climate matter more ●

The mystery of AE Services gets even murkier

It is a breakthrough of the most unusual kind. The decision by the Swiss government to hand over the bank papers pertaining to AE Services is regarded by former Prime Minister V.P. Singh as a vindication of his government's stand on Bofors. But at the same time, the Congress(I) is treating the decision as proving that the Rajiv regime had been right all along!

Why should this be so?

The facts about AE Services are simple enough.

- The company was one of three agents paid commissions by Bofors for help in securing the India deal.
- What made AE Services unusual was that it was hired in November 1985, a month after Rajiv Gandhi told Swedish Prime Minister Olaf Palme that India would not deal with agents. Moreover, the firm was guaranteed its commission only if the deal was signed within a four-month time-frame. (It was.)
- Because AE Services entered the picture so late, it is widely assumed that the payment was a payoff. (How else could the firm guarantee a time-frame for clinching a contract unless it represented somebody of consequence?)
- While the two other Bofors front companies (Pitco/Moresco and Svenska) are faceless, AE Services has two identifiable figures at its head. Of them, Major R.A. (Bob) Wilson lives in Surrey, England, and has even given an interview to SUNDAY. The other, Myles Stott, is more elusive but is known to be a British accountant who lives in Switzerland.
- Wilson told SUNDAY (and the CBI) that AE Services did no work in India before its contract was terminated. He stuck to the story that the payment was a winding-up charge, claimed he hadn't been to India for years and suggested that AE Services was owned by Arab interests.

The V.P. Singh regime's investigators believed that Svenska was owned by Win Chadha and Pitco by the Hindujas (both deny the allegations) but were convinced that AE Services was the link to the Rajiv regime. Stott and Wilson, they felt were frontmen.

While the investigators met with little success in the Swiss Canton of Geneve where the interests behind Pitco succeeded in getting the Letter Rogatory rejected, they have fared better in the Zurich Canton. It is here (at the Nordfinanz Bank) that Bofors deposited the payments meant for AE Services and the Indian government asked the Swiss to hand over the papers pertaining to the account

AE Services fought a rearguard action against the Letter Rogatory but were handicapped in two ways. First of all, the company itself had been wound up shortly after the Bofors scandal broke, and the Swiss refused to hear appeals from a company that had no existence. Secondly, the interests behind AE Services were unwilling to be identified and so the appeal was filed in the names of Stott and Wilson. The Swiss judge ruled that as these were not the owners of the company, he would not recognise their locus standi.

In the end, AE Services appears to have given up. After it lost the first round of appeals, it did not follow the classic spoiler's course of going to Berne and appealing against the transfer of documents to India. The appeal would probably have been rejected but at least it would have caused a small delay Instead, AE Services accepted its fate with remarkable equanimity.

Why was this?

The answer may be in the bank papers. According to leaks from the Swiss to Chitra Subramaniam, The Statesman journalist who scooped the story, the Nordfinanz Bank account was opened by Stott who was the sole signatory. But Stott made it clear to the bank that he was not the beneficiary of the account (ie, the owner of AE Services). Asked who this beneficiary was, he replied: "Mubar Melikian, Jordan."

If Subramaniam is right, then all that the documents will reveal is that a Jordanian called Mubar Melikian received part of the Bofors payoffs.

This makes it easy for both V.P. Singh and Rajiv Gandhi to claim victory. The V.P. Singh regime had promised to reveal the names of the beneficiaries of the Bofors payoffs. The victory in Switzerland delivers at least on one-third of that pledge (though we still don't have the papers for Svenska or Pitco/Moresco.)

On the other hand, the official position of the Rajiv Gandhi regime (endorsed by the tame Joint Parliamentary Committee on Bofors) was that no Indian had received any money from Bofors. If a Jordanian called Mubar Melikian is shown to be the interest behind AE Services, then it strengthens that position. As far as the Congress(I) is concerned, this is vindication at last: clearly Melikian's deal with Bofors was part of some global arrangement that had nothing to do with India. Who knows, it might even have been the "industrial espionage" that Rajiv Gandhi told SUNDAY in 1988 was perhaps the service provided to Bofors by its agents!

Both positions are equally valid. But they are also equally hollow.

V.P. Singh's position is fraudulent because he didn't just promise to get the names of the beneficiaries: he suggested that the Congress or its

The Swiss government's decision to hand over papers pertaining to AE Services makes it easy for both Rajiv Gandhi and V.P. Singh to claim victory. The Bofors gun: pointing towards Jordan leaders had got the money and that his government would prove it. If the best he can manage is the name of some Jordanian who nobody has ever heard of, then all his rhetoric about "Bofors ka dalal" stands disproved.

Equally, that Stott told Nordfinanz that he was acting for Melikian does not exonerate Rajiv. The money was transferred from AE Services' account to another one just five days after it got there. If Melikian was really the owner, this would not have been necessary. Clearly, Melikian was as much a frontman as Stott or Wilson and not the ultimate beneficiary.

So, by getting hold of the AE/Nordfinanz papers, the investigators have just peeled one layer off the Bofors affair. There is no breakthrough. And there is no clean chit for Rajiv either.

So who does own AE Services? The answer seems much more difficult to find than anybody had realised. AE Services is owned by CIAOU Anstalt, a Liechtenstein-registered company. This, in turn, is owned by a Hong Kong company called Division Beneficiaries Accrediteurs.

None of these is a real company. SUNDAY traced AE Services to 139, The High Street, Guildford in England—the address at which it claimed it had its office. There was no office—the address is of a solicitors' firm which acts as a post box for AE Services. Similarly, CIAOU Anstalt has no offices in Liechtenstein, its affairs are looked after by a lawyer called Karlheinz Ritter, who looks after hundreds of such letter-box companies. And Division Beneficiaries, in turn, has only a post-box arrangement at 1501, Hutchinson House in Hong Kong.

Mubar Melikian may not even exist! (Nubar is a common enough name in Jordan. Mubar is most unusual). And even if he does, he is probably just another frontman—the Swiss have no address for him

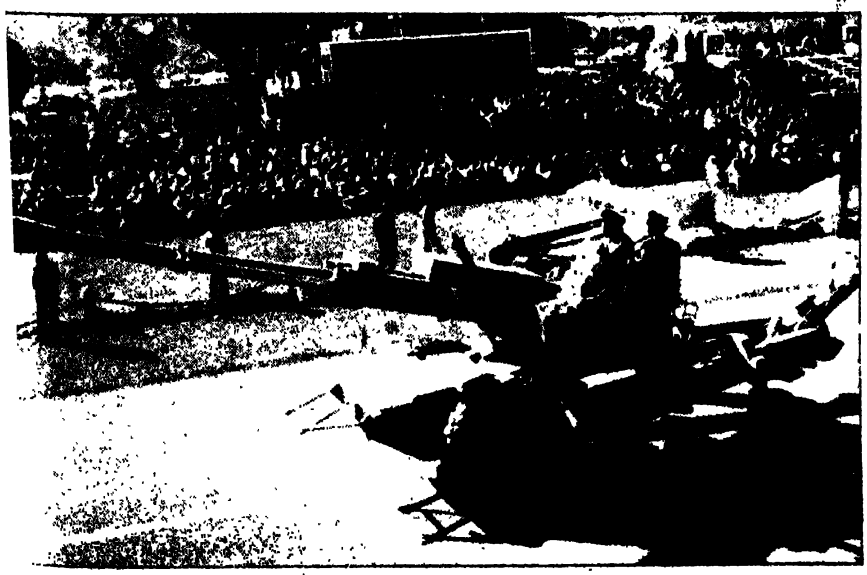
This is as far as the trail goes, so far. It is entirely possible that Division Beneficiaries will be owned by a fourth company registered in a fourth country!

Obviously, whoever set up AE Services was determined not to be caught. Even if one were to trace the ownership through the three countries we know about (UK, Liechtenstein and Hong Kong) with three more Letter Rogatories, no name would emerge; only new corporate entities.

V.P. Singh's investigators believed, somewhat naively, that a mere examination of the AE Services account would throw up the name of the ultimate beneficiary because Swiss banks always ask accountants and lawyers who set up accounts who they are really acting for. This is true but there is no real obligation on the accountant or lawyer to tell the truth. Until 1987, a signatory merely had to give the bank a name (in an extreme case, even 'John Smith' would do). Now, a photocopy of the first four pages of the beneficiary's passport is required but when the Bofors accounts were set up, this was not the case. So Mubar Melikian may not even exist! (Nubar is a common enough name in Jordan. Mubar is most unusual). And even if he does, he is probably just another frontman—the Swiss have no address for him!

Nevertheless, the Nordfinanz documents throw up some interesting details. Of the $7.34 million paid by Bofors, $7 million were transferred to the account of a new letter-box company called Colbar Investments at the Union Bank of Switzerland in Geneve. (The Indian investigators now have the option of sending a new Letter Rogatory to the Geneve Canton to open that account up.)

The rest of the money went to three interesting places:



- $123,900 to CIAOU Anstalt, AE's holding company,
- $60,400.47 to Mayo Associates, Stott's company,
- $1,476.79 to zug, Kwan Wong Tan U. Fong, Hong Kong.

The pattern of payments suggests that whoever set up the front companies in Liechtenstein and Hong Kong paid service charges to those who managed them for him from his Bofors payoff. And the payment to Mayo Associates was Stott's fee for having handled the Swiss accounts. The fact that payments were worked out to the last cent suggests that these were service fees calculated either on a percentage basis or in some other currency (which is why they don't translate in round numbers when converted to dollars.)

Does this mean that the entire charade of front companies was set up only to receive the Bofors payments? Or was AE Services just one of the fronts owned by CIAOU and Division Beneficiaries to receive kickbacks on Indian deals?

It is beginning to seem that we will never know. ●

Diplomat vs diplomat

Harassment of officials threatens to mar Indo-Pak relations

Little men are posing a big problem in Indo-Pak relations. Even as Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar announced to the nation that his Pakistani counterpart, Nawaz Sharif, had telephoned him following their talks in the Maldives and that an "atmosphere of trust" had to be built up between the two countries, an incident in Islamabad threatened to foul up any initiative the two leaders may have taken.

On 26 November, the wife of an attache of the Indian high commission in Islamabad was forcibly abducted by two plain-clothes intelligence men while she was going to the market at five in the evening. A rag doused with chloroform was used to muffle her screams for help, and she was taken to an unknown destination where four men, including one in police uniform, interrogated her. She was left at her residence two hours later, after being asked to sign a statement.

In two other separate incidents in the city, the wife of a defence attache was harassed and intimidated on her way home, though she was accompanied by a colleague of her husband's. And in Karachi, intelligence officials barged into a school and burst open the satchel and snackbox of a four-year child of an Indian diplomat, and questioned the school principal.

The summit-level assurances of Chandra Shekhar and Nawaz Sharif notwithstanding, relations between India and Pakistan are unlikely to improve

At the best of times, diplomats and their family members have to tolerate the irritating presence of a 'tail'—usually an intelligence official on a two-wheeler or in a car—who blatantly follows them around. But wives and children of diplomats had never before been picked up and held, as in the recent incidents. Indian journalists visiting Pakistan get quite accustomed to being followed, and are often stopped and interrogated as well. Some months ago, five Pakistani journalists were jailed for a few hours following their visit to the home of an Indian diplomat. It was a warning in no uncertain terms that the establishment did not take kindly to social contact between Indian diplomats and local journalists.

The Indian high commission has lodged a strongly-worded protest against the continuous harassment of family members of its mission staff by Pakistani intelligence agencies. Though the Pakistani foreign office has promised an inquiry into the incidents, Indian diplomats in Pakistan say it is unlikely that the harassment will stop. Pakistani intelligence agencies, especially the military-controlled ISI (Inter Services Intelligence), are a law unto themselves, and no amount of complaining is going to make any difference.

Indian diplomats and journalists are not the only ones harassed; in the past, Pakistani intelligence men have remorselessly trailed Opposition members as well. In a much publicised incident, the present interior minister, Choudhary Sujat Hussain (he was then in the Opposition), had locked up intelligence officials in his house, after being followed on his way home from the National Assembly. He had then rushed back to the House to register his protest.

But Pakistani diplomats in New Delhi were taken aback when intelligence men here decided to settle scores. Never before had there been such overt retaliation, and the Pakistanis in the capital say that they never experienced such intimidation before. Calling it "a concerted siege on Pakistani diplomats", the high commission alleged that five of their officials were subjected to dangerously close car-chases, obstruction, and indecent and vulgar treatment on 29 November and again on 30 November in an obviously concerted move to harass, provoke and intimidate them and to disrupt the functioning of the high commission".

According to the complaint the cars of the dilomats were followed closely by Indian cars, with upto 8 people in them, almost throwing the Pakistanis off the road and colliding with them. The Pakistanis allege that abuses were hurled at them, and their telephones were dead when they got home.

In another incident on 30 November, the wife of a diplomat was abused on her way to the market by burly plain-clothes men, and despite complaints to the ministry of external affairs, the intimidation continued.

"Peace initiatives will never get off the ground if lower-level officials are allowed to behave in this way," says an external affairs ministry official. The Pakistani diplomats agree. It remains to be seen whether the two foreign offices are able to sort out these petty problems, which could be a major obstacle in the improvement of Indo-Pak relations, whatever be the initiatives at the top. •

Fourteen-day wonder

National Institute of Design chairperson Jaya Jaitley gets the sack

It was one of those minor controversies the fledgling Chandra Shekhar government could have done well without. Textile designer and craft historian, Jaya Jaitley (also well-known for her closeness to the V.P. Singh government) was appointed chairperson of the prestigious National Institute of Design (NID) in Ahmedabad and then summarily dismissed less than a fortnight later, without ever having visited the institute.

While the dismissal was perhaps, inevitable, what was significant was the timing—the notification from the industry ministry appointing Jaitley as chairperson of NID was sent on 8 November (Jaitly received it by post on 10 November) And, the termination notice was sent on 24 November, exactly a day after the new Prime Minister, Chandra Shekhar returned from the SAARC summit in the Maldives.

What followed were endless charges and counter charges. Jaitley, who has been design and marketing consultant for Gurjari, the UP Export Corporation and the Central Cottage industries, alleged that her professional qualifications had been overlooked and dashed off an angry letter to the Prime Minister declaring, "You have recently told your political followers that there are 150 bodies available for you to appoint them as chairperson. Have you thought of what could happen if those bodies, however autonomous, started raising controversies about not being consulted and feeling that the designated chairperson was not experienced or 'eminent enough'?

And, if for Jaitley, the timing of the termination was significant, for the 'NID lobby' what was equally significant was the timing of the appointment by the then industry minister, Ajit Singh—the appointment was made on 8 November, a day after the V.P. Singh government had lost the vote of confidence in Parliament thus reducing Ajit Singh to just a caretaker minister. To compound the error of making such a hasty appointment was the fact that the NID lobby had not been consulted at all. Moreover, they alleged that their list of probables for the post—which had been lying vacant since UGC chairperson, Prof Yashpal's term expired in June—had not been considered.

Officials in the industry ministry admitted that Singh had directly appointed Jaitley but insisted that it was nothing out of the ordinary. "There is no formalised procedure for such appointments. In the past, names for this post or for the chairperson of the Khadi Commission used to trickle down from the Prime Minister's Office (PMO). The other way, of course, is to write to the various concerned ministries like culture or to appoint someone on the basis of personal knowledge," an official in the ministry said. Defending his ministry's decision, he said, "Such a decision does strike people as unusual, particularly when you are so used to the PMO just handing you a list of names."

According to him, the decision to appoint Jaitley as chairperson of NID had been taken on 31 October and the announcement would have been made then as well but for—the inevitable—bureaucratic delays. Besides, there was the additional problem of filling vacancies in the institute's governing body, whose term had expired in March/April this year.

Speculation still abounds, long after the incident is over. The task of forgiving and forgetting is going to take a long time considering the 13 days of unpleasant talk and veiled threats that preceded the termination notification. When Jaitley wrote to the executive director of the NID, Vikas Satwalkar, informing him of her decision to visit Ahmedabad what she got in return was a terse four line reply which made no attempt to conceal the hostility, "I would once again like to reiterate that a visit to Ahmedabad would be imprudent and embarrassing at this juncture." Taken aback by this attitude, Jaitly decided to adopt a similar stubborn stance. "I did not withdraw despite the unsavoury controversy because my appointment was definitely not a political decision. Withdrawing would have made my 20 years of work redundant."

Amid all this fuss, termed by many as a storm in a tea cup, a former official of the industry ministry has the last word, "The funny thing is that both the appointment and the termination are perfectly valid and legal. The minister was in the right to appoint somebody he thought fit for the job and the NID rules provide for somebody being replaced without any reason, without, of course, saying it in so many words." So much for the law. •

Officials in the industry ministry admitted that Ajit Singh (left) had directly appointed Jaya Jaitley (centre), but insisted it was nothing out of the ordinary. And her termination notice was sent exactly a day after Chandra Shekhar (right) returned from the SAARC summit

MAHESH JETHMALANI

The pretender

Chandra Shekhar has spent more time on politicking and intrigue than addressing himself to the problems of the nation

An influential section of the English press in India who only yesterday was singing Mr V.P. Singh's paeans in its columns—in hindsight, less out of conviction than in an endeavour to extract patronage from his regime for its indomitable efforts—has revealed itself to be adept at fast adjusting to the new political realities. In its new avatar, this section has anointed itself as the conscience-keeper of the Indian press and gratuitously tenders lofty sermons to its less-enlightened brethren. To cite one example, it has been exhorting the press to give Mr Chandra Shekhar and his Cabinet a chance. Else, it warns, the press will be perceived as "incorrigible wreckers", more concerned with its own power base than with nation-building.

Let us assume that Mr V.P. Singh received his just deserts when the press virtually hounded him out of office and Mr Chandra Shekhar abandoned him for the love of power. Let us ignore the fact that Mr Chandra Shekhar is an usurper of power and a pretender to the throne of Delhi; his coalition government being at odds with the national mandate of 1989 and bereft of any popular legitimacy. Let us also condone the reticence of Mr Chandra Shekhar's new apologists in expressing their real intent and camouflaging it to exhort the press to respond favourably to the "national need". Even then, does Mr Chandra Shekhar's record, after two weeks in office, entitle him to the support of the press and indeed, of the nation?

Consider Mr Chandra Shekhar's first act as Prime Minister—that of constituting his Cabinet. It took him all of 11 days to announce the formation of this all-important institution. During that time, the nation, in its most troubled times, had no government. But it is not the time per se expended in the formation of his Cabinet that must perturb the nation. In the absence of any explanation for the delay, there is an irresistible inference that the time was consumed in petty political bickering between the various political constituents, as also the band of stragglers that constitutes his government. This, again, is not significant in itself but for the fact that it reveals the tone and style of the government that we can expect. It indicates that Mr Chandra Shekhar is going to spend far more time on politicking and intrigue than on addressing himself to the burning problems of the nation.

If the manner of the constitution of his Cabinet cannot but cause consternation, its composition must fill one with dismay. Surely, Mr Chandra Shekhar's apologists do not themselves believe that the burdens of defence, home, information & broadcasting, in addition to the onerous responsibilities of Prime Minister and chief arbitrator of political bickering, can all be efficiently shouldered by one man, no matter how strong and broad his shoulders be? Or, is this an admission that Mr Chandra Shekhar could not find enough men of standing amongst his colleagues? In the latter case, Mr Chandra Shekhar has either done no justice to his colleagues, or alternatively, even less justice to the nation.

Then there is the question of the moral track record of at least some of his ministerial colleagues. Even ignoring the fact that their fundamental qualifications stem from the fact that they are party-splitters, there is much cause for trepidation. The highest law officer in the country; the law and justice minister, has no legal qualifications; on the contrary, his notions of law appear to be a bit quaint, judging from the manner in which he obtained bank loans from the Vijaya Bank, as reported by the weekly, Current, on the front page of one of its recent issues. Perhaps, it is his ideological flexibility that has earned him his job, for there are few people in the country who can abandon the RSS and become unabashed admirers of Syed Shahabuddin.

A unique ministerial position has been carved out for Mr Kamal Morarka - that of minister of state in the Prime Minister's Office. Mr Morarka has several investigations pertaining to economic offences pending against him. His appointment will, no doubt, give fresh heart to many of my clients facing similar charges. Mr V.C. Shukla adorns the external affairs ministry, to, no doubt, propagate abroad what he so effectively propagated in India during the Emergency. Though Dr Sanjay Singh has undoubtedly displayed in his career a unique penchant for communications, his appointment could at least have been stalled till he was cleared of all pending charges against him.

Contrast all this with the expeditious formation of Mr V.P. Singh's Cabinet and the unassailable credentials of its members. If Mr Chandra Shekhar's approach to his Cabinet has been less than inspiring, such bureaucratic changes as he has hitherto initiated cannot but cause the nation to forfeit any trust he or his media apologists may have expected it to repose in him. The first target of a shake-up has been the law-enforcing agencies, and such changes as have been effected are singularly ominous. At a time when the Bofors investigation is entering its final and vital stage, Mr Chandra Shekhar has chosen to replace Mr Rajendra Shekhar—who so ably spearheaded the Bofors investigation as chief of the CBI. The resignation of Mr Arun Jaitley from his post as the additional solicitor-general, in keeping with the norms expected of law officers on the ascension to power of a new government, was speedily accepted by the law minister. Mr Jaitley, it may be remembered, was an integral part of the team that investigated Bofors.

Unlike Mr V.P. Singh who has gone on record to state that his greatest mistake was not holding elections in Punjab during his tenure, Chandra Shekhar has only reduced chances of a solution in the state

If one adds to these facts the statement of Mr Chandra Shekhar, that the Bofors investigation was the job of a sub-inspector (remember that the investigation requires an intricate inquiry into as secretive a foreign jurisdiction as Switzerland) plus, the imminent appointment of Mr G. Ramaswamy, the all-purpose trouble-shooter of the Congress party, as attorney-general of India, we have a coherent picture of what the present regime intends for the Bofors investigation. Clearly, the suspected consideration for Congress support is being paid by Mr Chandra Shekhar in unmistakable instalments.

This brings us to the question of Mr Chandra Shekhar's policy initiatives on the burning questions facing the country, and for which his media supporters state their claim for press and national support in the ultimate analysis. On the political front, there has been no initiative whatsoever taken on the problem of the exodus of Hindus from Kashmir and the presence of militants in that state. Indeed, there is not even a sign of any initiative in this direction. The 6 December deadline of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad looms large while Mr Chandra Shekhar and his coalition partner, the Congress, speak in discordant voices. While the Congress has passed a resolution to permit kar seva on the shilaniyas site, Mr Subodh Kant Sahay, the minister of state for home, has been categorical

Mr Rajiv Gandhi, was only half right when he justified his support to Mr Chandra Shekhar by stating that the latter had been in the Congress at one time. The truth of the matter is that Mr Chandra Shekhar has always been and still is a Congressman at heart in stating that there can be no question of kar seva on the shilaniyas site since that site is a disputed area.

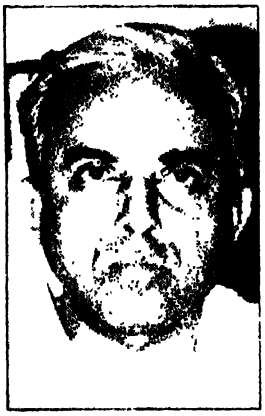
On Punjab, like Mr V.P. Singh, Mr Chandra Shekhar has waxed eloquent on the need for a healing touch in that state. Unlike Mr V.P. Singh, however, who has gone on record to state that his greatest mistake was not holding elections in Punjab during his tenure, Mr Chandra Shekhar has further reduced chances of a solution in Pubjab by assuring those who administer President's Rule in that state of more weapons and larger police and paramilitary forces, as also by the arrest on 24 November of the only two recognisable leaders in that state—Simranjeet Singh Mann and the moderate Prakash Singh Badal—for a non-violent protest movement.

In Assam, his government has taken the Draconian step of imposing President's Rule on the pretext of violence and instability in that state, though there is reason to believe that the motive was merely to oust the incumbent AGP government. Attempts are afoot, now, to topple Mr Karunanidhi's DMK government in Tamil Nadu. The policy of greater centralisation and the refusal to live with Opposition governments in the states is a well-known Congress one. It is alien to an anti-Congress political strain which believes in greater decentralisation, and is not unwilling to let state governments make a success for themselves. The Opposition recognises that President's Rule must be imposed only in extreme circumstances and frequent and unwarranted recourse to it is tantamount to a negation of popular mandates at the Assembly level. The Congress has always made nonsense of the underlying principle of our political structure: unity in diversity. As Prime Minister, Mr Chandra Shekhar has revealed that, in reality, he is cast in the same mould.

On the economic front, there has been even less intitiative. The promised economic package to control inflation has not been forthcoming while prices continue to soar. Nor has a discernible attempt been made to grapple with the problems posed by coffers empty of foreign exchange and soaring foreign debt. Mr Chandra Shekhar has expressed his hostility, in a public statement, to the new industrial policy announced by the previous government. Yet, we have no clue as to what his own industrial policy is. From his public statement, it is evident that he is a fervent protagonist of the licensing system and a staunch opponent of foreign investment. His predilections in economic policy must warm the cockles of the economic status quo which consists of manipulative business houses perpetuating their vested interests by cornering licences and evading the provisions of the Monopolies & Restrictive Trade Practices Act and by subverting a pliant and corruptible bureaucracy. On employment and social justice, he has advocated a diluted form of the Mandal Report but in the absence of any crystallisation of thought, his views do not merit comment. If the keynote of Mr V.P. Singh's government in the economic sphere was "Growth with Equity", through the medium of a liberal industrial policy combined with the implementation of the Mandal Report, Mr Chandra Shekhar has indicated a preference for the out-moded and passe economic model inherited from earlier years which has resulted only in stagnation and aggravated inequality.

Mr Rajiv Gandhi was only half right when he justified his support to Mr Chandra Shekhar by stating that the latter had been in the Congress at one time. The truth of the matter is that Mr Chandra Shekhar has always been and still is a Congressman at heart. As an ambitious young Turk, he obviously realised that the Congress, with its dynastic culture, was no place within which to fulfil his prime ministerial ambitions. His strategy to become a focal point of Congressmen disenchanted by their own leadership has been repeatedly frustrated by the pusillanimity and reluctance of such Congressmen to leave their parent fold. Now, thanks to Mr V.P. Singh, Mr Chandra Shekhar has fulfilled his lifetime's ambition. It is the former's personal integrity and political cunning that more than any other individual or institution has both exposed the Congress culture and shaken its electoral base.



The media exhortations of Mr Chandra Shekhar's supporters should accordingly fool no one. The acceptance of Mr Chandra Shekhar as Prime Minister by the Congress is a desperate stop-gap measure by the Congress to prevent its base from being divided between a more progressive V.P. Singh and a more status quoist BJP, and to accordingly prevent its own extinction. Mr Chandra Shekhar's media supporters should hardly expect those who want to see a final end to years of Congress misrule and who yearn for change, to rally to a cause that was conceived in political immorality and which will only prolong the existence of a parasitical and decadent status quo. •

Though Dr Sanjay Singh has undoubtedly displayed a unique penchant for communications, his appointment could have been stalled till he was cleared of all pending charges against him

Mr Kamal Morarka, minister of state in the Prime Minister's Office, has several investigations pertaining to economic offences pending against him

Dr Subramaniam Swamy, the law and justice minister, has no legal qualifications; on the contrary, his notions of law appear to be a little quaint

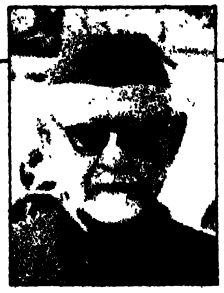
Zakir and his Jamia



If you drive along the Delhi-Mathura road towards Agra and turn sharp left towards the river Yamuna, near where the lines of houses end, you go along a dual highway with many new buildings on either side: a complex of apartments on the right known as Zakir Bagh named after Zakir Husain, the first Muslim President of the republic; the high-rise Surya Sofitel on your left. Further along the road is a brand new heart hospital, Escorts. And facing it, the Holy Family Hospital. Then, follow a succession of formidable speed-breakers which make you crawl along into the campus of the Jamia Milliah Islamia created by Zakir Husain and his band of dedicated colleagues who gave all they had to make it into a university. Alongside the main campus building there is a mound on which its founding father, Zakir Husain, is buried.

Zakir Husain's life-story is also the story of the Jamia. He was the third of the seven sons of Fida Husain and Nazneen of Qaimganj (district Farrukhabad, UP). They were Bangash Pathans whose ancestors had migrated to India in the early years of the 18th century. While most Pathans sought careers in the army, Zakir's branch of the Bangash were madah akhoons (big teachers). They also came under the influence of Sufi Karam Ali Shah and a Hindu saint, Bans Bihari. Teaching and religious tolerance were legacies inherited by Zakir Husain. For some years, the family lived in Hyderabad, but after the death of his father in 1907, the rest moved back to Qaimganj where they owned ancestral property. Begam Nazneen died four years later leaving Zakir, then aged 14, and his brothers orphans.

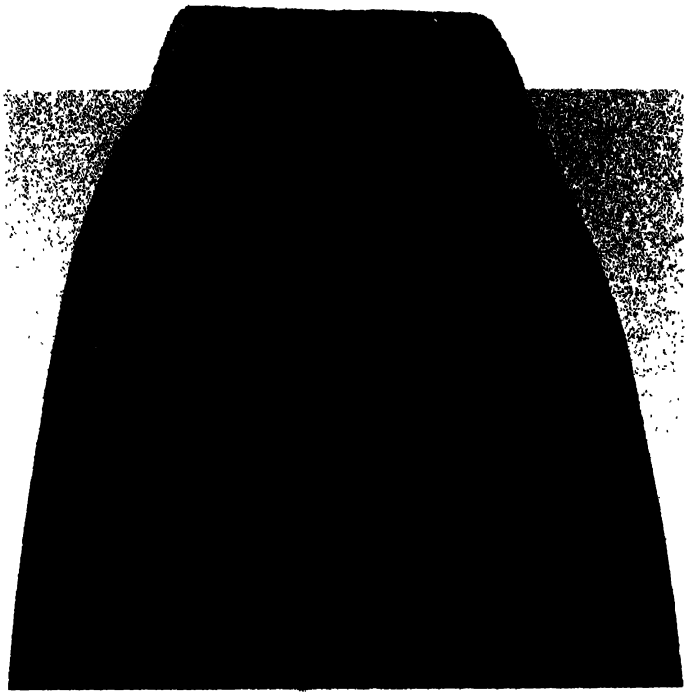
The brothers went to the Islamia High School in Etawah where Zakir made his mark as a scholar and orator. While in the eighth class, he spelt out his ideas on the purpose of education which reveal his early maturity.

In 1913, he joined the M.A.O. College, Aligarh, to study science and economics. He continued to excel in his studies, invariably standing first in his class. And in debating. When studying for his MA degree in economics, he took up part-time teaching in junior classes. It was in Aligarh that he took a clear decision to throw in his lot with the nationalist forces against the sectarian views that prevailed. When some offensive references were made about Gandhiji, he quit his post, his stipend and Aligarh. By then, his potential for leadership had been spotted and he was offered the post of naib tehsildar to keep him on the government side. Before he could make a decision, his friend K.A. Hamied persuaded him to go to Germany for further studies.

Zakir was an immediate success in Germany. The tall, sinewy, bearded Pathan with a golden voice spouting idealism became the undisputed leader of the Indian community. Though always short of cash, he published Ghalib and a booklet on Gandhi. Amongst the many who fell to his charms was Gerda Philipsborn, a German Jewish girl from an upper middle class family. There is little doubt that the two got emotionally involved with each other. They were constant companions during the three years Zakir was in Germany. Some years later, after Zakir had married and become a father, Gerda followed him to Delhi where she died in 1943 and was buried by Muslim rites in Jamia. The romance of Apa Jan, as Gerda came to be known was the subject of a novel, Aatish-e-Khaamosh by Saliha Abid Hussain. Apparently, Begum Zakir took her husband's affair with Gerda in her stride. She was an unsophisticated Pathani not interested in anything outside her home.

Zakir Husain, the first Muslim President of the republic, was instrumental in establishing Jamia Milliah as a famous seat of learning

Jamia had first been set up in Aligarh in 1920. It was then shifted to Karol Bagh with barely 80 students and teachers. But such was the dedication with which the teachers had been fired by Mahatma Gandhi that they refused to take more than a pittance. Zakir who was elected shaikhul jamia agreed to a salary of Rs 80 per month. In 1938, Jamia acquired land near the Yamuna. There was no money to build. Gandhiji made an appeal for funds; Zakir went out with his begging bowl and got grants from the Nizam and some Hindu industrialists.



Zakir's faith in the future of Jamia sustained him through the lean years. He was not a particularly devout Muslim but did pray at least once a day, read the Quran and fasted during Ramadan. But he also encouraged painting, music and staging plays, all of which were frowned upon by the maulanas. He committed the institution to carrying out Gandhiji's scheme of basic education and helped in the drafting of its proposals.

By the time India became independent, Jamia was well-established as a rival of the Aligarh Muslim University. In the communal massacres that followed the Partition, Zakir was almost murdered while travelling by train through Jalandhar and Ludhiana. In 1951, he was unanimously elected vice-chancellor of Aligarh University for six years and was member of the Indian delegation to UNESCO. Then a member of its executive board. In 1957, he was nominated by Pandit Nehru as Governor of Bihar; in 1962, made vice-president and finally, President of the republic in 1967. He died in office on 3rd May, 1969 and two days later was buried in the Jamia. ●

TILL TODAY, THIS INSPIRED PIECE OF DESIGN HAS REQUIRED NO IMPROVEMENTS.

NEITHER HAS THIS.

The other day, the man from Continental Aktiengesellschaft was here.

Stern, hawk-eyed and very German, he earns his living solely by designing car tyres for Mercedes Benz.

He took one long look (a full six hours by our watch) at the R-90 and, uncharacteristically, broke into a grin.

The R-90 had come through with flying colours.

There wasn't one air bubble in evidence, not a single hairline crack. The contours were perfect. The sipes even more so.

The square-shouldered design gave the R-90 a distinct air of confidence, of quiet strength. The grooves, set deep, promised a stronger grip at high speeds over rain-swept highways and dusty, winding country roads.

When, finally, the man from Continental test-drove on the R-90, what did he have to say?

You're right. He said exactly what lakhs of car-owners have always believed about the R-90.

"It's a miracle!"

Citizen Goenka

Love, hate and love in five phases

This may seem hard to believe, but there is a pattern to Ramnath Goenka's actions. His relationship with Rajiv Gandhi seems set to follow almost exactly the same course as his relationship with Indira Gandhi.

The Indira relationship first. Goenka claims that he made her Prime Minister. The way he tells it, he chartered a plane to fly from Madras to Delhi when Lal Bahadur Shastri died. On the flight was Kamaraj, then the virtual head of a Syndicate of Congress bosses. They discussed possible successors to Shastri and then, just as the plane was landing, Goenka suggested Indira. Kamaraj, he says, looked at him significantly. "Say nothing more about this," he warned. A few days later, the Syndicate made Mrs Gandhi Prime Minister and nobody was more delighted than Goenka.

This was Phase One (Love and Pride) in the relationship. Then, Mrs Gandhi fell out with the Syndicate, split the Congress and declared that she'd moved to the left. Goenka treated this as betrayal and his papers began to attack her.

This was Phase Two (Betrayal and Anger) in the relationship.

Goenka's opposition did not harm Indira Gandhi, who won by a landslide in 1971 and then again, in the Assembly elections in 1972. But finally, events caught up with her and she declared the Emergency in 1975. While most of the press suffered during that period, the regime's ire was reserved for Goenka and the Indian Express group.

This was Phase Three (Fight to the Finish).

As it turned out, Goenka won that battle. Mrs Gandhi lost the 1977 election and the new Janata government was beholden to Goenka. The Indian Express became the mouthpiece of the regime and a crusading editor called Arun Shourie was hired to spur on the ministers and further expose the evilness of Indira Gandhi.

This was Phase Four (Press Baron Exults).

But soon, it was clear that Janata would collapse. Indira Gandhi, who Goenka and Shourie buried every day on their front page, was about to be resurrected. Perhaps, Goenka hadn't won his fight to the finish after all. Now, he began to have doubts. After Mrs Gandhi returned to office, these crystallised. He fired Shourie, resumed calling her "Devi" and cosied up to power again.

This was Phase Five (Friends Again).

NOW, CONSIDER the parallels with his relationship with Rajiv Gandhi.

There was first the Love and Pride Phase when Rajiv was elected. The old boy quietly forgot his objections to dynastic rule and was wheeled on before Jack Anderson's TV camera to tell an audience of bemused Americans that he would now die a happy man because India was safe in Rajiv's hands.

Then came Phase Two (Betrayal and Anger). Rajiv refused to act against Dhirubhai Ambani, even though Goenka claims he had been assured he would. The Express turned against the Prime Minister.

It may be a coincidence, but Arun Shourie had been rehired just before Phase Three (Fight to the Finish) began. The Express used all its might to get rid of Rajiv, while the government retaliated with raids, law suits and other forms of persecution.

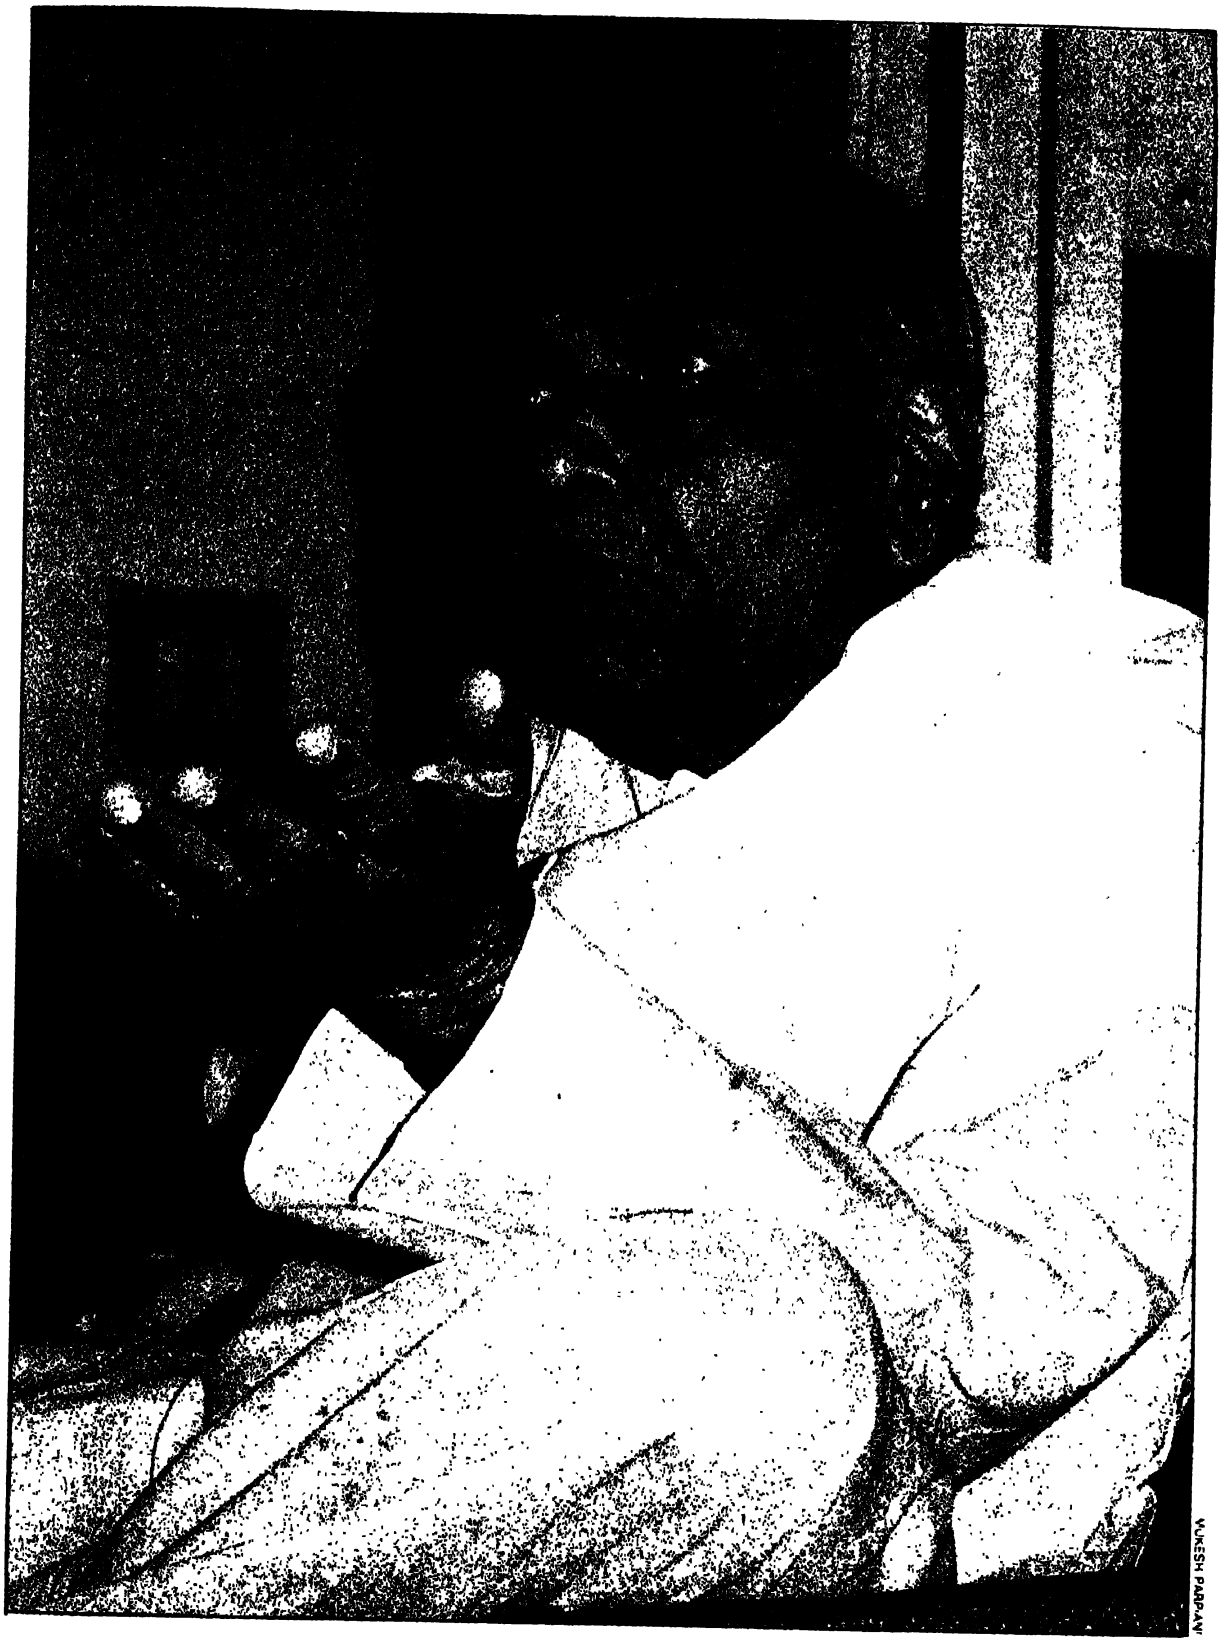
Once again, Goenka appeared to have won. Rajiv lost the 1989 election, the Express took the credit and the newly-elected Janata Dal ministry treated the paper with deference. It was the old Phase Four (Press Baron Exults) all over again.

And now, it looks as though we are into Phase Five (Friends Again). The Janata Dal has split, its government has collapsed and the new Prime Minister owes his seat to Rajiv Gandhi. Clearly, Goenka hadn't really won his fight to the finish. And so, Arun Shourie has been fired for the second time, the paper has toned down its opposition to Rajiv and yes, the proprietor is having doubts again.

Who knows? He might be cosying up to Rajiv soon

THERE IS, however, one major difference this time around. Eleven years after the fall of the Janata government, Goenka is no longer the sprightly, old man he used to be. His health is failing, he is out of things for hours on end and has only the odd lucid moment.

To be fair, he has been like this since 1987 and though his doctors keep saying how ill he is, he has managed to wage war on Dhirubhai Ambani during that period without his health really getting in the way.



Indeed, sceptics allege that his illness is an excuse. He can "forget" things deliberately and then say that his mind isn't what it used to be. He can fire editors (Arun Shourie, last month) while claiming to their faces he has nothing against them.

Certainly, he has got away with everything because of his ill-health. In 1987, just after he had hired Shourie, he gave SUNDAY an interview. Then, a few weeks later, he promptly denied having done any such thing. The charitable explanation for such lapses is that he is gaga much of the time.

Perhaps he is. But even in that condition, he makes a formidable opponent and a good friend. (Ask Rajiv Gandhi or Nusli Wadia.) Each time his detractors write him off and claim that effective control of his empire has passed on to accountants and editors, the old man rises from his slumber and seizes control.

For all his shifts of stance, his selective memory and his amoral approach to public affairs, he remains a true original. In the twilight of his life, he dwarfs other proprietors and never ceases to shock or surprise.

And for all we know, perhaps this time, he will depart from the script, rewrite Phase Five and not make up with Rajiv! •

The armed forces should be left alone

How times change! What has been done to the navy of this country in recent weeks and months is far worse than the blows that had been delivered to the cohesion, morale, discipline and image of the army during the heyday of the late Krishna Menon, followed, alas, by the military debacle in the Himalayas in 1962. The country was up in arms against the then minister for defence and even against the Nehru government well before the Chinese struck. This time, however, there has hardly been even a whimper of protest, although the navy has been shaken practically to its very roots.

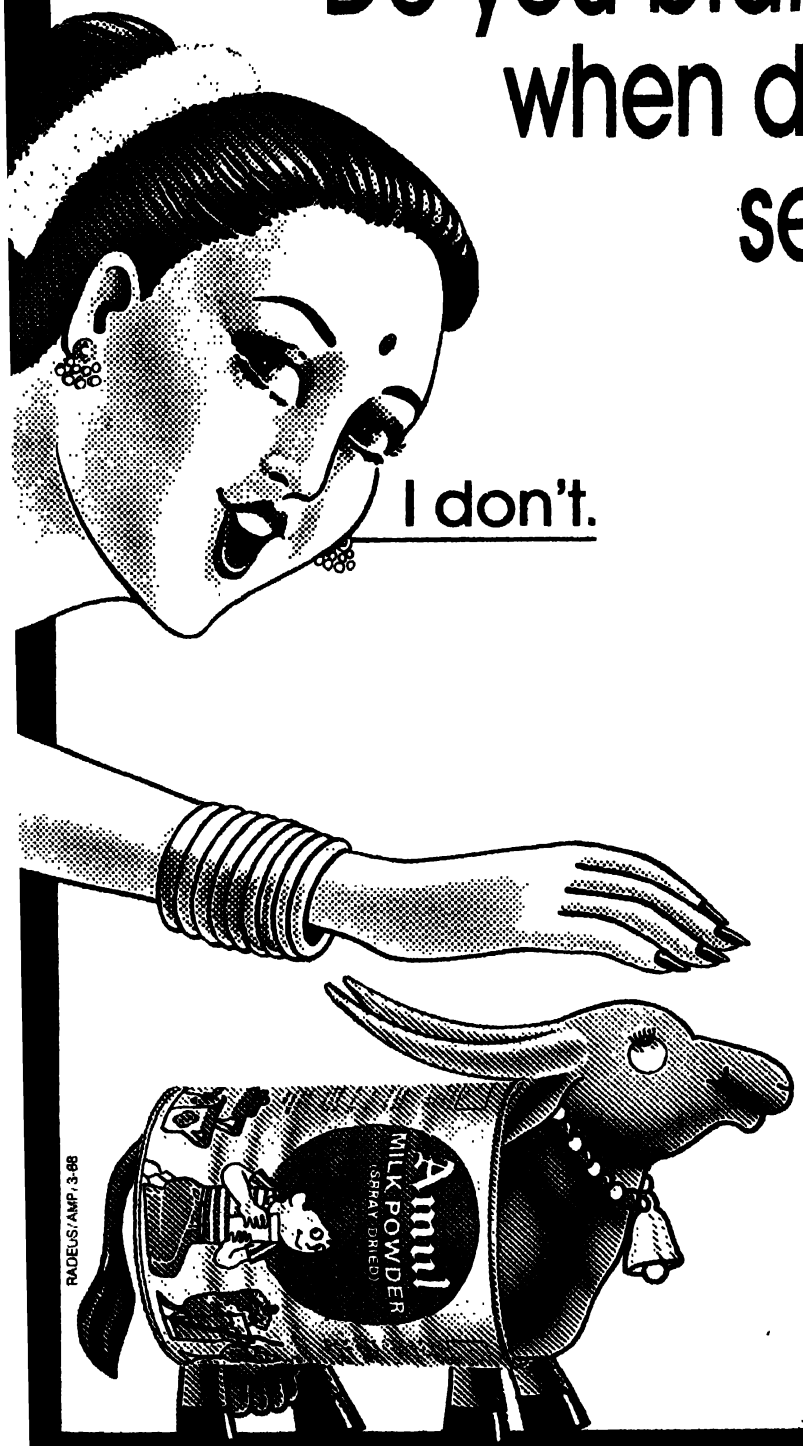
ASHOK VAJHE

Admiral L. Ramdas is mercifully in the saddle as the naval chief, despite disgraceful last-minute attempts by the Chandra Shekhar government to reverse the decision

To understand what has really hit this proud service it is necessary not to be misled into believing that what we have gone through is merely a more than usually nasty and malodorous battle for succession to the top naval job. The extravagantly bitter struggle did take place. But it descended to hitherto unplumbed depths primarily because it reflected a deeper malaise. This can be diagnosed only if we realise clearly that the succession strife got inextricably intermixed with what can only be called l'affaire Bhagwat, or the questionable denial to the utterly outstanding Rear Admiral Vishnu Bhagwat of the prized and prestigious command of the western fleet into which is packed the Indian Navy's biggest punch.

At the time this happened, Bhagwat was Chief of Staff of the Western Naval Command where his boss was Vice-Admiral "Tony" Jain who has since lost the war of succession to equally brilliant but slightly junior Admiral L. Ramdas, now mercifully in the saddle as the naval chief despite totally disgraceful last-minute attempts by the Chandra Shekhar government to reverse the decision duly signed by the President and solemnly announced by the V.P. Singh government.

Since the issue of appointment of the western fleet commander is sub judice—Bhagwat has gone to Bombay High Court alleging that he was done down because of "manipulations" by Admiral Nadkarni, the outgoing naval chief, and Tony Jain—it is not proper to discuss the merits of the issue in dispute. But it is both permissible and pertinent to pinpoint the casual manner in which the V.P. Singh government handled the whole question and the terrible impact that the Bhagwat affair and subsequent developments have had on the service.



Before going to court, Bhagwat had filed, through proper channels, a statutory complaint and asked for a meeting with the defence minister (then, as now, the Prime Minister himself), which is every aggrieved officer's right. But the poor rear admiral did not even get a reply, leave alone an audience with the defence minister. As he went to court, the navy officer corps got polarised into two antagonistic sections. One said that Bhagwat must not be given any quarter because he had no business to reveal the navy's dirty business in a court of law. But the other section says no less vehemently that the injustice done to Bhagwat was so egregious that the matter had to be brought into open so that gerrymandering and favouritism was exposed once and for all.

Bad enough in itself, the situation became much worse when the increasingly embittered polarisation embraced also the race between Jain and Ramdas. What eventually clinched the issue against Jain was Bhagwat's charge, in his writ petition, backed by some documentary evidence, that Nadkarni and Jain had gone to the extent of "tampering" the record.

After losing the battle, Jain bided his time until the VP government fell and that of Chandra Shekhar took over. And then began what is unquestionably the most disgraceful act in the sordid drama. Politicos around Chandra Shekhar, powerful business lobbies and busybodies of all sorts persuaded the new government to reopen the issue. That this unpardonable folly was finally avoided does not detract from the enormity of what was attempted.

The government needs to be told that almost all other institutions of the Indian Republic have been politicised, perverted and often paralysed. The armed forces should, in heaven's name, be left alone. •

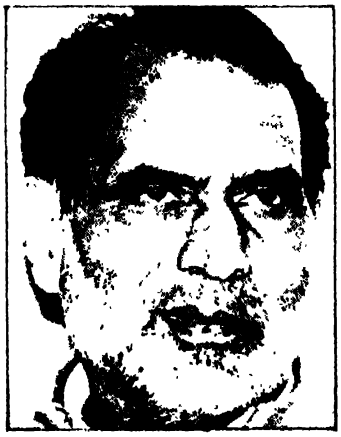
AFTER THE STORM

Can the Ayodhya dispute be resolved? Despite scepticism, a few encouraging signs

As 30th October drew to a close, it appeared as if the fires of Ram would continue to rage for a long time. Despite the heavy security provided by the Uttar Pradesh government, the kar sevaks had managed to storm the disputed structure and plant a saffron flag atop the dome of the Babri Masjid. While police firing resulted in some casualties in the temple town, communal violence erupted all over the country in an inevitable fall-out of the incidents at Ayodhya. With leaders of both communities adopting an intransigent stand on the mandir/masjid controversy, it seemed unlikely that the fractious issue would be resolved in the foreseeable future.



But only a month later, such pessimism appeared totally misplaced. On 1 December, 20 days after he'd been sworn in as Prime Minister, Chandra Shekhar managed to get representatives of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) and the Babri Masjid Action Committee (BMAC) to the negotiating table. And though the meeting ended inconclusively, the two parties agreeing to meet again on the 4th, it was seen as a major breakthrough for the fledgling Janata Dal(S) government.

Even before Shekhar had got the nod from President R Venkataraman, his camp-followers had confided in all who would listen that only their leader could solve the Ram Janmabhoomi Babri Masjid controversy to everyone's satisfaction. "I don't know of any other leader who can have lunch with Nanaji Deshmukh and then go out for dinner with Syed Shahabuddin," said one confidant. And this goodwill, it was presumed, would help the bearded leader from Ballia to get the contending parties to see reason.

Those who had regarded such talk as idle hype were soon proved wrong. Not only did the influential Shia leader, Ali Mian, call up a minister of the Shekhar government to confess that he was hopeful that things would work out, but even the VHP and the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) appeared to have modified their stand in the hope that an agreement might be reached.

And finally, when the VHP redefined kar seva as a non-violent satyagraha to be conducted at the Janmasthan until makar sankranti (14 January), the scenario appeared to become even more hopeful.

Sure enough, 6 December saw a sea change in the attitude of the Hindu leadership. Gone was the intent to provoke trouble by affecting forcible entry into the disputed area. In its place was a chastened VHP, exhorting its kar sevaks to court arrest peacefully and taking particular pains to ex-

When the day passed off with only sporadic incidents of violence reported, it seemed reasonable to assume that the worst was over as far as the Ayodhya dispute went. And from now on, things could only get better.

All the major players were in attendance when the meeting between the VHP and the BMAC got under way at the Maharashtra Sadan in New Delhi. There were Mulayam Singh Yadav, the UP chief minister, who'd made the preservation of the mosque something of a prestige issue; Bhairon Singh Shekhawat, the Rajasthan chief minister, in his capacity as Shekhar's conduit to the Hindu leadership; Maharashtra CM Sharad Pawar, the Congress(I) representative; and minister of state for home Subodh Kant Sahay, acting for the Union government.

The VHP leaders, including Vishnu Hari Dalmia, S.C. Dixit, Acharya Giriraj Kishore and Moropant Pingle, refused to call off the proposed kar seva on 6 December. The BMAC, represented by S.S. Owaisi, Javed Habib, Mohammad Afzal, J.A. Gilani and M.A. Siddiqui, for its part, reiterated that the disputed structure belonged to the Muslims. But while neither party softened its stand publicly, insiders maintained that it was now only a matter of time.

The Congress(I)'s attitude too was more positive than it had been in a long time. In a significant departure from his earlier none-of-this-concerns-us-except-as-grist-for-criticism stand, Rajiv Gandhi wrote to the Prime Minister suggesting a formula by which the Ayodhya dispute could be resolved. According to the Congress president, the best way out lay in instituting a commission of enquiry, comprising five sitting judges of the Supreme Court, to be selected by the Chief Justice of India. This commission would determine whether the Babri Masjid stood over the site of a temple. (Once it arrived at a decision, legislation could be passed to the effect that no other place of worship would ever change hands.)

This body would have the right to summon witnesses, examine reports and commission studies to arrive at a conclusion within a period of three months. If the appointment of such a commission created legal problems, Rajiv suggested that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court be enlarged by an ordinance.

While Shekhar agreed that Gandhi had made "several good suggestions", the Indian Union Muslim League (IUML) and the Babri Masjid Action Committee (BMAC) welcomed the new initiative. (Rajiv had apparently had a three-hour secret meeting with Syed Shahabuddin before announcing the formula.) But both the VHP and the BJP refused to consider it as the momentum of their movement would be lost if the matter was referred to a commission. And also, it couldn't be guaranteed that the decision would go in favour of the Hindus.

But the Hindu leadership had managed to snatch a victory of sorts: the building of the temple itself was not in dispute any longer. Wrote Rajiv: "The main question is not whether a temple should be constructed but where precisely the temple should be located."

Surprisingly enough, even such a hardliner as Mulayam Singh Yadav swung around to this point of view. On 6 December, while the kar sevaks offered peaceful satyagraha at Ayodhya, the Uttar Pradesh chief minister announced at a function in Lucknow that he was ready to construct a grand Sri Ram Janmabhoomi temple if that would solve the vexed mandir/masjid issue. And though Yadav didn't go as far as Chandra

Swami did on his expedition to the temple city, insisting that the temple be constructed on the garbha griha (sanctum sanctorum), he didn't specify the site either.

At the 4 December meeting, however, everyone had decided to fall back on archaeology, tactfully skirting the contentious topic of the VHP-sponsored kar seva. Minister of state Subodh Kant Sahay asked the contending parties to submit documentary and other evidence to substantiate their case by 22 December. This would then be made available to the other side and, after a thorough study, the BMAC and the VHP would meet again on 10 January to discuss the issue.

The reasoning obviously was that if the Rajiv formula had been accepted by then, the evidence would be made over to a commission of enquiry, which would come to a decision on the matter in three months. And, as per the agreement arrived at earlier, both parties would abide by it.

The BJP, however, had other ideas. Party general secretary K.L. Sharma wrote to the Prime Minister asking that the 'Gandhi (the Mahatma) formula' be followed to resolve the Ayodhya dispute. According to Sharma, in an article in the Harijan Sevak dated 27 July, 1937, the Mahatma had written: "Hindu religious places which have been taken over by the Muslims should be handed over to Hindus voluntarily...it will strengthen Hindu-Muslim unity."

Sound of the sannyasins

An audio-cassette, inciting Hindus to adopt a more militant stand, raises a controversy

A lifetime spent in delivering pravachans (sermons) to the faithful has honed Uma Bharti's oratorical skills. And her rabble-rousing style is now a part of sangh parivar legend. So, nobody was very surprised when an audio-cassette comprising Bharti's rabid views on the Ayodhya issue began doing the rounds in the capital. Large meetings of devotees were organised in parks and at street corners, where the cassette was played to incite Hindus into adopting more militant stands. And with time, the cassette made its way into smaller towns and villages of north India as well, having a far greater impact on the unsophisticated audiences in these parts.

MITAN RAI

UMA BHARTI

When she visited Ayodhya to lend moral support to the volunteers, she realised how much of an impact 'her' cassette had had on the Hindu mind

As the message of hate the cassette contained made its way into every Hindu home, the media were unequivocal in condemning the sannyasin.

Bharti, for her part, insisted that the press, as usual, had got it all wrong. The voice which spewed out such inflammatory rubbish didn't belong to her. Yes, some snippets of her recent public speeches had been included in the cassette, but it was Sadhavi Rithambra, a Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) functionary, who'd held forth for the most part.

Further enquiry, however, showed that Gandhiji had written no such article and a very embarrassed BJP gave the idea a quick burial.

The VHP-BJP combine insisted on going ahead with the satyagraha though. A worried Chandra Shekhar summoned an all-party meeting, of the Congress, the Janata Dal and the communists, to discuss how best to deal with the situation. A joint appeal was issued, asking the Hindu leaders to call off their plan. But to no avail.

Finally, a compromise was worked out. The Prime Minister promised that the security forces would exercise full restraint and the VHP gave an undertaking that the satyagraha would be non-violent.

MULAYAM SINGH YADAV

He recently announced that he was ready to construct a Ram temple—a victory for the Hindu leadership—but did not specify its site

Nevertheless, on the eve of 6 December, an uneasy calm enveloped Ayodhya. Anticipating trouble, the security forces had all but taken over the town, setting up fortified barriers in the bylanes leading to the temple. According to the commissioner, Faizabad, Madhukar Gupta, 60-odd companies of the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF), the Central Industrial Security Force (CISF) and the National Security Guard (NSG) had been deployed in the district. But Vinay Katiyar, the all-India convenor of the Bajrang Dal, was unfazed by all the bandobust. "Tomorrow is the day we will crush Mulayam Singh's arrogance to little pieces," he declared, "and we'll do this in the face of lathis, bullets or arrests."

But never mind the bluster; the VHP was as keen as the administration to ensure that no trouble ensued. Identity badges were issued to all the kar sevaks assembled near the temple built in the memory of Deoraha Baba. "We don't want members of enemy political parties joining us to create trouble and then blaming us," explained one functionary.

The first group to court arrest comprised women activists from Rajasthan, including many whose relatives were killed on 30 October. They set out after an elaborate puja, cheered on by the local residents. Said Kusum, a school-teacher from Jaipur: "We will court arrest if they don't kill us on the way. This is our sacrifice for Ram and we are not afraid."

Soon, the second batch of kar sevaks, women members from Delhi, entered the vicinity of the Hanuman Garhi temple, and cries of "Bachcha bachcha Ram ka, Janmabhoomi ke kaam ka," rent the air.

Bajrang Dal volunteers sneaked into the temple area before the programme got under way, and at a signal from their leaders, chanted and shouted slogans, squatting at the feet of the guards, their breath heavily laced with bhang. The scuffle with the security forces was prolonged as the youths posed for the national and international press assembled at the site. BJP leader Uma Bharti was present to impart moral courage to the volunteers, though she declined to give them the benefit of her oratorical of 90 minutes, the tape comprising a well-edited version of her speech at a rally in Jagadri, Haryana. But since Bharti was the better-known of the two sannyasins, the cassette had been publicised as containing the BJP leader's speech, though no credits appeared on the cover.

The saffron-clad Bharti related her version to anyone who cared to listen—members of Parliament, BJP workers, friends and well-wishers—but the charge stuck. And, if insider reports were anything to go by, the sannyasin was hauled up by BJP president L.K. Advani for compromising the party in this manner. Bharti presented her defence to Advani as well, who advised her to issue an official denial. But VHP pressure ensured that Bharti and Advani maintained a discreet silence on this one, while the administration banned the cassette in Delhi.

But the tape was playing to record audiences in Ayodhya all along. And when the shorn sannyasin visited the town to lend moral support to the kar sevaks, she realised just how much of an impact her alleged speech had made on the Hindu mind.

It wasn't long before Bharti made an abrupt about-turn, accepting congratulations for her "brilliant performance" in the most gracious manner possible. And then, going on to present her admirers with a repeat at her public meetings. With rather predictable consequences: soon after her address at a rally in Ganj-Dundwara in Etah district, communal violence broke out, leaving ten dead.

To be fair to the sannyasin, however, she isn't the only one stirring up matters in this way. Along with her audio-cassette, a Dr J.K. Jain-produced video-cassette on Ayodhya is also flying off the racks. Despite the ostensible ban, both cassettes are available at various shops in Palika Bazar, a central market in New Delhi.

skills. The activists were taken through a dusty field and then packed into buses which would take them to jails all over the state or drop them off at Faizabad.

Vinay Katiyar, however, was triumphant at the end of the entire exercise. "We have performed kar seva," he announced grandly, referring to the fact that the authorities had allowed one activist at a time into the sanctum sanctorum. Katiyar insisted that those who entered the garba grtha had scraped off bits of the plaster from the mosque. "If that is not kar seva, what is?" he asked defiantly.

But such bravado notwithstanding, the VHP had all too clearly given up the idea of taking over the disputed area by force.

But even as journalists and security personnel had decided to call it a day, trouble erupted near the Hanuman Garhi chowk. Apparently, a Muslim youth slipped into the area and tried to stab a priest, Hari Ram Das. The crowd soon got in on the act and attempted to lynch the boy. But the police intervened to arrest him and whisked him away from trouble. The Hindu mob, beside itself at being prevented from meting out the most primitive form of justice, gheraoed the Ayodhya police station. Ranted a sadhu: "We will see that the Muslims pay for this. They won't get away with it."

Sure enough, by the evening, at least eight shops and five houses be-

HOW IT ALL BEGAN

FIRST ROUND

15 January, 1885: A suit is filed in the court of the sub-judge, Faizabad, by Raghubar Das, a mahant of the Janmasthan, asking permission to build a temple on the outer enclosure of the disputed structure.

24 February, 1885: The appeal is dismissed on the ground that the temple site is too close to the existing masjid. But the sub-judge agrees that the property in question belongs to the mahant.

17 March, 1886: District judge Col J.E.A. Chambier dismisses a similar appeal by Das. He also reverses the earlier decision, which had that the property belonged to the mahant.

25 March, 1886: Das appeals to the judicial commissioner of Oudh, W. Young, asking him to controvert the court order, which said that the masjid had been built by Emperor Babar.

1 November, 1886: Young dismisses the appeal.

SECOND ROUND

March 1934: Communal riots break out and Hindus damage a part of the wall surrounding the mosque and the domes. The masjid is rebuilt by the government.

1936: The commissioner of waqfs conducts an enquiry and announces that the masjid was built by Babar, a Sunni Muslim.

20 February, 1944: These findings are published in the official waqf gazette. Litigation ensues between the Shia Central Board of Waqf and the Sunni Central Board of Waqf in Faizabad.

23 March, 1946: The civil judge, S.A. Ahsan, rules that available evidence shows that the mosque was used by members of both sects.

22 December, 1949: A deity is installed inside the masjid, allegedly by some Hindus. A large crowd gathers outside to witness this miracle and attempts to break in. The lock is broken, but the police manage to keep the people out.

A stronger lock is put in and police presence is strengthened. District magistrate K.K. Nayar

MASJID/MANDIR

There is reason to hope that the worst is over as far as the Ayodhya dispute goes. And from now on, things will only get better longing to the minority community had been completely gutted. Even the security forces appeared to have been infected by the communal virus, refusing to alert the fire brigade: "We have no water. Let them burn."

Mohammad Yunus Siddiqui, the chairman of the BMAC, spoke for his entire community when he said: "The situation has turned so communal that we can no longer trust the police to protect us." In fact, of the 5,000-odd Muslims in Ayodhya, many had either fled their homes or, at least, sent their women and children away.

But given the potential for large-scale violence, it had to be admitted that the satyagraha went off better than most people had envisaged. Uma Bharti maintained that the restrained behaviour of the security forces was only due to Chandra Shekhar's "imaandari". Also, said the BJP leader, "The kar sevaks behaved in an exemplary manner. If they wanted to take to the path of violence, they would not have spared anyone after the shameful events of 30 October and 2 November. When they came here, they did not know whether they would live or die."

VINAY KATIYAR

"We have performed kar seva," he announced grandly and claimed that those who entered the garba griha had scraped off plaster from the mosque

The VHP's moderate stand did not go down too well with its activists, though. On the second day of the satyagraha, of the 2,000-odd activists expected to turn up to court arrest, only about 700 did. The rest stayed away to protest the scaling down of the agitation. Said Satya Prakash Tiwari, a kar sevak from Ferozepur refuses to remove the idols on the grounds that widespread rioting will result.

5 January, 1950: Priya Dutt Ram, chairman, municipal board, Faizabad and Ayodhya, takes charge of the property as the receiver appointed by the government.

16 January, 1950: Gopal Singh Visharad files a suit in the court of the civil judge, Faizabad, for entitlement to offer prayers at the shrines installed in the structure. An interim injunction is granted.

The district magistrate, Faizabad, asks for a modification of the order because if unrestricted puja is allowed it will amount to only one party exercising its rights.

24 April, 1950: The Uttar Pradesh government deposes before the civil court, Faizabad, to the effect that the disputed structure is a masjid and the idols were "wrongly put inside".

The issue of ownership of the property is, however, sub judice to this day.

THIRD ROUND

18 December, 1985: Vishwa Hindu Parishad leaders ask the district magistrate, Faizabad, to remove the locks outside the structure as this does not have legal sanction and seek darshan.

26 January, 1986: Umesh Chandra Pandey, an Ayodhya lawyer, moves an application before the sardar munsif asking that restrictions on puja be removed.

28 January, 1986: The munsif refuses to pass the order.

31 January, 1986: Pandey files a similar appeal before the district judge, Faizabad.

1 February, 1986: The judge, K.M. Pandey, allows the appeal and issues an order to the effect that the locks be opened and no restrictions placed on the performance of puja.

Within 40 minutes of the judgement, the locks are opened by the city magistrate.

From then on, the controversy has escalated with every passing year until the flashpoint was finally reached on 30 October, 1990, with the storming of the mosque by the VHP's kar sevaks.

SADHU SAMAJ

Represented by the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagna Samiti, it is not keen on maintaining a militant stand now that there is no doubt about temple construction district. "My brother was killed on 2 November. The wounds inflicted on us by Mulayam Singh Yadav are still sore and festering. We have come to break the shrine, not offer satyagraha." The VHP hurriedly rounded up some others to save face, but the rift in the ranks was all too evident by then.

Differences between the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagna Samiti, represented by the mahants and sants of Ayodhya, and the VHP also deepened. The president of the Samiti, Mahant Avaidyanath, and its vice-president, Nritya Gopal Das, had been feeling for a while that the reins of the movement has passed out of their hands, with the VHP and the Bajrang Dal taking over, in the persons of Ashok Singhal and Vinay Katiyar. The religious leaders had been kept out of the 1 and 4 December deliberations, further increasing their suspicions of the VHP.

It was in this context that the meetings between the members of the Samiti, including Mahant Avaidyanath and Nritya Gopal Das, and the Prime Minister on the evening of 3 December assumed importance. Said Avaidyanath: "I told him (Chandra Shekhar) that things had gone too far to suspend our agitation altogether. But I assured him that our movement would be peaceful...we are giving him time to find a solution." Nritya Gopal Das agreed: "Those who are angry can go to Kashmir and Punjab to express their sentiments. We are not responsible for any show of violence here. If our activists keep doing this sort of thing, they will provoke action from the police. And if they keep getting killed, we will lose popular support."

The arrival of controversial godman Chandra Swami only served to further spoil relations between the Samiti and the VHP. While Vinay Katiyar told SUNDAY, "See how these celebrities are descending on Ayodhya after the success of our movement," such mahants as Ram Chander Das Paramhans took the Swami around, sitting by his side while he addressed assembled journalists.

Denying that he was in Ayodhya as Shekhar's emissary, Chandra Swami admitted, however, that he'd go back and report to the PM once his visit was over. For his part, said the godman, he was convinced that a temple should be built over the site of the garba griha after the mosque had been demolished.

Such militancy translated itself into attacks on Muslims on Ayodhya's streets. The most heinous of these took place when a Muslim youth was dragged into Maniram Chhaoni, a temple owned by Nritya Gopal Das, and set ablaze after being doused in kerosene. The VHP spokesman, however, insisted that the charred body discovered in the streets belonged to a sadhu who'd immolated himself.

Unfortunately, there weren't many takers for this version.

Despite such incidents and the communal violence in Aligarh and Hyderabad, the government remained hopeful about an amicable solution to the mandir/masjid issue. Sources in the administration had it that the VHP wasn't backtracking of its own accord, but on instructions from the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). Said a senior functionary: "The RSS are fascists all right. But fascism is only

THE ALL-PARTY MEET

The PM promised that the security forces would exercise restraint and VHP gave its word that the satyagraha would be non-violent another word for militant nationalism. The Sangh may want to arouse Hindu ire, but they will never stand for the unity and integrity of the country being threatened."

According to this version, the RSS hadn't counted on the situation deteriorating so much that the Indian nation itself was threatened with disintegration. And when it was presented with such an eventuality, the Sangh leadership decided to scale down the movement so that some sort of a compromise could be worked out with the minority community.

The sadhu samaj, represented by the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagna Samiti, also wasn't too keen on maintaining a militant stand. The agitation for the Ram Janmabhoomi had ensured that there wasn't any doubt about the temple construction any longer. The Shekhar government, the Congress(I) and even Mulayam Singh Yadav were agreed that a mandir had to be put up; only the actual site was in dispute. And the mandir was all that the mahants of Ayodhya wanted. It didn't make the slightest difference to them whether the VHP constructed it or the Union government.

That's where Chandra Swami came in. The godman had evidently been assigned the task of presenting the government's case to the sadhus and mahants of Ayodhya and weaning them away from the VHP. And if the presence of Paramhans in the Swami's vicinity was anything to go by, he had achieved a tangible measure of success in that endeavour.

Left to itself the VHP would have persisted with its militant stand, but faced with isolation (both the RSS and the sadhu samaj wanted to tone down their stand), it had little option but to fall in line. Also, a section of the organisation was only too aware that if its kar sevaks continued to be killed in police firing and communal violence, it was bound to lose the support of the Hindu masses.

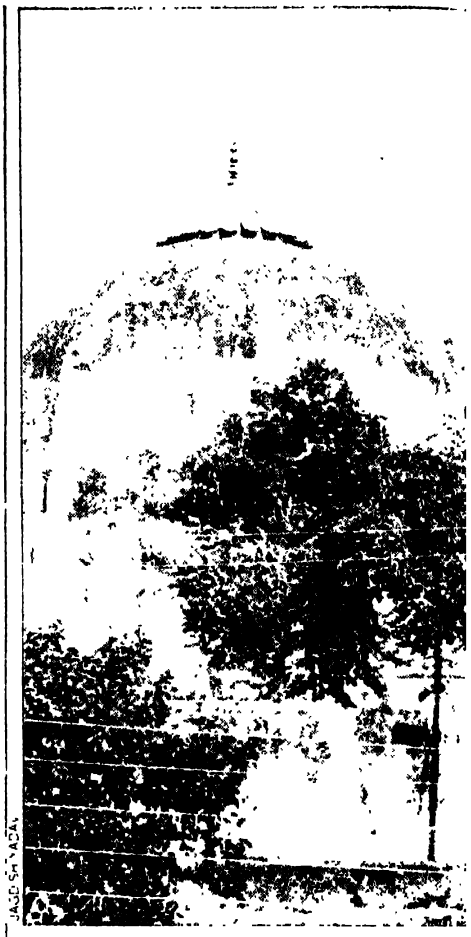
It was only the BJP which stood to gain if the agitation continued to generate white heat. For, a Hindu wave translated into votes for the party and if the movement for the temple dragged on till the next polls, the BJP was bound to benefit tremendously. If, on the other hand, the dispute was resolved amicably and a temple constructed for the Hindus, the party, which depended on a one-point programme (the building of the Ram mandir), would lose its raison d'etre.

THE MUSLIM LEADERSHIP

It has softened its stand perceptibly in the face of Hindu intransigence. The Muslims, say some, have been shaken by the show of Hindu power

To make matters worse for the BJP, the Muslim leadership too softened its stand perceptibly in the face of Hindu intransigence, maintaining that if archaeological evidence proved that the Babri Masjid had been built on a temple, the minority community would give up its claims to the structure. The Muslims, went one argument, had been shaken by the show of Hindu power and were looking for a honourable way out. And this was as good an escape route as any.

It will take months and every bit of the Prime Minister's much-acclaimed skill at working out a compromise, however, before the tangled web woven over years can be unravelled. But given the circumstances, the government initiative was the best Shekhar could have done.



At the very least, it signalled a beginning of the end to the mandir/masjid issue. And as hectic negotiations continued behind closed doors, one could only hope that the solution wouldn't leave too many people unhappy.

Not even the best optimist expected anything more than that. ●

MANDIR OR MASJID?

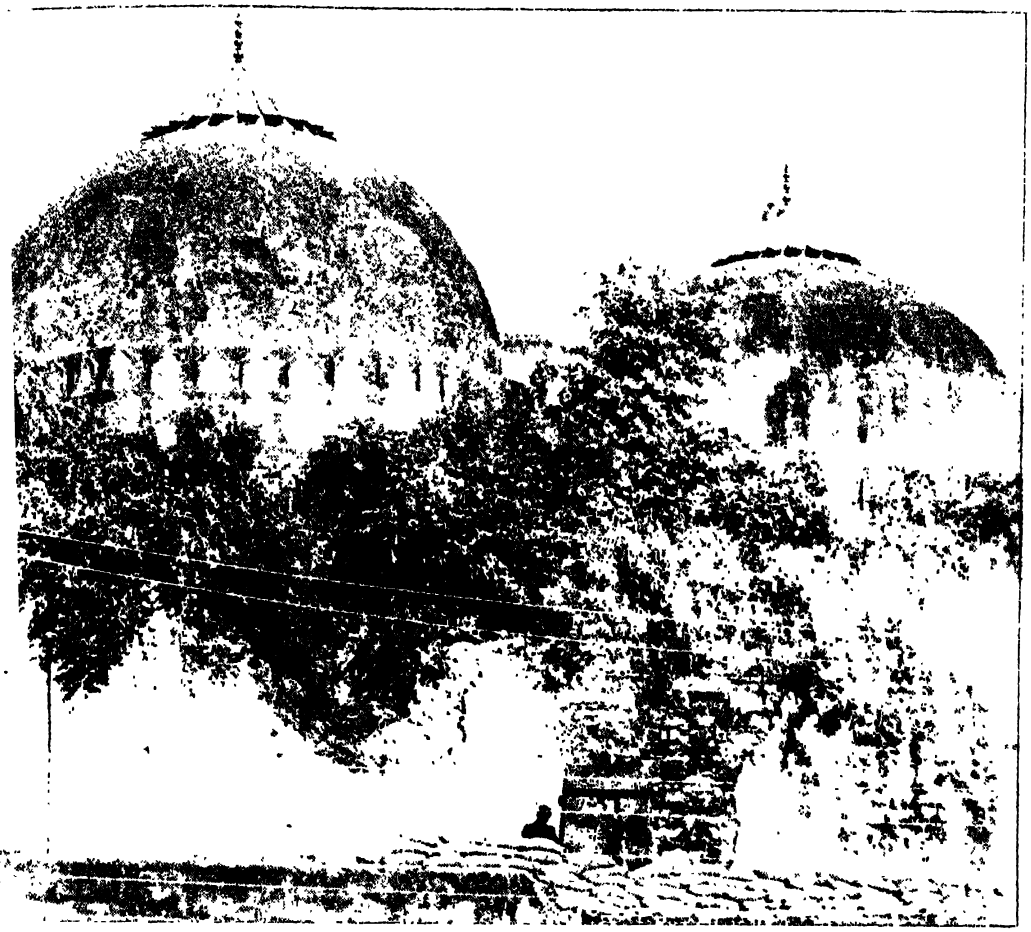
Historians and archaeologists can't seem to make up their minds

Temple or mosque? As the question became the centre-point around which national politics revolved, historians and archaeologists were called in to decide the issue to everyone's satisfaction. And with Muslim leaders maintaining that they would give up their claims to the disputed structure if it was conclusively proved that it had been a Ram temple, the focus of the debate shifted from the political to the historical aspect.

But it was S.P. Gupta's assertion which stirred up matters. The former director of the Allahabad museum published the findings of the team which he'd been a part of—headed by the former director-general of the Archaeological Survey of India (ASI), B.B. Lal, which had conducted excavations at the site during 1975-80. Gupta maintained that the team had come to the conclusion that the Babri Masjid had been built atop a Ram temple.

Apparently, regular excavations at the site revealed a series of square pillar bases of burnt brick and two floors separated by a thick layer of debris. The team, comprising scholars, historians and archaeologists, collected pieces of Islamic glazed ware with a white base and blue floral paintings, which can be securely dated as being in use until the 15th century.

On the basis of such evidence, Gupta arrived at the following conclusions:



- A pillared structure was built at the site in the 11th century.
- The floor of the structure was laid twice.
- The structure existed until the 15th century, going by the existence of the Islamic glazed ware.
- Schistose, the blackstone of which the pillars are made, was used to carve "hundreds" of temple images in the past.
- The carvings on the pillars are primarily Hindu: floral designs of garlands, the lotus, and such semi-divine images as that of yakshas, devkanyas (nymphs), a dvarpal (doorkeeper) with a trishul (trident) in one hand, the purna ghata (sacred water vessel), etc.
- These carvings are in the late Pratihar or Gahadval style, "exclusively recorded in temple architecture", establishing that the temple was built in the 11th century.
- At least four central pillars existing in the masjid show identical carvings.
- There are several large rectangular stone pieces in the wall of the mosque, otherwise built of lime and mortar, proving that the debris of the temple was used to build the masjid.
- Two Persian inscriptions inside the masjid say that it was built by Mir Baqi, on the orders of Babar in Hijra 935, ie 1528 AD.

A reading of the Babarnama proves that the Mughal emperor camped at the confluence of the Saryu and Sidra rivers around this period. So, it is likely that Babar may have had a Ram temple demolished and built a mosque in its place.

This conclusion, backed by such archaeologists as K.V. Sundarajan of the ASI, was hotly contested by several other historians. Said Harbans Mukhia of the Jawaharlal Nehru University: "This is a gross misconstruction of a completely false argument." According to Mukhia and such scholars as Dr Romila Thapar, K.N. Pannikkar and Sarvapalli Gopal, brick pillar bases do not in themselves indicate the presence of a temple. They could just as easily have held up "a brick structure with arches which may have been a hall adjoining the mosque".

The historians, in a joint statement, also shot down the suggestion that the carvings on the site were exclusive to temple architecture. According to Mukhia, the carvings were equally characteristic of the secular derivative Pala art, the Shaivite range of carvings and Buddhist architecture. "Gupta wants to club these together as representing just one art form," he says.

It is far more likely, say scholars, that the structure that existed on the site was Buddhist. The Chinese scholar Hiuen Tsang had recorded that Ayodhya was a major pilgrimage centre for Buddhists with several monasteries and stupas in existence. And in

The Babri Masjid was built atop a Ram temple, says a team of archaeologists which conducted excavations at the disputed site. No, say other scholars, the structure that existed was Buddhist

1860, a British observer named Carnegie wrote of the columns of the Babri Masjid: "These are of strong, close-grained, dark slate-coloured or black stone called by the natives kasoti and carved with different devices. To my thinking, they strongly resemble Buddhist pillars that I have seen in Banaras and elsewhere."

Gyanendra Pande of Delhi University agrees: "It is likely that the site was a Buddhist one as the entire Uttar Pradesh area was Buddhist."

Archaeological evidence being open to varying interpretations, the answer to the question 'mandir or masjid?' has of necessity become a matter of faith rather than historical evidence. To confuse matters further, while Valmiki's Ramayan describes Ayodhya as a major urban centre, archaeological findings point to a very rudimentary civilisation at the site, which doesn't extend beyond the 7th century BC. The son of Dashrath, however, is supposed to have been born in the tretayug, thousands of years before kalyug, which began in 3102 BC. Asks Mukhia: "So, how do you fit in our Lord Ram?"

Also, Ram became a major deity only around the 13th and 14th centuries AD, with the rise of the Ramanandi sect. And, since there wasn't any evidence of a Ram temple before that, it is extremely unlikely that it was pulled down to make way for the Babri Masjid. Anyway, argues Gyanendra Pande, to identify events which date back 7,000-8,000 years is ludicrous: "Georgraphy, like history, functions here as a metaphor. Reducing this geography to actual sites only makes nonsense of it."

While historians agree that Babar visited Ayodhya, they deny the possibility of his having demolished a Ram tempie. Says Mukhia: "If he had destroyed a temple of such high order, he was bound to have made a hyperbolic statement about it in his memoirs. But he doesn't refer to it at all, though he does mention visiting Ayodhya." Besides, none of the 50-odd medieval historians whose works survive mentions the destruction of a temple around this time.

Even Tulsidas, who wrote the Ramcharitamanas in the 16th century, has not referred to the episode, which should have occurred during his lifetime. Asks Mukhia: "What kind of strange logic dictates that you destroy a temple of this order and then keep absolutely silent about it?"

In fact, the first reference to the fact that the Babri Masjid stands on Ram's birthplace comes in 1822 in a court affidavit in Faizabad. A minor Muslim official has noted: "The Babri Masjid stands at the place of Ram's birth, who was the son of Dashrath...this is adjacent to the kitchen of Sita, who was the wife of Ram."

But to prove this point, one way or the other, says a senior official of the human resource development ministry, "We will have to dig up the Babri Masjid. What we have now is only tangential evidence."

And in the absence of any conclusive evidence, the arguments are likely to continue, marked by acrimony and increased fundamentalism. •

Role reversal

Now it's V.P. Singh who wants Sanjay Singh prosecuted

Politics is a funny business. In 1987, when the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) arrested Sanjay Singh for the murder of badminton player Syed Modi, it was Vishwanath Pratap Singh who cried 'victimisation'. By 1990, when the time came to frame charges, CBI officials claimed that the Raja's government was not keen on pursuing the case. And when sessions judge O.P. Pradhan decided three months ago that there was no evidence to link Sanjay Singh to the murder, many wondered if the changed political climate had dampened the prosecution's enthusiasm. This charge was denied by Ram Jethmalani, Sanjay's lawyer, and V.P. Singh seemed set to induct him into the Cabinet.

But now as 1990 draws to a close, nearly everything has changed. Sanjay Singh has forsaken both the Raja and Ram Jethmalani and crossed over to Chandra Shekhar's side. He has got his ministership but the government he is part of owes its very existence to the same Congress(I) that was once accused of victimising him.

And the final irony is that it is now V.P. Singh who wants the case against him re-opened and is accusing the government of hushing the matter up to obstruct justice!

The final irony is that it is now V.P. Singh who wants the case against Sanjay Singh re-opened and is accusing the government of hushing the matter up to obstruct justice

The Syed Modi case is back in the news because the CBI has three months to appeal against Pradhan's order and that period expires on 14 December, 1990 (before this issue of SUNDAY appears, but after we go to press). The V.P. Singh regime took no decisions for two months and it was widely assumed that there would be no appeal.

Then, Sanjay Singh switched sides, V.P. Singh fell, Shekhar took over and Sanjay became communications minister. The CBI forwarded the file to the new government. The Prime Minister, in turn, sent it to the law ministry. Attorney General Soli Sorabjee, a V.P. Singh appointee, had not been asked for his opinion by the Raja but if he was surprised to be consulted by Shekhar, he did not show it. Instead, he returned the file with the recommendation that the government appeal against Pradhan's order.

This recommendation was leaked to the press, giving rise to speculation that Sanjay Singh would be asked to resign till the appeal was heard.

In fact, the position is considerably more complicated. For a start, Sorabjee had already submitted his resignation when the file was given to him. He called Dr P. Rao, the law secretary, and asked whether it would be proper for him to give advice in the matter.

"It was only when the law secretary got back to me and told me that the government was keen to have my opinion," says Sorabjee, "that I examined the order of discharge of Sanjay Singh. I examined the case and on the 26th of November replied that it was fit for the government to go in appeal."

But is the government bound to accept the outgoing Attorney General's advice? That is far from clear and the case has now been referred to G. Ramaswamy, Sorabjee's successor.

Even if Ramaswamy accepts his predecessor's recommendation, it does not follow that Sanjay Singh will necessarily resign. His supporters in government argue that as long as there is no court verdict against him—and a significant decision in his favour—it is not incumbent on him to resign. He can continue as communications minister while the case is being heard.

Singh's friends offer precedents: A.R. Antulay, who remained chief minister while the cement case was being heard and Arjun Singh, who did not resign though a petition in the Churhat Lottery case was being heard.

The trouble with the precedents is that these were all private prosecutions. It is extremely unusual for a man to be a minister of the same government that is trying him for conspiracy to murder.

As far as V.P. Singh and his supporters are concerned, the Sanjay Singh issue is an acid test for Chandra Shekhar. Will he simply ignore Sorabjee's recommendation and let the 90-day deadline elapse? Will he decide to okay the appeal and let Singh continue as a minister despite that?

The Congress(I) is at least as interested. Nobody at 10 Janpath has forgiven Sanjay Singh for his infamous remark after one of Modi's alleged murderers implicated him in his confession: "Give me Rajiv Gandhi for two hours and I will make him confess to Indira Gandhi's assassination."

There is also pressure from the likes of Satish Sharma, who has been charged with complicity in the election-day shooting of Sanjay Singh last year. Sanjay has met Sharma and other friends of Rajiv Gandhi's to persuade them to let bygones be bygones but nobody is in a forgiving mood.

For all this, the Congress has made no official statement on the affair. When Rajiv Gandhi failed to turn up for the swearing-in of Shekhar's Cabinet, Congress spokesman V N. Gadgil denied that this had anything to do with Sanjay Singh's inclusion in the ministry. But Gadgil concedes that the Congress was not in favour of Singh's appointment.

All of this leaves Sanjay with few friends. Within the Chandra Shekhar camp, he is regarded as an opportunist and interloper and has no real power base there (though he is friendly with Kamal Morarka and Jayant Malhoutra). He was brought to the Janata Dal (S) by Mulayam Singh Yadav but it is by no means clear that Yadav—who has only recently made up with Singh—will stand by him in this crisis.

Singh's best hope lies in Chandra Shekhar's own stubborness. The Prime Minister has a reputation for standing by his men even when they are accused of crime (ie. Suraj Deo Singh and Chandra Swami) and is unlikely to throw Sanjay to the wolves now.

Already, the Prime Minister's men are saying that they will stand by Sanjay Singh despite the pressure from the Congress(I). And should V.P. Singh's supporters attempt to raise the issue during the forthcoming parliamentary session then they will ask why the Raja did nothing for two months after the sessions court judgement. If the matter was so pressing, then surely he could have asked the CBI to appeal.

For his part, Sanjay Singh is keeping his mouth shut. He is busy with telecommunications affairs at Sanchar Bhavan and refuses to comment on the case on which his political career depends. "I want no favours or political protection," he told SUNDAY, adding, "I want everything to be settled through the normal legal procedure." ●

The evidence against Sanjay Singh

Just telephone calls

The way Sanjay Singh and his lawyers tell it, the CBI's case consisted of trying to prove that Singh was having an affair with Ameeta Modi. This, they say, is not evidence of murder. A jealous husband might kill his wife's lover. But why should the lover kill the husband?

The CBI does not agree. It maintains that it has enough evidence to substantiate its charge of murder. The sessions court in Lucknow ruled that there was enough evidence to charge Akhilesh Singh, a mafia-type, with the murder. The CBI claims that Akhilesh had no motive but there is proof that he was acting at Sanjay's behest.

Syed Modi: victim of a conspiracy?

Much of the evidence consists of telephone records. On both 16 and 17 July, 1987, Sanjay Singh booked calls, first to Ameeta Modi in Bombay and then to Akhilesh Singh in Rae Bareli. On the 18th, he called Ameeta again just before she left for Lucknow. Then, Akhilesh arrived in Lucknow and Singh left town.

According to the CBI, the killing was scheduled for the 22nd but the hit-men lost their nerve. On 25 July, Singh booked four calls to Akhilesh to find out what had gone wrong. (None of the calls matured.)

On the 27th, Modi was to leave for Delhi to accept the Arjuna Award but according to the CBI, Ameeta feigned sickness, got herself admitted to hospital and made him cancel the trip. Consequently, he was able to attend badminton practice on the 28th, and she had an excuse for not accompanying him.

As he came out of the stadium, he was shot dead.

Ershad had hoped that the military would bail him out. But he was mistaken

PAVEL RAHMAN

THE CRACKDOWN

Fall of a dictator

A popular movement ousts Bangladesh's President H.M.Ershad

Dictators never step down gracefully. They have to be pushed out. And that is exactly the way the Bangladeshis got rid of their country's longest surviving dictator, President (ex-General) Hussain Mohammed Ershad. On 6 December, Ershad, who till the last moment had been desperately trying to buy time, finally quit after countrywide protests and the admonitory stance of key foreign allies made it more than clear that his continuance would spell disaster.

Ershad stepped down, lifted the state of Emergency he had clamped down on the country, and announced that the Chief Justice of the Bangladesh High Court, Shahabuddin Ahmed, would look after the government till elections were held. Ahmed was duly sworn in as vice-president and acting head of state, while Ershad and his cronies slipped away to the security of their palatial residences.

It was also announced that parliamentary elections would be held within 90 days. The Opposition was delighted. They had got everything they wanted. Ershad had stepped down; so had the previous vice-president Mouded Ahmed; and the Opposition's choice for vice-president, Chief Justice Ahmed, had got the top job as the head of a neutral caretaker government. The pro-democracy wave sweeping across the world had certainly not left Bangladesh untouched.

Although in the end everything went like clockwork for the Opposition, things had looked very grim initially. Ershad had, in the beginning, shown no inclination to concede the Opposition demands. He had been in power for nine long years and it seemed a little silly to expect him to step down without a fuss. What he had not counted on this time was the determination of almost every section of Bangladeshis. Virtually everyone wanted him out.

On 10 October this year, when the latest round of anti-Ershad protests shook the country, Ershad perhaps believed that the army will once again bail him out. Pitted against him were three Opposition groups: the 8-party alliance led by Sheikh Hasina Wajed's Awami League; the 7-party combine dominated by Begum Khaleda Zia's Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP); and the 5-party grouping called the Shramik-Krishak Samajbadi Dal. This time, the powerful fundamentalist organisation, the Jamaat-e-Islam, too had called for Ershad's ouster. But the alliances had many problems amongst themselves and were not above bickerings and mudslinging.

Ershad perhaps hoped that a combination of military force and subtle machinations would see him through. But the agitation that began on 10 October this year was unlike anything the country had seen for a long time. Work stoppages, road blocks, rallies and rampaging by violent mobs paralysed the country. For once, the masses seemed invincible and unstoppable.

Ershad reacted by condemning the violence and pointing out how much harm the agitation was doing to the country. He said that in the first six days of the agitation alone, the country had suffered a loss of at least 50 million US dollars. He then tried to wean the students away from the agitation by releasing one of their key leaders. The move, however, backfired. For, the student leader, who had been released, tried to take control of Dhaka University by force. Together with a few armed men, this student ended up killing one student and one doctor of Dhaka Medical College. This incident only fuelled the agitation further.

Before this, the ex-President had

What Ershad had not counted on was the determination of the Bangladeshis. Virtually everyone wanted him out tried another trick. On 19 November, at a public meeting held at the Tongi industrial district, he said that a neighbouring country that did not like his policies was instigating the Opposition with a view to undermine the independence and sovereignty of Bangladesh. To make sure that nobody misunderstood him, Ershad went on to say, "This neighbouring country did not like our decision to send troops to Saudi Arabia following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.." He added that the present trend of anarchy and destructiveness introduced by the Opposition parties had begun only after Bangladesh had decided to send troops to the Gulf.

FREEDOM AT LAST

The message was clear. Only India had criticised the decision of Bangladesh and Pakistan to send troops to Saudi Arabia. India, therefore, was the dastardly enemy, manipulating the Opposition parties in Bangladesh with the aim of controlling that country's decision-making process.

Ershad had gone too far. The first to react was India. An Indian external affairs ministry spokesman declared that if Ershad had meant India was behind the agitation, then the Indian authorities would be compelled to take a 'strong attitude' towards Bangladesh. The attempt to link India with Bangladesh's internal problems, the spokesman added, would only strain relations between the two countries

Other allies of Bangladesh too were not amused at what was happening But the worst was yet to come. Their attitude got really tough after a desperate Ershad announced a state of Emergency in the country on 27 November. On that day, Awami League chief Sheikh Hasina Wajed and former foreign minister in the Awami League government, Dr Kamal Hossain, were placed under house arrest.

That night, Ershad made an unscheduled statement over the country's state-controlled television and radio networks, announcing the imposition of Emergency. He said that such a step was necessary to preserve national security and to save the economy

H.M. ERSHAD

It was a strange exit by a man who was in power for nine years. But Ershad never had any pretensions about his unpopularity from the current wave of violent, destructive politics. Under the Emergency, Ershad banned all indoor and outdoor political activities, suspended civil rights, imposed controls on all means of communication and imposed curfew in the capital Dhaka, and also in Chittagong, Khulna and Rajshahi. All educational institutions were declared closed for a month.

If Ershad had thought that a no-nonsense approach would draw the sting out of the current agitation, he was sadly mistaken. All doctors in the country had stopped work and they said that no patient would be treated until Ershad resigned Teachers of several universities expressed solidarity with the movement by resigning en masse. And all over the country, Opposition leaders, workers, students and professionals took to the street in open defiance of the Emergency and the curfew orders. Pushed to a corner, the government-controlled security forces and the army opened fire on uncontrollable mobs at several places, leaving over 100 people dead and several hundred injured.

Foreign observers, especially the generous allies of the Bangladesh government,were appalled. A United States state department spokesman, Richard Boucher, declared that the imposition of Emergency in Bangladesh would not solve anything and warned Americans not to travel to that country. The American response signalled the beginning of the end for Ershad.

Japan, which is the biggest aid donor to Bangladesh, on 1 December expressed its concern at the growing violence which by that time had engulfed almost the entire country. The government of Japan, just like the Americans, felt that the Emergency was no solution and that normal constitutional processes needed to be restored immediately.

In a last, desperate bid to buy time and perhaps wriggle out of the prevailing blind alley, Ershad announced on 4 December that he was prepared to step down. But there was a catch. He would step down only 15 days before the national elections and only at that time would he hand over power to a neutral caretaker vice-president. The Emergency, he said would be lifted on 16 December - the Bangladesh Independence day - but the existing Parliament, which the Opposition claimed to be a fraud, would continue till the appointment of a new vice-president.

Realising that the Opposition would not exactly howl in delight over this announcement, Ershad offered several sops. He said that the press censorship in force would be lifted with immediate effect, that the state-owned media would give adequate coverage to the Opposition, that the election commission would be reconstituted in consultation with all Opposition parties, and that the Opposition would be invited to discussions. He ended his speech by disclosing that the former US President, Jimmy Carter, had agreed to act as observer in the Bangladesh elections.

But this was clearly an attempt to buy time. For, Ershad wanted the parliamentary polls to be held only on March next year and the presidential poll sometime between mid-May and mid-October 1991. This clearly was not acceptable. Sheikh Hasina Wajed reacted by saying that Ershad's proposals were highly ambiguous and did not reflect the people's aspiration. "Our demand is his immediate resignation," she said.

THE OPPOSITION

Sheikh Hasina (left) and Begum Khaleda (right) finally proved too much for Ershad. And he stepped down

In short, the proposal satisfied nobody. The press did not return to work, the Opposition leadership did not let up on their attacks on the government and the people on the streets refused to withdraw their agitation. Ershad's time was up. Finally, just when people were digging for a long, bitter campaign, Ershad suddenly decided to quit. On 6 December, he appointed Chief Justice Shahabuddin Ahmed vice-president, and handed in his resignation and disappeared. Nobody quite knows where he has gone. A strange, abrupt exit by a man who has held absolute power for nine years. But then not so strange considering that Ershad is no fool. He might have ruled for almost a decade but clearly he had never had any pretensions about being Bangladesh's most popular person.●

Harvard University initiates a debt for education programme

Students and scholars from India with a yen for being at Harvard University can look forward to the possibility of greater funding to fulfil this aspiration. In a proposal submitted to the finance ministry last month, Harvard has suggested a permanent fund to finance Indian students to this prestigious university.

Harvard's proposal to India follows its recent success in a "debt-for-education" swap with Ecuador. Harvard bought $5 million worth of Ecuador's foreign debt on the secondary debt market for $750,000—foreign banks sell the near-useless Ecuadoran government IOUs at a markdown—and then donated this debt back to the Ecuadoran government in exchange for $2.5 million in Ecuadoran domestic bonds that will be used to fund Ecuadoran students to Harvard. Finalised in July, the deal is one of the rare positive notes in the history of Third World debt. Ecuador reduces its foreign debt by $5 million, while more than 70 Ecuadoran students will receive full or partial fellowships to Harvard over the next decade. The debt-swap sets up a permanent core fund that will yield roughly $150,000 per year in perpetuity.

A similar debt-swap is unlikely for India, given the country's strong-standing in the international financial markets. Indian debt is traded at roughly 98 cents to the dollar, only two cents off the face value, while Ecuadoran debt is sold at 15 cents to the dollar. But another possibility, according to Nancy Pyle of the Harvard Institute for International Development, is that a foreign bank donates a portion of the debt owed by India to set up a fund to finance Indian students. Pyle says Harvard has made several alternative suggestions to the Indian government. "We are proceeding from the assumption that the Ecuadoran model is not relevant to India's case," says Pyle. "But we're using that success as an excuse to enter into a conversation with the Indian government about the issue and to see whether there are other financial mechanisms or opportunities that we might explore together." Pyle says she is unable to discuss other financing suggestions made in the Harvard proposal as the university has not yet had discussions with the Indian government.

A clause that would require Indian students who use these funds to guarantee that they will return to India after their course of study, is likely to make the Harvard proposal particularly attractive to the Indian government, given the growing concern that India is losing its most-educated students to the US. Students who stay on in the US after their course of study will have to pay back to the fund the amount given to them, says Pyle.

The Harvard proposal comes at a time when US educators have increasingly begun to emphasise the importance of foreign study and diversity in US schools and colleges. Several other universities are currently negotiating debt-for-education agreements similar to the Harvard-Ecuador one, primarily with debt-affected Latin American and African countries. "There is a growing interest at US universities to internationalise them and get a two-way flow of scholars," says Margaret Fahs, director of the Debt for Development Coalition in Washington D.C. Funds have always been the primary constraint, says Fahs, and the debt-education swaps are a way "to greatly leverage limited resources and in a minor way to do something about a very negative situation".

Pyle at Harvard says that the university's proposal came after 22 Indian students accepted by Harvard last year could not join because they lacked funds. Harvard wants to see a fund established, large enough to finance roughly this number of applicants. "Harvard simply does not have enough within its own coffers to go around, so we must find other means of financing students," says Pyle. Harvard's proposed fund would be used for Indian students from less-affluent backgrounds, says Pyle. Currently, Indian students at Harvard either pay their way or receive funding from graduate departments of the university. Harvard was unable to provide exact figures because the graduate departments function independently of the main undergraduate Harvard-Radcliffe college.

As with all good things, there is likely to be a long period of anticipation before the Harvard proposal becomes a reality for students in India. The agreement with Ecuador took three years of negotiating, discussions and meetings. But Harvard, for all its bookish otherworldliness, has a curious ability to get things done. The pen mightier than the sword? •

THEY DESERVE BETTER

No, India deserves better.

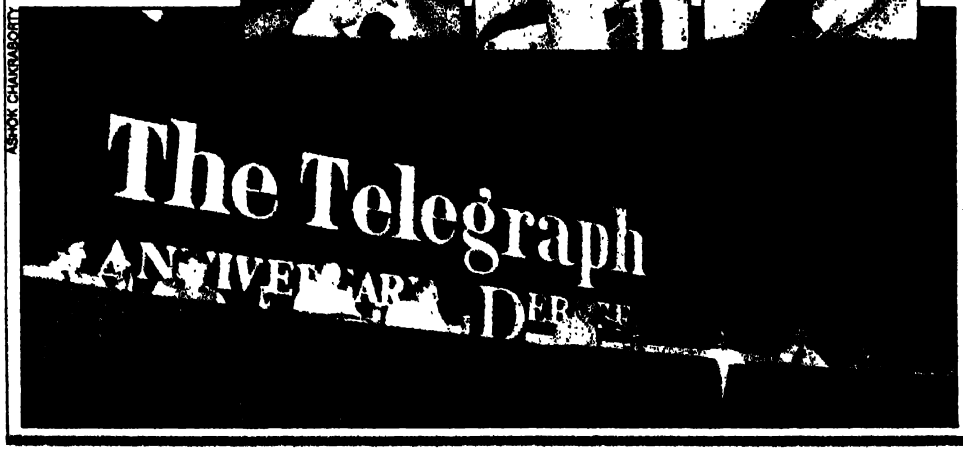
That was the conclusion reached after two hours of cut and thrust at the annual Telegraph debate on the motion: India has the politicians it deserves.

But not before the galaxy of celebrity speakers: film star Amitabh Bachchan, former civil aviation minister Arif Mohammad Khan, principal aide to Rajiv Gandhi and SUNDAY columnist Mani Shankar Aiyar, former external affairs minister Inder Kumar Gujral, The Times Of India editor Dileep Padgaonkar, BJP MP Jaswant Singh, Congress(I) MP Jayanthi Natarajan and Insaaf party chief Syed Shahabuddin had held the crowd at the Netaji Indoor Stadium in Calcutta enthralled, with moderator Justice Umesh Chandra Banerjee ensuring that things didn't get too out of hand.

The irrepressible Mani Shankar Aiyar, however, managed to have his say, attacking all his rivals at the debate (and some who were on his side as well!) and in national politics. Justice Banerjee cautioned Aiyar for his personal attacks against Jaswant Singh, but only after the event.

Mani's vitriolic speech, though, did have Arif Mohammad Khan observing a trifle plaintively that this was the first time he'd seen a speaker attacking those on his side of the floor!

While Gujral and Padgaonkar preferred a slightly low-key approach, relying on cogent arguments instead, Syed Shahabuddin was at his fiery best. "We are bad, but you are equally bad," he informed the audience, which came in for some flak from Jaswant Singh as well: "You want democracy, but you don't want to pay for it." Jayanthi Natarajan, however, directed her attack at the press, which, she said, was more interested in her clothes and love life than her statements on India's nuclear policy.



But it was the last speaker who stole the show. Amitabh Bachchan had only to say "Mr Chairman" in that famous baritone for the audience to break into spontaneous applause. And by the time he was through with relating the story of his ill-fated foray into politics, he had them eating out of his hands.

And even if he hadn't been—as he claimed—as good a politician as the country deserved, nobody was complaining.

What do former President of India, Giani Zail Singh and Uttar Pradesh chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav have in common?

They're both simple, unassuming sorts on the surface and scheming politicians beneath the homespun khadi. True.

But you've missed something: their anti-English bias.

Yes, even the venerable Giani shares Mulayam Singh's prejudices against the language the British left behind. And in a gesture of solidarity with the anti-English brigade, the former President took time off to join those agitating outside the Union Public Service Commission (UPSC) office on Shah Jahan Road, for the abolition of the English language test, which forms part of all examinations conducted by the body.

It's unlikely that the UPSC will take much note of the Giani's dharna. But it's as good a stunt as any to keep in the news.

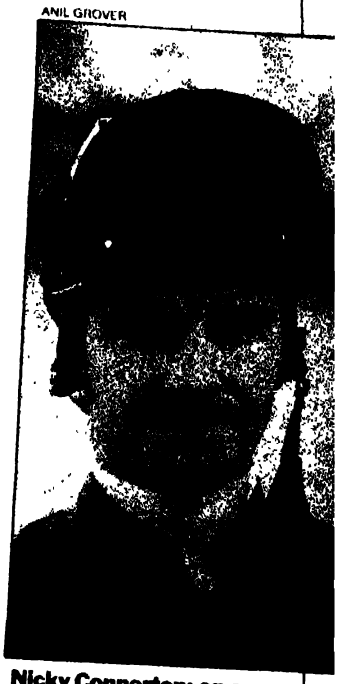
BOY WONDER

He doesn't know how to title his works. But six-year-old S. Rajesh has managed to paint over 500 pieces, some of which were on display at a one-boy exhibition held at Venkatappa Art Gallery in Bangalore recently.

Rajesh's canvases hung low so that children could view them just as easily, drew praise from laymen and critics alike. While some labelled Rajesh's "world vision" spontaneous, vibrant, dynamic and enlightening, others said that his paintings offered a look at "contemporary events through the eyes of a child".

According to the child prodigy's father, J.M.S. Mani, himself an art teacher: "Rajesh started painting when he was four. All I did was supply materials. Other than that he does everything on his own."



And does it well, too, for his canvases sell for anything between Rs 1000-4000.

Rajesh, however, is unaffected by all this success, preferring to watch the world from behind his mother's pallav. And it's only a bar of chocolate which can lure him out of his favourite hiding place.

RIDE TO WIN

For Nicky Connorton, it was a memorable first day at the Royal Calcutta Turf Club this racing season. The English jockey ended the day with a brilliant hattrick, winning on Kabuki, Sentouki and Hokaido.

But of the three triumphs, the one on Kabuki was the most significant. For, with that Connorton won the first classic race of the season in the city: the Cruickshank Calcutta 1000 Guineas.

Connorton seems to be making a habit of this: he'd won the 1000 Guineas last year as well riding Wind Song in a hard-run race.

And, no doubt, he's looking forward to repeating the feat next year. ●

Lakshadweep islanders develop tourist phobia. But the government has other plans

Even if Rajiv Gandhi had not spent a few idyllic days there in 1987, the Lakshadweep islands would have emerged as prime tourism real estate. Sooner or later.

Thirty-six unspoilt coral islands an hour's flying time west of Cochin. Swaying palms, brilliant white sand beaches, and a calm sea that could tell the spectrum a thing or two about blues and greens. Ideal for snorkelling, wind-surfing and sailing. By any reckoning, a tourism heaven.

And over past three years, increasing numbers of foreign and well-heeled Indian tourists have made the pilgrimage, many paying as much as Rs 3,000 a day for the pleasure.

Only, the islanders would opt for tourism later—or never.

Says C.N. Kunjibee, secretary of Mahila Sangham, the women's welfare group in the archipelago: "All these years, the people of the islands have been contented with their lot. We don't want tourism to swamp us, I don't want my grandchildren to become hippies and drug addicts."

"Lakshadweep will shortly become another Goa or Kovalam (a beach resort near Trivandrum)," adds Kunji Koya Thangal, general secretary of Lakshadweep's Muslim League unit. "Our boys are now secretly going to Bangaram (the island which Rajiv and his friends immortalised) to watch (tourists) nude sun-bathing, and they are also likely to be influenced by alcohol and drugs." No, says Thangal, emphatically, "we definitely do not want tourism in these islands.

which has been peaceful all these years".

There is substance behind the tourist phobia, on three counts. One, Lakshadweep is the only place in India which has a hundred per cent Muslim population, and people are conservative, simple and low-key. Two, they are plagued by visions of how Goa, for instance, has seen its society changed completely, pandering to tourists. And three, the image of tourists: for the locals, tourists are those who smoke pot, make love on the beach, and walk around with brown sugar in their swimming gear, at least when they condescend to wear them.

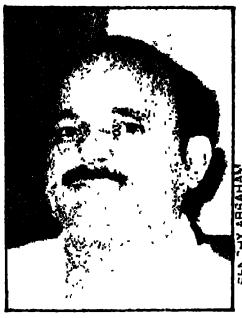
Tourist haters are now planning to launch an agitation to ban their moneyed visitors from entering the islands.

But the Lakshadweep administration has other ideas. It wants to bring in more tourists, and develop more tourist sites.

"We have four lakh square km of sea around us which abounds in extremely rich marine resources," says S.P. Agarwal, an Indian Administrative Services officer and Lakshadweep's top bureaucrat, who rules from Kavaratty, the union territory's capital. "But these are yet to be exploited by locals as it is a question of involving mainlanders with trawlers (for many islanders, the less they have to do with the Indian mainland, the better). We cannot have heavy industry as the density of population is the third highest in the country." Sixteen of Lakshadweep's 36 islands are uninhabited, and the rest cram 45,000 people in a land area the size of a few city blocks. "I feel," says Agarwal, "tourism is the future of the island."

And there is hardly any chance of ruining the way of life for islanders, says Agarwal. The 3,000 or so tourists who visited the islands last year—95 per cent of them foreigners—are restricted to two islands, Bangaram (see box) and Kadmat. And foreigners can only visit Bangaram. The Lakshadweep administration—through its offices in Cochin- screens every visitor to the chain, and only then issues permits. Visitors to Kadmat- Bangaram is the only exception—are expected to be teetotallers and conform to local social norms.

RENCHY ABRAHAM



Tourists at a beach resort: to stay or go away?

Tourists may visit Lakshadweep singly, or can buy package tours—both expensive and strictly controlled. In addition, international tour operators are a little wary of the island, because the only way to get there is by ship or air—through Vayudoot's notoriously infrequent flights—from Cochin. Besides, says Agarwal, "We are trying to see that there is no mingling between the locals and the tourists...we want to keep Lakshadweep as it is, so there is no question of supporting mass tourism." Which should also help preserve the archipelago's fragile ecosystem. Says Agarwal: "We don't want outsiders removing any coral from our islands."

But bring in revenue, instead. Lakshdweep survives on coconut produce, sparse agriculture and tuna fishing. Most of what is needed is imported from Cochin, against coconut products and tuna exports. Bringing in tourists—all foreigners have to pay in dollars—could help augment the island group's shaky economy.

There may not be any other way. "Tourism is the only industry which can survive in Lakshadweep without creating any environmental pollution," says P.K. Kasali, assistant general manager of SPORTS, a company which promotes tourism in the islands. "In the coming years it will employ more people from the islands." Adds Kunji Koya, the former Amir, or administrator, of Kadmat island: "Tourism has woken up the island. We don't care whether the tourists drink in private, as long as they bring prosperity to the islands."

Prosperity, say officials and locals, that could be modelled on the Maldives, a not-too-distant neighbour. "Recently I was in the Maldives," says Agarwal, "where tourism is the only industry. The islands and the topography are very similar to Lakshadweep. There also the locals are Muslims, but they don't directly come into contact with the tourists who are only allowed to stay in (clearly demarcated) island resorts." Controlled tourism works there, he says, and the planeloads of tourists who go there every day from Colombo or Trivandrum is example enough. "What nature has given to Lakshadweep," says Agar-

Bangaram island's exclusive resort offers both, for a price

Rajiv Gandhi chose Bangaram with care, when he planned his 'whale' rescue holiday with friends and Italian relatives three years ago. It is the only Lakshadweep island which foreigners are allowed to visit, and one can drink there. It is also mind-numbingly beautiful.

And it has Casino's Bangaram Island Resort, the destination of all foreign and many Indian tourists. 30 thatch-roof huts facing the sea, elegant cane and wood furniture, a style that most exclusive beach resorts in this part of the world favour. Plus, a private, 120 acre beach and clear, tranquil lagoons. Perfect for scuba diving, snorkelling or watching marine flora and fauna through glass-bottomed boats. No telephones, newspapers, television sets or room service.

"The resort is the perfect place to get away from it all," says Jane Davis, a London-based travel agent. "Reaching here itself is an adventure for the foreigners (a leisurely ride from Agatti in a converted fishing boat)."

All for a price. A hut sells for US $ 170 (over Rs 3,000) for a couple. One reason for the sky-high rates, besides exclusiveness, is that the resort has to bring in everything but coconut and fish. But it is doing so well, says Jose Dominic, who runs the resort, that the place is booked solid till March next year. And the resort's turnover for 1990-91, he says, is expected to be Rs 1.25 crores, double last year's figures.

A change from when the Travel Corp. of India ran the resort for two years before Rajiv's visit. The resort went into the red, and finally in 1988, Dominic, a 39-year-old Cochin-based chartered accountant who runs the Casino group of hotels, took it over.

Dominic plans to preserve Bangaram's exclusivity, and its pristine nature. "When you go snorkelling in Male (Maldive's capital)," he says, "you will find beer bottles and tins on the ocean bed. We do not want that to happen here."

What about allegations that Bangaram is corrupting locals? "The locals from Agatti come here to pluck coconuts that belong to them," says Dominic. "We don't offer them drinks and so on. We are ready to pluck the coconuts for them and deliver it to their islands, free of cost." He employs locals at the resort, says Dominic, and cannot think of any there to study in future.

wal, "is much better."

To capitalise on this gift, the administration is planning to invite global tenders to set up resorts in the uninhabited Suheli Valiakara and Suheli Cheriakara islands. It is also thinking of inviting UB Air—non resident Indian industrialist Vijay Mallya's air taxi service—from Cochin to Agatti, the archipelago's sole airport, and extending the runway to accomodate large aircraft. Plus, buying speed boats for faster transit between Agatti and the resort islands.

No thank you, say tourism's critics. "Why should the government corrupt our unhurried lifestyle with the introduction of tourism?" Asks a senior Lakshadweep administrator, who declines to be indentified. "The government should have invested more money on seafood-based industries," which, he says, is in a trough with incomes plummeting.

Bangaram island resort: pricey, exclusive isolation

"There is a positive side to tourism," retorts Agarwal. "A 100 people have got employment. More young men in the islands want to go after tourism. It is the only way we can offer employment for the locals." And how about the 'moral' corruption of youngsters, who are drawn by nude sun-bathers? "The locals have no business," says Agarwal, "to go to Bangaram and watch the foreigners." ●

COMPANIES/PROJECTS

Wind up, wind down

Goans are upset about Thapar-Du Pont's proposed nylon project in the state, the government indifferent and Du Pont, very tired

The Rs 1,725 crore L.M. Thapar Group—India's sixth largest industrial house—and E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co, a US$ 35 billion (Rs 63,000 crore)—chemicals behemoth from Delaware, US, want to spin nylon yarn in Goa. Many Goans, however, feel that they are being spun a yarn, pushed into a corner by big business interests, their fertile land is being taken away for the project, and their environment is about to be doomed.

The Rs 250 crore project for the manufacture of Nylon 6,6 fibre, for use in manufacturing aircraft, truck and high performance car tyres, is a venture—called Thapar Du Pont Ltd (TDL)—between Ballarpur Industries Ltd, the Thapar Group's flagship company, Du Pont Far East Inc.—India, and the Economic Development Corp. of Goa (EDCG). The Goans are fighting it, and the Thapar-Du Pont combine is trying to use everything it can to see that the project goes through.

As of now, the people have the upper hand, and they are organising protests through organisations such as the Anti-Nylon 6,6 Committee. These protest groups received a boost last month when a committee to look into the project, appointed by the Goa Legislative Assembly recommended that TDL be asked to wind up in Goa. "The entire project smacks of fraud," says A.N. Naik, chairman of the committee. "True, Goans have unemployment problems, but it's really not worth having such industries." He adds: "I personally am against this project. Setting up such industries would be detrimental to the Goans."

For starters, say the project's critics, the way land has been acquired for the venture is questionable. In March 1989, 222 acres of communidade or collectively held land in Kerim, the place in Ponda district where the Nylon 6,6 plant is to be located, was handed over to the Goa Daman & Diu Industrial Development Corp. Thanks to former chief minister Pratap Singh Rane's interest in the project, say critics. (Rane lost his seat in January this year.) Then, in early 1990, the state government passed around a notification to Kerim residents that 308 acres of communidade land was to be acquired. The residents objected straightaway.

Especially as they felt the plant would use outmoded, and perhaps environmentally dangerous, machinery. People in Kerim say that TDL plans to use a plant manufactured in 1939, and cite TDL's own Capital Goods Approval application dated 26 September 1988 to the Government of India to prove their point. The plant, says the application, is "refurbished and modified from time to time and it is impossible to quantify the age of the equipment".

So why go in for an old plant, question critics, and a technology that the world has more or less dumped for Kevlar, a fibre that Du Pont has produced in the US since 1973? Kevlar is used for making bullet-proof vests and radial car tyres, and most Westren nations have switched to Kevlar. True, they say, Nylon 6,6—which is not manufactured in India—is superior to Nylon 6, the fibre that Indian tyre-makers currently use, but why not set up a modern Kevlar plant instead? (The domestic Nylon 6 lobby is dead against the Thapar-Du Pont project, but that is another story). Along with India, Turkey, Egypt, Singapore and Indonesia, among other countries, have been identified as potential locations for transfer of Du Pont's Nylon 6,6 technology. "Indonesia is watching the way Goa is going," says Bonnie Menezes, an anti-Nylon 6,6 activist. "We have to take the lead and give Du Pont a nice kick here."

The anti-TDL lobby in Goa is set against the project on another count: they are scared that Kerim might witness a Bhopal-like situation if the 'old' machinery cracks up. What is more scary, they say, is the fact that Du Pont's liability in the case of an industrial accident is practically zero.

In February 1988, the EDCG passed a resolution empowering Ballarpur Industries to draw up an agreement with Du Pont. In this agreement, a section in its Article 5 (on Warranty and Liability) states:

- "TDL shall hold Du Pont and its representatives or assignees harmless from any claims made in the Republic of India against any representative of Du Pont or its assignees alleging bodily harm or death sustained as a direct result of, or in direct connection with the performance of this agreement."
- "Du Pont shall not be liable in any manner whatsoever to TDL or to any third party for any loss or damage caused to person or property, including the members of the public as well as to person or property of any employees of TDL directly or indirectly caused by an act or omission of TDL or its servant or agent and TDL shall indemnify Du Pont against the said liability."
- "Du Pont shall not be liable under any circumstances whatsoever to any third parties including members of the public on any account whatsoever due to any accident at the plant or any act or ommission of TDL...Any claim (etc) made by any third party against Du Pont shall be defended by TDL at its cost and expense..."
- Further arbitration between TDL and Du Pont is to be held in London. The arbitration clause states: "The arbitrators shall apply the laws of UK and such rules of international law as may be applicable."

Du Pont drew up the agreement, say TDL critics, because it was wary of the way Union Carbide Corp. got into a legal soup after poisonous methyl isocyanate gas leaked out from its Indian associate's Bhopal plant, and killed more than 3,000 people on 3-4 December, 1984. Union Carbide finally shelled out US $ 450 million in damages last year to the Indian government, but could be in for more trouble if the Chandra Shekhar government hardens its stand against multinational corporations. Du Pont, they say, wants to take precautions against a Union Carbide-like situation, and hence the minimum indemnity agreement. Besides, Du Pont has also tied in arbitration in the UK, so there is very little chance of the case shifting to India, the way it happened with Union Carbide.

TDL, for its part, is fighting back With as much logic as the Goans can muster. First, say TDL executives, the land designated for the project, which Kerim residents claim to be fertile, is in fact classified—officially—as grade 'E' land, the lowest category of degraded land in India.

On 19 and 20 June this year, TDL organised meetings in Goa and Bombay between company executives and environmentalists, an effort helped along by New Delhi-based Indian National Trust for Art, Culture and Heritage. And attended by the top brass: Eugene F. Kreuzberger, president of Du Pont Far East Inc—India, Gautam Thapar, vice-president, fibres, with Ballarpur Industries, a Du Pont environmental expert flown down from the US, and P.K. Shetye, chief development officer with EDCG. TDL also called in officials from the Bombay Environmental Action Group, the Goa Foundation and the Goa Research Institute for Development. The outcome: TDL should prepare an "environmental impact assessment study". TDL agreed, and also offered that environmentalists were free to monitor the working of its plant when it began operations.

TDL is confident about the project's positive environmental impact. Company executives say that the project has already received No Objection Certificates from the Central Board for the Prevention and Control of Water Pollution and the Goa State Pollution Control Board. Besides, say Du Pont executives, that the two chemicals used as raw material for making Nylon 6,6—adipic acid and hexamethylene diamine—are "non-toxic, non-volatile, non-carcinogenic and non-mutagenic". Du Pont claims that adipic acid is a food-grade chemical, used for making aspirin and sweets. In addition, they say, TDL will follow emission regulations according to either Indian or US laws, whichever are more stringent.

"Du Pont is by no means free of environmental problems," says E.S. Woolard Jr, chairman of E.I. Du Pont, "and we don't want to paint a false picture of the company as an ecological nirvana." A way out is to find substitutes to now-proven harmful chemicals, reducing harmful emissions, and so on. Du Pont is the world's largest manufacturer of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs), which affects the ozone layer, but the company has undertaken to quit the CFC business—worth US$ 750 million (Rs 1,350 crores) a year's business by the end of the decade, or sooner if it can develop substitutes. With this sort of a corporate philosophy, say company executives, it is hardly likely that the company will dump dangerous chemicals on an unsuspecting public in Goa. Or all India, for that matter - Du Pont supplies Baroda-based Indian Petrochemicals Corp. Ltd with acrylic staple fibre technology.

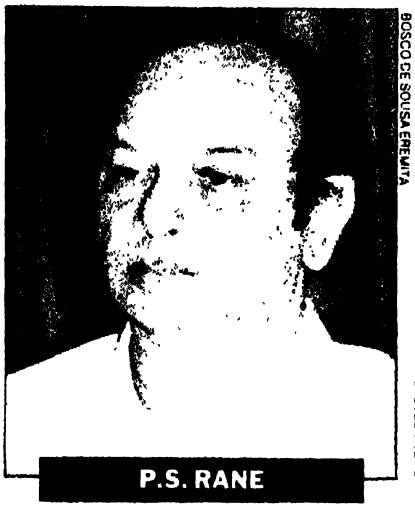
Du Pont's defence, however, is unlikely to satisfy Goans. The criticism is that multinational companies are keen to impress people on their home ground with environmental awareness, but when it comes to the Third World, anything goes. The anti-Nylon 6,6 groups and the residents of Kerim plan to go right on agitating, and TDL may have an extended scrap, logic notwithstanding, on its hands.

But the location of the site is not TDL's most pressing problem, however much people such as activist Menezes talk about giving Du Pont a "nice kick", or legislator Naik talk of the project being "detrimental". The problem lies in New Delhi, because even after almost eight years of pushing, the project has not taken off. The Thapar's have a new technology—and the Rs 1.5 crores they have already spent on it—at stake, and Du Pont an increased presence in India.

TDL had hoped to get a final okay during the V.P. Singh government's rule, but the regime's industry minister Ajit Singh, raised questions about the price of raw materials to be imported and the outgo of foreign exchange. According to TDL's shopping list—mentioned in its September 1988 application—was: Rs 28.51 crores to Du Pont for importing machinery, Rs 233.85 crores for importing raw materials, Rs 4.13 crores for know-how, Rs 17.57 crores as royalty and Rs 2.79 crores as expenses to house and take care of Du Pont overseas technicians.

TDL has undertaken a 25 per cent export commitment, which is likely to fetch India Rs 94 crores in foreign exchange. But Singh objected, say ministry officials, on grounds that the foreign exchange outflow was far too much, and that the market for Nylon 6,6 is expected to drop—worldwide - as Kevlar becomes more acceptable than Nylon 6,6. So how, goes the wisdom, can TDL ensure that it will be able to export a quarter of its production, almost 3,000 tonnes a year?

Government watchers in New Delhi say that while the previous administration may have had valid objections — such as perennial payments for raw materials, technicians, etc.—about the TDL project, they were a little too hasty in ignoring the import substitution angle, which could lead to projected foreign exchange savings of Rs 375 crores. Also, that the Raja's regime treated the Thapar-Du Pont venture shabbily so that it could get the best deal out of the proposal, a la Pepsi. Push Du Pont into a corner and the mega-company, in its greed to expand in India, will do anything it can to save its interests.



All that it did was turn the Nylon 6,6 project into bit of a cause celebre affair, in much the same way Pepsi went last year. The thing is, the Pepsi project has been approved and its soft drinks and snack foods have hit Indian shops. The TDL project has barely moved beyond acquiring land. The US government is looking at the stalled project as yet another example of India's "restrictive trade practices" and it is quite likely that if the project is not cleared soon, it will be used by US trade officials as a bit of ammunition in its Super 301 threat.

The US ambassador to India, William Clark Jr, made a trip to Goa in July, and appealed to the state government to hurry with project clearances. Perhaps, His Excellency may now make a representation to the new government, but given Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar's economic beliefs, the impasse may never clear up.

With one possible consequence. "If the government takes any longer to make up its mind," says a senior economist with a Western embassy in New Delhi, "Du Pont may pack up and leave. Nobody wants to wait around that long." He adds: "If the deal falls through, then it will send out the wrong signals about India's investment climate."

The Thapar Group will not like that. And the government, certainly. But Kerim will probably open a few demijohns of the area's best feni to celebrate the event. ●

■ Return of the Raid Raj?

The arrest of Abhey Oswal has led some businessmen to conclude that Reliance's very special brand of black magic is back in action at North Block.

But parallels with Orkay chairman Kapal Mehra's arrest in the heyday of the Raid Raj are far-fetched. It turns out that the decision to charge Oswal was taken by the V.P. Singh government. He was, originally, to have been arrested during Diwali but this was deferred for a few weeks.

The indications are that the Oswal case is an exception: there will be a full-scale crackdown on economic offenders

■ Eat less, work more

At least one ministry is taking the government's austerity drive seriously, the finance ministry. Deputy minister Digvijay Singh has pared expenses to the bone. One instance: when the workmen came to instal a metal name-plate outside his office, he insisted on wood because it was cheaper!

Meanwhile, the ministry has also clamped down on entertaining. Under the new regulations, nobody may serve snacks to visitors, not even finance minister Yashwant Sinha. An exception can only be made if an important foreign delegation is visiting.

The flip-side of all this austerity is that a certain human element has finally entered the Stalinist enclave at North Block. Digvijay Singh summoned those in charge of the cesspool of Delhi airport customs and berated them for harassing passengers. His argument: customs officers were supposed to watch out for smugglers, not shake down every hapless traveller who had one bottle of whiskey extra or brought back a calculator for his son.

Singh's reasoning didn't please the customs officers—at Delhi airport, even the assistant collectors are reluctant to help harassed passengers—or appeal to their greed but seeing that he is the boss, they changed their attitudes.

Bonafide passengers arriving at Delhi airport, now have less reason to fear.

PERSONALITY OF THE WEEK

Manmohan Singh

●The appointment of Manmohan Singh as the chief economic adviser to the Prime Minister is one that economists will welcome. At present, the regime's economists fall into broadly two categories. There are those who are closely identified with a particular line (Deepak Nayyar and S.K. Goyal) and there are those who economists regard as essentially civil servants (ie, Bimal Jalan). The economist's economists (Shankar Acharya and Montek Singh Ahluwalia) are thought to lack any real influence while those in the first two categories dominate. That balance may now alter with Singh's appointment. He has been chief economic adviser, Reserve Bank of India governor and deputy chairman of the Planning Commission (when Rajiv Gandhi called the Commission "jokers") in his time and is regarded as the best Indian economist of his generation. He has no ideological line, eschews a bureaucratic approach and likes quick results. With a Brezhnevite as PM, thank God there is a good economist on hand to pull him into the 1990s!

An update on our item of last month about Dr Surinder Kapur. Yes, he has left Bharat Gears and no longer works for Raunaq Singh, his father-in-law. And yes, he has shifted out of Bombay and now lives in New Delhi from where he looks after his flourishing Sona Steerings.

Nonetheless, our item may have given the entirely erroneous impression that having branched out on his own, Kapur has broken family ties with his father-in-law.

Nothing could be further from the truth. The family relationship endures and once they shifted to Delhi, Kapur and his wife Rani moved in with her brother while they waited for their house to get ready.

Surinder Kapoor: family first

Kapur's ties with his in-laws remained as close, harmonious and loving as they were before he left Bharat Gears.

We are sorry if our item gave the impression that this was not the case. ●

Justice delayed

The Bar takes on the Bench at the Calcutta High Court

The country's judicial system faced an unusual situation. For nine days the process of justice remained jammed in the 128-year-old Calcutta High Court as a quarrel between the Bar and the Bench led to an unprecedented stalemate.

It was the death of a senior lawyer, a member of the Bar Association, that led to the trouble. The lawyers called a condolence meeting on 26 November and resolved not to attend court that day as a mark of respect to their departed colleague, who had been in practice since 1948. The judges were informed about the decision and everything seemed in order.

But the Bench took no heed of the notice served by the lawyers. The judges, under instructions from the Chief Justice, P.D. Desai, held court and dismissed as many as 410 pending cases, as the lawyers of the litigants failed to appear. And this created a procedural impasse that took the state's legal community by complete surprise.

What was to happen to the dismissed cases that fell through for no real failing of the litigants? The Bench refused to restore them and the Bar insisted that they be resumed and also demanded an apology from the Chief Justice for having taken, what the lawyers felt was, an extraordinary step that humiliated the members of the Bar. The lawyers were aware of the fact that if they failed to get the cases reinstated, the community would suffer an irreparable loss of face.

While the Chief Justice refused to yield, the lawyers argued that the practice of observing "full court," (stoppage of all judicial procedings) on the death of an advocate is a long-established practice. Bidyut Kiran Mukherjee, secretary of the Bar Association told SUNDAY:" A notice was duly circulated to all concerned with a request not to sit in court or plead any case on that day." He also added that Justice Desai had allowed "full court" on earlier occasions.

During the next few days, the restoration of the cases became the focal point of the controversy as repeated discussions between the Bar and the Bench failed to end the deadlock. The Bar Association secretary was of the opinion that the cases could be resumed suo motto, ie, by verbal mention by the advocate on record But the Chief Justice would have none of it.

As days passed, and a solution proved elusive, the judiciary began to earn a bad name. With 1.5 lakh cases already pending in the High Court, the work stoppage evoked cynical remarks from the public. While some flayed the judges for turning the controversy into a pointless prestige issue, others denounced the lawyers' attempts to prolong cases by taking a day off every time a colleague died.

Agitation in the Bar Association: voices of protest

Even a section of the judges seemed to disapprove of the episode's farcical overtones. Justice Dilip Basu went on hunger strike, protesting against the goings-on and demanding an early settlement. Justice Basu, however, called off his protest on his doctor's advice, and on the request of his colleagues and senior members of the Bar.

On 3 December, 22,000 lawyers in the state went on a token strike in support of the High Court advocates and work in all the 72 courts in West Bengal came to a standstill. This tough stand jolted the legal community out of its complacency and parleys between the Bar and the Bench began in real earnest the next day, when a face-saving formula was arrived at.

The Bench agreed to re-accommodate the dismissed cases and guaranteed that their original serial would be maintained. The Bar, for its part, dropped their demand that the Chief Justice apologise for refusing to meet the lawyers on 26 November, when they had gone to explain their position. Justice Desai said that he could not do so as he was busy holding a meeting with the other judges on the situation that had arisen. "We consider this explanation a kind of apology," commented the association president, Arun Prakash Chatterjee, and the dispute seemed amicably settled.

But Justice Desai had driven home the point that "full courts" in a country where the backlog of cases was increasing everyday would not be entertained, and the Bar realised that it was time the custom was changed. It was decided in a meeting that the existing practice would be reviewed and amended to suit all concerned. But by then nine days had been lost, and justice delayed is, in a sense, justice denied. •

Carnage and chaos

As large-scale communal violence rocks Hyderabad, chief minister Chenna Reddy comes under threat

It is a city which has for long been communally sensitive—prone to sporadic riots and clashes. But rarely—if ever—has Hyderabad been blighted by the frenzied and maniacal violence that consumed it last week.

In the four days between 6 and 9 December, Hindu-Muslim clashes accounted for a staggering 75 lives (the unofficial toll was suspected to be over 100). Many of the dead were women and children, knifed by orgiastic mobs who broke into their homes. And as in most communal clashes, the bulk of the victims were poor—hawkers, pavement dwellers, rickshaw-pullers and so on.

The story of what led to the carnage remains somewhat cloudy, but it began on 6 December—the day the kar sevaks marched on Ayodhya—with a clash over a trivial matter. Two men—one a follower of the Majlis Ittehadul Musalmeen (MIM) leader S.S. Owaisi and the other an aide of a Congress MP—were involved in a land dispute, which led to the killing of the latter. On the following day, two stabbing incidents took place in the Muslim-dominated area of the old city and from then on, Hyderabad was in the grip of a savage communal frenzy. The police were unable to prevent the rioting as the death toll mounted every day. And by the time the five-member Congress(I) fact-finding team from Delhi had arrived in the state capital, the army had been called in to end the madness.

The state police were clearly ill-equipped to deal with the situation. Accusations were rife that the state police stood by and watched while areas in the old city burned. When chief minister Chenna Reddy visited Osmania Hospital, where the injured were admitted, he was confronted by an angry mob which charged that the police had failed in their duty. As for the police, it claimed—as did many of Chenna Reddy's detractors—it was hamstrung by political interference. The present police commissioner, Bhaskara Rao, is the fifth since the Congress(I) assumed power last December and there have been frequent allegations that members of Chenna Reddy's family were playing politics with the state police force. Said a senior police officer: "What can you expect when politicians treat us this way?"

Chief minister Chenna Reddy visits riot victims: many were children

The complete breakdown of the law and order machinery provided a handle for Reddy's detractors within the Congress to demand his resignation. Among the first to condemn the chief minister was dissident heavyweight P. Janardhan Reddy, who demanded that the chief minister step down for having "utterly failed" to maintain the peace. "Stabbings have become the order of the day and the inhabitants of the old city have become panic-stricken," he told a hurriedly-convened press conference. "I don't know who is in charge of the home portfolio," he smirked, after accusing the chief minister's son, Shashidar Reddy, and Congress MP M.M. Hashim of interfering in police affairs. Janardhan Reddy has a sizeable following in the legislatures and by some accounts, enjoys the loyalty of some 60 MLAs and ten MPs.

The pro-Chenna Reddy legislators responded by handing over a petition to Union minister of state for home, Subodh Kant Sahay—who rushed from Delhi to Hyderabad—which, among other things, hailed the steps taken by the chief minister to maintain law and order. They also alleged—somewhat unconvincingly—that the Congress dissidents were behind the violence.

But Chenna Reddy was clearly at the receiving end. And by the time his Cabinet had decided to hand over the job of keeping the peace to the army (which was empowered to shoot at sight), the air was thick with rumours that he was about to be sacked by the party high command. Perhaps in anticipation of this, minister for animal husbandry Srinivasulu Reddy handed in his resignation after failing to persuade the chief minister to do likewise. "There is a total breakdown of law and order in the Telengana area and Hyderabad. I cannot be a partner and a party to the sins that are being committed by you," he told Chenna Reddy.

Two state MLAs joined Srinivasulu Reddy in demanding the chief minister's ouster and a host of state leaders—including PCC(I) president V. Hanumantha Rao, who submitted his own report to the Congress high command on the violence—began jockeying for a change of leadership. Chenna Reddy, however, assumed an unworried air. He told his Cabinet that he had apprised party president Rajiv Gandhi of the violence and claimed that there was a "hidden hand" behind it.

Chenna Reddy's handling of the situation also came in for savage criticism from the Telugu Desam Party (TDP) and the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). Desam president N.T. Rama Rao saw in the carnage a lesson about the merit of TDP rule. He claimed, with some justification, that communal violence was at its lowest during the seven years his party was in power. "But in the last 11 months of Congress rule, there have been over a hundred killings in the state. Now there is no protection even for children and women," the former chief minister said.

The BJP—which was accused by some Congressmen of being responsible for the happenings—joined in the demand for Chenna Reddy's sacking.

A dramatic resignation and a bid for the chief ministership

Balram Jakhar

Sent to do Rajiv Gandhi's dirty work for him?

The party called a bandh in Telengana: "We are protesting against this violence and ineffective state administration," said BJP general secretary Bandaru Dattatreya. He also contested Congress spokesman M.J. Akbar's charge that the BJP was behind the carnage. "Look at the list of the dead and injured and you will know who was responsible," he said. The contention was that as most of the victims were Hindu, the violence was wreaked by the Muslims, particularly those owing allegiance to the MIM.

The visit of the five-member Congress team from Delhi headed by Balram Jakhar hardened suspicions that Chenna Reddy may be asked to go. The team—whose other members were Mohsina Kidwai, P. Chidambaram, Janardhan Poojary and M.J. Akbar—met with party dissidents, who complained about Chenna Reddy's mishandling of the situation.

One rumour was that the delegation was sent with the sole purpose of forcing Chenna Reddy—who, it is well known, is at odds with Rajiv Gandhi and the party high command—to quit. If Rajiv didn't come down to Hyderabad himself, it was only to avoid the bad press he received for asking Karnataka's Veerendra Patil to go, said those who subscribed to this view. Said a state Congress functionary: "Jakhar has been sent to do Rajiv Gandhi's job by him."

However, many disagreed with this thesis. Sources close to the Congress team say that, after conducting enquiries, it has decided that the carnage was, in large measure, a Muslim backlash—a fall-out of the satyagraha to perform kar seva in Ayodhya. The group, it is said, felt that the BJP did its bit to add to the conflagration. Says a senior state Congress member: "Chenna Reddy will not be asked to go. Not for this, anyway."

As SUNDAY went to press, it was difficult to predict the chief minister's fate. For most people in Hyderabad, however, the political fall-out of the violence was of far less consequence than the events themselves. With the army now patrolling the old city, which has been placed under an indefinite curfew, there is the hope that the city will limp slowly to peace. But at the same time, the anger and hatred that the clashes have generated are still strong.

Already, hundreds of families have moved out of their homes in the old city for safer areas in Secunderabad. "I will have to think long and hard before I go back to my house again," said one 'refugee'. "But even if I do, I will never feel easy about living there again." ●

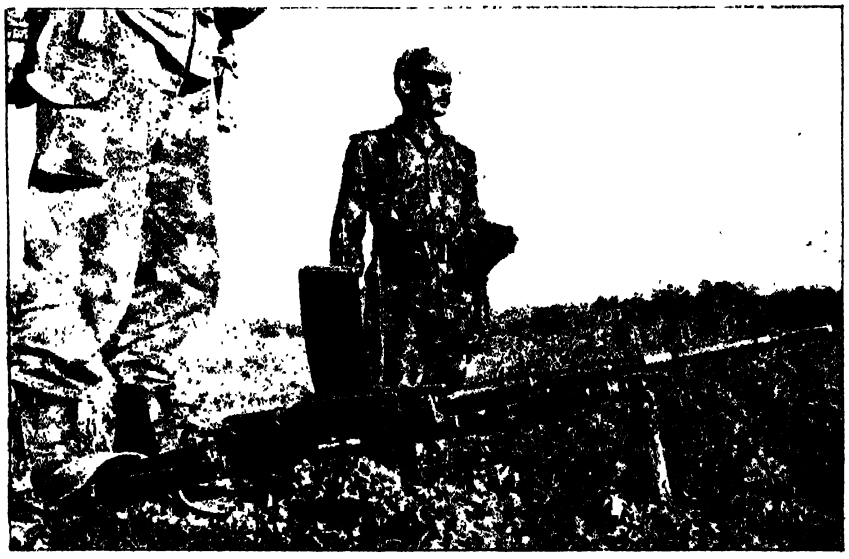
Operation Bungle



The army offensive against the ULFA in Assam is a flop

The flight from Guwahati to the Indian Air Force's Chabua base in Upper Assam takes around 60 minutes. Another hour's drive through tea gardens and the oil town of Digboi will take you to Lakhipathar, a densely forested tract which leads to the Kachin hills of Burma through Arunachal Pradesh. These days, the entire route from Chabua to Lakhipathar is lined with army trucks, with sten gun-toting jawans ready for action. This is the territory of the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA), a committed band of Assamese militants who are determined to liberate the state from the "clutches of colonial Delhi". And deep within the jungles is the "war headquarters" of the dreaded terrorist outfit, which the army has taken control of since 30 November.

Operation Bajrang. That's the code name for what is undoubtedly one of the biggest army operations within the country in recent times. Around 30,000 army personnel, including three mountain divisions which had done duty in Sri Lanka, fanned out in six districts of Upper Assam in the last week of November to flush out and apprehend guerrillas of the outlawed ULFA. But within a week of the crackdown, the results were demoralising. At least for the army. True, a number of ULFA camps, including its war headquarters, were demolished and its guerrillas were on the run. But that was about all. The army failed to apprehend a single hardcore ULFA activist, leave alone lay its hands on the top leadership. And the big guns of the terrorist outfit seemed to have disappeared overnight. Seven days into the operations and people were already talking of how the ULFA had made a fool of the army.

The army, of course, is not to be entirely blamed for the poor show. The decision to call in the troops was taken by the Chandra Shekhar government at a very late stage. As Lt Gen. Baljit Singh, the chief of staff, Eastern Command, who is currently supervising the counter-insurgency operations against the ULFA explained: "All such army actions have to be backed by solid intelligence, which was clearly lacking in this case." More important, the army was clearly unacquainted with the terrain. The thick jungles provided an excellent ground for the ULFA guerrillas to take on the army. Most of them, of course, fired at the jawans from behind dense foliage and literally melted into the forest once they were spotted.

It was really a daunting task for the men in uniform. The army offensive began on the morning of 28 November, hours after President's Rule was imposed in Assam. The army's first target was perhaps the most difficult: the ULFA's "war control cell" located within the Lakhipathar forest area. The jungles are thick, with narrow dirt tracks criss-crossing the area. Armed with automatics, helicopters and armoured personnel carriers, the army tried to take the ULFA men by surprise. But a few yards into the forest and the jawans realised that they were up against a formidable enemy. The narrow mud road leading to the ULFA camp was heavily mined and the army was constantly being fired upon from within. But the troops held out and after a couple of hours, its fire-power proved too much for the opposition. One by one, the army captured five camps – a major breakthrough considering that the guerrillas operated mostly from these bases. But much to the dismay of the forces, most of the top ULFA leaders had fled by then, leaving the camps only to a couple of guards. But more important perhaps is the fact that in the seven days of uninterrupted army operations, not a single sophisticated weapon was recovered. The arms and the equipment that the army seized from the ULFA's "war control cell" would put any insurgent gang to shame: a couple of double barrel guns, a few air pistols and some crude mines made out of iron pipes stuffed with explosives. The goods recovered from the Lakhipathar camps were more interesting: an Onida TV, a Funai VCP, saline bottles, a huge quantity of medicines that included paracetamol tablets and a variety of tonics, stationery, quilts, mosquito nets and a guitar. Among the books recovered were Cheiro's Palmistry, Banerjee's Good English and Mao Tse Tung's Collection of Poems. The army also stumbled on a mass grave—people reportedly executed by the ULFA.

The documents seized from the ULFA camps were more enlightening. While one contained names of fresh recruits, another was a manual of the Burma-based Kachin Independence Army (KIA) on the art of guerrilla warfare. But from the army's point of view, a note from the ULFA commander-in-chief, Paresh Baruah, was of utmost importance: the circular asked all ULFA volunteers to vacate their camps by 19 November, thereby confirming the rumour that the guerrillas were tipped off about the army action well in advance.

Everything pointed to an intelligence leak. Though the ULFA is said to have a good network of spies who keep it informed about all possible moves against it, the army operation must have been planned with utmost secrecy. Even the state police were not taken into confidence. Thus, the only people who had knowledge of the impending operation were the military top brass, the home ministry and the Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) ministers. In fact, sources at the Centre indicated that Prafulla Mahanta, the former chief minister of the state, was briefed about the crackdown during his trips to New Delhi last month. Is it possible that someone in the AGP warned the ULFA about the military action?

Brutal end: mass graves at Lakhipathar

Critics of the AGP pointed out that such a possibility was not just a speculation—it was a truth borne out by concrete evidence. Take for instance the location of the ULFA's headquarters at Lakhipathar. The camps were hardly seven kms from Digboi, Assam's oil town, and just a km away from a forest range office. It is thus impossible that the local administration was unaware of the ULFA's activities. Moreover, it has been more or less established by now that several AGP heavyweights were hand-in-glove with the ULFA militants. Just before President's Rule was imposed, a deputy superintendent of police posted in Upper Assam sent a secret note to his superior in Guwahati informing him that the AGP was preparing to recruit ULFA activists for the polls. The letter also specified that the ULFA "would not allow any other political party except the AGP to campaign" for the elections. Argued Hiteswar Saikia, the Assam Pradesh Congress chief, "It is no longer a secret that the AGP is in league with the ULFA. The local administration, particularly in Upper Assam, too, was infiltrated by the militants. ULFA activists used to operate from government offices after sunset." Agreed senior officer of the army who wished anonymity: "This is a major problem we faced. There was very little time for the forces to gather its own information. And we did not rely on the state apparatus because it was full of ULFA sympathisers."

There was yet another major hurdle for the military. There are scores of villages around the jungle, inhabited mostly by tribesmen. When the army started its combing operations, most of the ULFA activists buried their arms, threw away their battle fatigue and mingled with the villagers. And since the ULFA enjoys a lot of goodwill in rural Assam, no one indentified them when the army came. Admitted Lt. Gen. Baljit Singh: "It is unlikely that most of the ULFA men have fled to Burma. They may have crossed over to the neighbouring states. We are even not ruling out the possibility of their presence in the towns and villages of Assam."

Says Lt. Gen. Baljit Singh, chief of staff, Eastern Command, "The army was clearly handicapped by a lack of intelligence report on the activities of the ULFA"

The army offensive against the ULFA have had an undesirable fallout and disturbing echoes of the Assam agitation can be heard. Already, people are talking of army excesses and charges of rape and harassment are being levelled against the jawans. A routine charge, according to Baljit Singh, but the campaign could well do a lot of damage. Particularly since the AGP and the All Assam Students Union (AASU), which was in the forefront of the anti-foreigners agitation, are leading the crusade against the military. Since the popularity rating of the AGP was at an all-time low and everyone, including all the major political parties, felt that President's Rule was the only answer, the AGP is now trying to turn the attention of the people to the alleged atrocities on innocents by the army in the name of containing the ULFA menace. Former chief minister Prafulla Mahanta accompanied by some of his partymen paid a hurried visit to the Lakhipathar areas and came back to Guwahati with stories of how the army pulled out innocent youths from their homes and beat them up mercilessly. "Even women were not spared," complained Mahanta, adding, "many of them were raped in the presence of their elders." Villagers from Lakhipathar even blamed the army for destroying standing crops during the offensive.

The AASU, which till recently was the AGP's most severe critic, too claimed to have in its posession tape-recorded confessions of rape victims. And on 8 December, the AASU organised a demonstration by women at Guwahati where such tapes were played over the public address system. "We have planned out a prolonged agitational programme. We are against President's Rule and are determined to drive out the army from Assam," thundered an otherwise soft-spoken Samujjal Bhattacharjya, general-secretary of the AASU.

And every day, such stories of army

Brothers in arms

Why the Centre outlawed the NSCN along with the ULFA

The transition of the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA) from an assorted band of committed Assamese in 1981 to a full-fledged guerrilla outfit in 1990 that is creditably holding out against the Indian Army's offensive (see main story) has been largely possible due to the help and patronage of the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN), the dreaded insurgent gang led by the legendary Muivah. Thus, a ban on NSCN was rightly considered a prerequisite for any crackdown on the ULFA.

The ULFA's association with the NSCN dates back to the days of the "anti-foreigners" agitation, when some activists of the movement, which had turned violent by then, contacted the NSCN headquarters in Upper Burma for arms and training in guerrilla warfare. The ULFA was yet to take shape but a militant group within the All Assam Students Union (AASU) was already swayed with the vague idea of liberating Assam from the clutches of foreigners and outsiders. The NSCN leadership appreciated the spirit of "patriotism" in them, but explained the futility of training an unorganised group of individuals. The NSCN, however, promised to help them in raising an organisation.

In March 1982, the NSCN foreign secretary Angelius Shimray and Captain Athins were sent to Dimapur in Nagaland to help out the militants to form an organisation. The NSCN emissaries not only helped the ULFA in formulating the organisational structure, they also promised to train its recruits in Burma. A draft constitution was also prepared along the lines of high-handedness just keep multiplying. Most of them, like the one where the army is supposed to have fired on a crowd of 100 villagers, are bizarre to the point of being ridiculous, but as Lt. Gen. Baljit Singh put it "A lie repeated a thousand times makes a truth. This is part of the psychological warfare that the ULFA is now fighting."

The only saving grace for the army seems to be the fact that the AGP leaders, including Prafulla Mahanta and Bhrigu Phukan, do not enjoy much credibility among the people. But the AASU does and that's what is worrying Governor D.D Thakur. For he knows that once the students get their act together, it will be difficult to contain them. "We have fought the army during the Assam agitation and we are determined to do it again. The Assamese cannot be subjugated," said an agitated Hemanta Biswa Sarma, the general-secretary of the All Guwahati Students Union, the most powerful constituent of the AASU.

Says Samujjal Bhattacharjya, the AASU general-secretary, "Army rule is not the answer to Assam's problems. We are determined to throw out the troops from the state"

Sarma's rhetoric nowadays is being increasingly aimed at the Assamese psyche, where the people of the state are being seen as an exploited lot and the army an occupation force. Heroic exploits of legendary Assamese fighters are being touted to rouse the emotions of the people. And this has already had an impact: the masses are referring to the military as the "Indian" army and the ULFA is being painted as a band of patriots and "our boys". And stories of how a group of 16 has taken on an army of 4,000 are making their rounds throughout the state. Said Baljit Singh: "The army will need tangible success to counter such propaganda. I only wish the ULFA engages the army so that we could fight a battle and finish them off."

But so far, the ULFA seems least interested to face the might of the military. Its guerrillas have successfully cut through the army net, perhaps waiting for the security forces to be pulled out. It will then regroup and emerge as a more dreaded force. For this time round, there will be no dearth of public sympathy for them. The President's Rule and subsequent army operations have already made a martyr of Prafulla Mahanta. It could well be Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar's first costly blunder: Assam could well go the Kashmir way. • that of the NSCN.

According to an understanding with the NSCN, the ULFA has been sending volunteers for training at the NSCN headquarters in Burma since 1983. Around 80 ULFA activists in five batches were trained from 1983 to 1985.

The schedule was briefly interrupted in 1986, when the Burmese army launched an attack on NSCN camps. But in the rainy season of 1988, as many as 70 trained ULFA activists infiltrated into Assam.

But what does the NSCN get in return? Under the agreement, the ULFA pays back in cash and kind.

It includes provisions like medicines and food-stuff.

Though the NSCN provides excellent training in subversive activities to the ULFA, the latter's chief source of arms is the Kachin Independence Army (KIA), an outfit that controls the entire Kachin area of Burma and which supplies sophisticated weapons to many other guerrilla organisations. But as a matter of principle, it directs all its supplies through the NSCN and never deals directly with the ULFA.

The split within the NSCN has indeed hit the ULFA badly. Sometime around March 1988, Khaplang, who is a Burmese Naga, walked out with his followers on Muivah and Issac Swu. The ULFA was in a dilemma. For a time, the ULFA leaders tried to bring the two warring factions together but when such efforts failed, they decided to back the Khaplang faction because the passage from Assam to Burma through dense jungles is controlled by Khaplang.

Initially, the ULFA had its headquarters in the Kachin hills of Burma. But after the Burmese army launched a crackdown and the NSCN split, the ULFA shifted its base to the Lakhipathar areas of Upper Assam. The ULFA has also benefited greatly by being a constituent of the Indo-Burmese Revolutionary Front (IBRF), a broad grouping of ultras of the north-east.

The bumble-bee government

Hopes buzz with Chandra Shekhar coming to power

John Kenneth Galbraith (who later became President Kennedy's Ambassador to India) tells us in his 1952 classic American Capitalism that, according to all the laws of thermodynamics, a bumble-bee cannot fly—and yet it does! Much the same can be said of the Chandra Shekhar government.

The bumble-bee is just not structured, in terms of size, contours, spectrum, wing-span, body.weight ratio, or virtually any other relevant criterion, to even take off let alone sustain itself in the air or, indeed, go in for a spot of aerobatics. Our new government, similarly, is much the most unlikely we have ever had.

First, it is composed of one of the smallest groups in Parliament, representing not much more than around a tenth of the membership of the House. Second, it contains such fascinating creatures as (to begin from the tail) the gentle soul who made his name as leader of the Green Brigades (that is not the name of Maneka Gandhi's twee little troupe of green-fingered environmentalists but of the thugs who terrorised the voters of Allahabad into returning V.P. Singh to the Lok Sabha!). It includes my IAS batchmate of yore, Bhagey Gobardhan, who was pulled out of a hat by V.P. Singh in his last, never-to-be-missed performance as Chief Magician (gillie! gillie!) to say that he (Gobardhan) had been offered dhan of Rs. 50 lakhs and a Ministership to cross to the other—or gobar!-side. Consternation!

Also "enjoying" on the Treasury bench is "S2" himself. Why he should have been made minister for communications when clearly he should have been put in independent charge of badminton rackets (or, indeed, given his talents—and his pedigree—any racket!) remains something of a mystery.

We have Kalyan Singh Kalvi, who apparently believes that the code of the Suryavanshis (or is he a Chandravanshi?) stipulates that all good men and true should be in favour of putting widows to the torch when in Opposition—but be entirely opposed to such arson when ensconced in a ministerial gaddi!

There in Shastri Bhawan is Raj Mangal Pandey, an education in Education! And there in Udyog Bhawan is deposit-and-withdrawal Swamy, the Scarlet Pimpernel of the new order ("You see him here/ You see him there/ The Scarlet Pimpernel's everywhere!")

Quite at home at Home, is our very own Talleyrand, the Man for All Seasons, Subodh Kant Sahay. As Tennyson said: "The old order changeth/ Yielding place to Subodh—yet again!"—a wunderkind as indispensable, it would seem, to the implementation of V.P. Singh's non-policies as to the implementation of the new dispensation's policies.

And ticking away like a time bomb—silently, let it be ominously added—is the Tau (of whom V.P. Singh said as he fell to the floor: "Et tau Brute/Then fall Raja!"), now additionally invested with the portfolio of tourism, presumably to get in some much needed practice in rocking the boat!

Grinding their teeth outside the cage are the Dissatisfied Ones, the Jacobins of the Chandra Shekhar Revolution, led by our own Robespierre, Jagdeep Dhankar, who made the Revolution only to be overtaken at the end by even such a Jani-come-lately as health minister Shakeel-ur-Rehman.

And perched atop this extraordinary collection of newcomers, wizened veterans, wheelers, dealers and some plain good men presides a neophyte Prime Minister, who has never run even a village panchayat let alone a State Government or a Central Ministry.

How, you may well ask, can such a government run? The answer is:
(a) it can't
(b) it does!
For consider the performance of our new lords and masters in the month that has passed since we kissed V P. Singh goodbye on both cheeks and bade him kindly remove himself from our midst for evermore.

At the previous government's All-Party Round Table, in Delhi last year, V.P. Singh smugly insisted that he had no policy on Punjab—and that it was for the other parties to give him one

Take our single most acute problem: the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid dispute. In their competitive rivalry for the Muslim vote, V.P. Singh and Mulayam Singh Yadav kept upping the ante on each other while, on the other side, the likes of Ms Uma Bharti ("Samajh na pave baaton se/Ab laaton se samjhane do/Khoon kharaba hota hai/Tho ek bar ho jane do!") whipped the kar sevaks into hysteria. Instead of cooling the temperature, V.P. Singh resorted, in the final moments of his Gotterdammerung, to competitive duplicity, telling Muslim communalists one thing and Hindu communalists another, hoping against hope that somehow either these rival communalisms would cancel each other out—or, more probably, believing that, as the master of managing contradictions, he would succeed in fooling all of the people all of the time. The result was the tragic and wholly unnecessary killing and wounding of scores of unarmed—if impassioned ("Us samey pata chal jayega/ Jab ek ek Ali ki chhati par/ Dus-dus Bajrang Bali chadhenge!": the sivasi sanyasin herself, who else?)—young Bajrang Balis seeking out an Ali (or, failing that, at least a gumbaz) to leap upon!

The contrast with the statesmanship shown by the new government, leading to the kar seva-turned-satyagraha, couldn't be more striking. From the word "go" the new Prime Minister has thrown himself, beard and soul, into taming the devil in Ms. Bharti, on 6 December, the papers reported her urging "non-violence" (whatever became of her injunction in September: "Mahatma Gandhi ruined us by telling us that if we are slapped on one cheek, we should turn the other. Arrey, if your second cheek too is slapped, where are you going to find a third cheek"?—another convert to the Gandhian line, and all thanks to Chandra Shekhar!)

The government have earnestly started talking to both sets of activists. The distinction between religion and politics is being maintained. Credibility has been given to religious leaders of different persuasions getting together to find a solution to what is—and must remain—a problem in the spiritual domain rather than the temporal realm. There have been initiatives galore in an atmosphere of constructive competition to generate constructive alternatives, among them the "Rajiv formula". There is a palpable distancing of the BJP from the VHP, on the one hand, and, even more encouragingly, between the VHP and the general body of the country's Hindu community, on the other. Similarly, the hollowness of the claim of Muslim communalists to represent the Muslim community is being exposed.

As far as Chandra Shekhar is concerned, he seems content to let servants remain servants and leave it to natural atrophy to pave the way to such changes as have to be made

In Punjab, both buffoonery and appeasement have ended. Instead of open-jeep rides, all along the length of the tortured and tortuous one furlong from Jallianwalah Bagh to the Golden Temple's Clock Tower Gate, we have governance not gimmickry. In a test of strength and will, the Prime Minister has outfaced the extremists, not only banning their proposed Panthic Convention at Anandpur Saheb but also so effectively enforcing the ban that the Convention has had to be abandoned. More startling still, the Akali Dal (Mann) has been reduced to retorting, in the reported words of its Party Secretary, Captain C.S. Sidhu (Times of India, 6/12/90): "We would not like to drag our religious institutions into politics". (Isn't that what we have been saying all along?!)

Remember the previous government's All-Party Round Table in Delhi last December at which V.P. Singh smugly insisted that he had no policy on Punjab—and that it was for the other parties to give him one? This December, we have just had another Round Table, at which most major political parties have been represented and where the official briefing has stressed that a second round will be held with those who were unable to attend the first round. That is what building a national consensus is all about. Not declarations long on rhetoric and short on substance—or abandoning the fight against terrorism in Punjab on the specious plea that no noose is good news!

In Kashmir, the return of Farooq Abdullah to active political involvement signals, for the first time since that dreadful January day when V.P. Singh compounded his release of hard-core terrorists with unleashing Jagmohan (he has no initials but I might suggest a set—how about B.J.P. Jagmohan?) on the hapless people of Kashmir, a possibility of some reaching out to a needlessly alienated people.

Assam has seen, for the first time in five years, a smack of firm government. Under the competitive ministrations of Prafulla Mahanta and Brighu Phukan, ULFA had become, if not the right arm of governemnt, certainly its night arm! The terrorists in Assam have now been put on the run. One might have one's reservations about the army being called in once again in aid of the civil authority, but after five years of AGP connivance with extortion, kidnapping, and cold-blooded murder, was there really any alternative left?

Even in Tamil Nadu, the near impossible is beginning to happen: chief minister Karunanidhi being brought to heel. The inner compulsions of the DMK-LTTE tie-up are too strong for any but the most complacent to believe that their clandestine links will be snapped in any hurry. But it is now going to be just that much more difficult for the Tamil Nadu government to convert every government hospital in the state into a hideout for offshore militants, or openly surrender our sovereignty over our coastal waters to the LTTE, or make the Indian Customs and Excise Department into the first functioning department of the Eelam Government! Karunanidhi knows—or, at any rate has been told in no uncertain terms—that he no longer has a marionette government at the Centre that dances to every tune he plays on the National Front bansuri—but one that will whack him on the you-know-what if he goes too far out of line.

An entire month has passed and none of the institutions of our democracy has suffered any serious assault. All our Governors are still in place, even that Judas of Thirty Pieces of Silver, D.P. Chattopadhyaya. In Goa, the strictest constitutional propriety has been observed in asking Governor Khurshid Alam Khan to ensure that majorities are proved only on the floor of the House—and that too sufficiently quickly to not let the going price of feni shoot up too high!

The Civil Service is, of course, busy as ever dividing itself into rats that jump ship and rodents that gnaw nails! But, as far as the Prime Minister is concerned, he seems content to let servants remain servants and leave it to natural atrophy to pave the way to such changes as have to be made.

So with the judges. So with Doordarshan and Akashvani. So with public sector executives. So with the financial institutions. If such propriety and rectitude were to become the norm, what, oh what, will become of all of us?!

And in its first 15 days in office, it is the Chandra Shekhar government that has accomplished what the V.P. Singh government only kept faking—the actual receipt of Bofors-related documents from Switzerland. Sorry for the delay, folks. A little birdie tells this column that the delay was occasioned mainly by the heroic efforts of the Swiss translators to render Gurumurthy's emendations into plain English. Besides, the fingers of the Swiss clerks kept getting stuck in the fevicol with which Arun Jaitley had stuck on bits and pieces of hastily scribbled confetti to his original Letters Roguery!

Remember the first outing of the V.P. Singh governemnt beyond our shores? It was, if I might refresh your

Under the competitive ministrations of Prafulla Mahanta and Brighu Phukan ULFA had become, if not the right arm of government, certainly its night arm! The terrorists in Assam have now been put on the run memory, Inder Kumar Gujral heading out to Male (on the First Principle of the National Front that Small is Beautiful—but Big Brothers are Brutes!) Coincidentally, the first trip abroad of the new governemnt too has been to Male: the Prime Minister (accompanied by his external and other affairs minister) for the SAARC Summit. Where Gujral thoroughly embarrassed his hosts by proclaiming that "India" (which was his name for the two-bit trapeze artistes he represented) would "never again" send her armed forces out of the country (and this to a neighbour tearfully acknowledging their undying gratitude to our jawans for having saved their delightful democracy from a foreign-inspired mercenary coup), Chandra Shekhar briskly opened a business-like dialogue with the new Pak Premier, Nawaz Shariff, fully understanding the key requirement in our foreign policy imperatives for Pakistan—which is to open lines of communication direct to the top so that, when it comes to the crunch, we don't have to go through that wily veteran, Pak Foreign Minister Sahibzada Yaqub Khan, doubling as the switchboard operator.

The economy, of course, is in shambles. V.P. Singh began by claiming the coffers were empty—and ended by emptying the coffers. Dandavate set out by saying he had inherited a "difficult legacy"—and went out proclaiming that he was leaving behind a "difficult legacy "! Little has been done yet by the Chandra Shekhar government to give any firm reassurance that the economic disaster which looms over us will be averted or, at any rate, met head on. But there is one clear indication that we are determined to meet it turban on—our country's most brilliant resident economist (the non-resident genii are legion!), Manmohan Singh, is to be the Prime Minister's Economic Czar and Montek Singh Ahluwalia is, it seems, to stay. We got over the drought in 1987—which was a natural calamity in the trillions range—without turning a hair. Now, with Manmohan and Montek in the saddle, finance minister Yashwant Sinha might still pull off a miracle. Place your trust, as I always say, in bureaucrats turned politician!

No, the Chandra Shekhar government is not a bumble-bee. And yet it has—at any rate, till now—shown that it can fly. So, what's the explanation?

Two, I suggest. First, there is to our new Prime Minister a sincerity of purpose that was all too non-evident in You-Know-Who. This one believes in governance. That one thought it was all about empty gestures and illusory gimmicks. This one thinks contradictions are to be overcome. That one thought they were to be managed.

And, second (might I in all modesty submit?) the somewhat upmarket quality of Chandra Shekhar's outside support!

(The views expressed in this column are those of the author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress Party's position.)

Charles Sobhraj Limited

A new addition to the Sobhraj industry

Is there no stopping the Charles Sobhraj industry? First we had the official biography: The Life And Crimes Of Charles Sobhraj by Richard Neville. Then came the late Thomas Thompson's vastly superior Serpentine after which all references to Sobhraj contained the odd snake metaphor. Next was the TV film of Neville's book. Called Shadow Of The Cobra it stole Thompson's imagery and wove a highly fictionalised account of Sobhraj's encounters with Neville, made even less believable by the absurd casting of a saturnine Art Malik as the Chinese-eyed Sobhraj.

Now, there's Venom by Colin Falconer which purports to be a multinational thriller but is,in fact, a fictional reworking of the Sobhraj saga for the airport best-seller market.

There are some deviations from the facts, of course. The real Sobhraj is part Vietnamese and part Sindhi. Michel Christian, the protagonist of Venom,is part French and part Sikh. Nevertheless, he is born in Saigon. Then, while the real Sobhraj linked up with a French-Canadian mistress, Falconer's anti-hero meets up in an incestuous union with his French half-sister. (In fact, the incest angle is played up with such enthusiasm that one is tempted to conclude that the moral of this international novel is 'East West, incest is best.')

But otherwise the facts are pretty much the same and Venom is certainly truer to the Sobhraj story than Shadow Of The Cobra. Falconer even sets the novel between 1946 and 1973, roughly the correct dates for Sobhraj and makes no attempt to update the saga to the present day.

Charles Sobhraj: a multinational conglomerate

Moreover, the fictional Michel does almost everything that Sobhraj did He starts out by stealing passports from hippies and then graduates to jewel robberies. The modus operandi is the same as Sobhraj's: a woman is always seduced. If she is a shop assistant, then she is persuaded to decamp with the goods. If she is merely another guest at the same hotel, then she rings the jewellery shop and asks them to send their best gems over. No sooner has the salesman arrived, then Michel/Sobhraj drugs him and makes off with the jewels.

The problem with Venom is that it tries to add psychological complexity to the Sobhraj/Michel character. While the biographies reckon that Sobhraj was evil personified and don't waste time in trying to work out where he went wrong, Falconer blames it all on a deprived childhood. In this version, Michel/Sobhraj is trying to take revenge on the father who never owned up to him and on the mother who abandoned him. The father gets kneecapped but because the mother dies before Michel/Sobhraj can get around to finding her, he makes do with his half-sister whom he seduces with the greatest of ease. Sure enough, the sister sees through him,at which stage Michel/Sobhraj decides with the dull predictability that readers of airport best-sellers know so well: "His Madonna was like all the others. A whore."

The Oedipal and incest themes work against a book that would be a better read if it merely told the Sobhraj story. But then, perhaps Falconer had to make allowances for the fact that his is an old story that has often been told before. Hence the attempts to tart up the tale with incest and pop psychology.

Sensitive readers will be offended by the sneering tone Falconer sometimes adopts (ie "Justice does not exist in India, only process... One case, initiated in the tenth century, is still pending ") But all flag-wavers may find some reassurance in the fact that the Thais get it even worse than the Indians. ("The Thai police are very unreliable, you know. All the officers drive Mercedes and they only get paid a few hundred Bahts a month.")

All in all, a reasonable read for a long, tedious journey. But you won't learn anything you didn't already know about Sobhraj. ●

He reached out a hand and unlocked the clasp of a sapphire necklace at her throat. He put it in his jacket pocket and began to caress the whiteness of her throat. Noelle braced her feet on the floor and tried to throw the chair backwards. She was beyond reason now.

Michel held the chair with one hand and continued to stroke her neck with his fingers. "No one had ever loved you like I loved you, had they Noelle? All I asked was a little help in return. Instead you almost killed me. You nearly spoiled everything. What should I do with you?"

Noelle turned her face away, making small mewing noises in her throat, her whole body straining against her bonds. Michel watched her, his face creased with disgust.

Only one Kannada film makes it to the next Indian Film Festival

It has become something of an annual ritual. No sooner is the list of the films selected to the Panorama section of the Indian International Film Festival announced than howls of protest emanate from one quarter or the other. This year it is the turn of the Kannada film directors to object to the selection procedure of the section which comprises what are popularly known as Indian art movies.

Spearheading the protest is actor-director Suresh Heblikar, who maintains that the selections were appalling. "The powerful Malayali, Bengali and Hindi lobby" have been well-represented, he says, and "most of the films which have found place have been financed by the NFDC (National Film Development Corporation) and Doordarshan. It is as if they have monopolised the section." Says Heblikar, a trifle sarcastically: "If it is a pre-requisite that films be financed by government bodies to be included in the Panorama, then let them tell us."

Of the 19 films selected for screening in Madras (where the festival will be held early next year) eight have been produced by the NFDC, four by Doordarshan and one by the Children's Film Society, with the names of the directors reading like a who's who of Indian cinema: Satyajit Ray, Govind Nihalani, Sai Paranjape, Kumar Shahani, Mani Kaul, Balu Mahendra, Mani Rathnam, Gulzar and Amol Palekar. But the only Kannada film to be included is Girish Kasaravalli's Mane.

Some critics maintain, however, that Mane is not a Kannada film, strictly speaking, as it is being made in Hindi as well with Naseeruddin Shah and Deepti Naval in the lead. Kasaravalli disputes this: "The Hindi version is not ready as yet. How can it go as a Hindi film?"

But while Mane has made it, such films as Heblikar's Prathama Ushakirana, Prema Karanth's Nakkala Rajakumari, Sundar Krishna Urs's Chakra were left out rather inexplicably, despite their off-beat themes and the varying degrees of critical acclaim they had received. Says Karanth: "The directors whose films have been selected are undoubtedly talented. But that does not mean that the others should be neglected."

This year, instead of the 21 films they were expected to choose, the selection panel headed by Hrishikesh Mukherji has only listed 19 in the Panorama section. And what's worse, says Heblikar: "The selection reveals that lobbying, influence and big names matter, not films. There are directors whose films never get rejected. This is not only loathsome, but an insult to our creativity."

What irked the filmmakers further was that while all three Kannada films were rejected, the selection panel recalled two Malayali films after rejecting them. Says Kasaravalli: "Last year the panel had rejected my film Bannada Vesha. I appealed and was told that the decision could not be changed. So, have they now changed the rules?"

The inclusion of the Tamil film Anjali, directed by Mani Rathnam also came in for criticism. According to well-known Kannada director, Ravi: "The film is totally commercial and the story has been based on a foreign film. Just because it is about a girl in the year of the girl child does not mean it should be included in the Panorama."

The directors have now got together to urge that the selection be reviewed. If their demand is not acceded to, they have threatened to hold a parallel Panorama near the venue of the festival. Says Heblikar: "Then people can see which set of films is better: the ones selected because of big names and lobbying or the ones rejected." ●

Slender pickings

There wasn't much for the lovers of Indian cinema at the London Film Festival

Raj nostalgia is not fashionable any longer. Not on celluloid, at least, if the recently-concluded London Film Festival (LFF) is anything to go by. Not only was there little for lovers of Indian cinema, there weren't too many films on the country either. And what made the ommission even more glaring was the incongruous fact that there were more Indian critics and delegates in attendance at the festival, than were Indian films.

But of those on show, Adoor Gopalakrishnan's Mathilukal was a great hit, with Guardian film critic Derek Malcolm (an old India hand) putting it high on his list of must-sees, both in print and on television. And sure enough Mathilukal played to loud and spontaneous applause.

Satyajit's Ray's latest film Shakha Prashakha was among the prime attractions of the festival. Quite significantly so, for, as the festival brochure had it, when the first

Despite his Indian origins, director Udayan Prasad has managed to escape Asian stereotypes

At 37, Udayan Prasad is in an enviable position. The Indian-born freelance director is one of the few filmmakers with more than one film showing at the London Film Festival. And both 102 Boulevard Haussmann and They Never Slept deal with subjects far removed from the sickeningly-familiar stereotypes which non-Whites get boxed into in England. "I have somehow managed to escape that filmmaking ghetto," says Prasad.

Born in 1953 in Sevagram Ashram, where his parents were leading a life inspired by Mahatma Gandhi (his father was from Dehradun and his mother from the Palghat region of Kerala), Prasad came to England when he was nine. He discovered a passion for filmmaking when he was at art school in Cardiff, South Wales. And this stayed with him through a subsequent stint at Leeds Polytechnic, where he made movies "nominally under the guise of doing graphics".

Udayan Prasad has two films showing at the festival. And both use the First World War as a backdrop to tell different tales

Three years in the cutting-room taught him about the structure of a film; invaluable training as it turned out. From 1979 onwards, he worked as assistant director, cameraman and director with several television documentaries to his credit, ending with the two films he has at the LFF, each [illegible]

Both 102 Boulevard Haussmann and They Never Slept use the First World War as a backdrop to tell very different tales. One of the most famous addresses in Paris during the War was 102 Boulevard Haussmann, where France's most illustrious man of letters was holed up, writing his masterpiece. Marcel Proust spent the entire duration of the war in his soundproof bedroom, waited on by his devoted slave Celeste. Occasionally, he would sally forth in search of diversion and pick up people who happened to intrigue him for the moment. The film catches Proust, played beautifully by Alan Benett, at his cynical worst, using people to inspire him and discarding them as soon as he tires of them.

They Never Slept, conversely, has a lovely farcical structure; it regards the war with wicked irreverance, with its bumbling English spies who get run over by buses, master-spies who play catch in their office (Edward Fox in a nicely off-beat role) and yet more foolish spies, all breathless and wide-eyed. Says Prasad: "It (They Never Slept) is so completely, intensely English; I loved doing it."

But how did Prasad evolve to making films set in a British context, with British actors and technicians, instead of "filling slots for Asians", as they say in England? "There must be a large element of luck involved in it," says the young director with a smile and due modesty.

But Prasad is aware of the dark side of being brown in Britain as well. Living with his British wife and two children, he can observe racism at close quarters: "Families shut themselves in on holidays because they are scared of going out. Their children go in fear, and they live with their post boxes cemented because they are sick of shit being poured through them...and they sleep with water cans beside their beds because they never know when fire bombs will be hurled through their windows."

Neither of his films shown at the LFF deals with the kind of violence he is talking about, sitting in the press marquee. But Prasad does not see any contradiction in this: "I feel as strongly about it as any other Indian. I live here and I can't deny that I am part of its society, but I am Indian and proud of it."

And quite relieved that Asian youth in battered East London are banding together to fight violence directed against them and their families; skinhead gangs no longer rule the roost in his area. "England has become a much less caring society. It's so aggressive," he says sadly. "But you have to learn to live with it, otherwise you'd be on the verge of a breakdown permanently."

Currently languishing in a project on called exotic rants, Prasad says he'd love to make a film in India, which he hasn't visited for five years. Only, I'm not quite ready to do the film just yet, because I've [illegible] the year after. There are changes to [illegible]

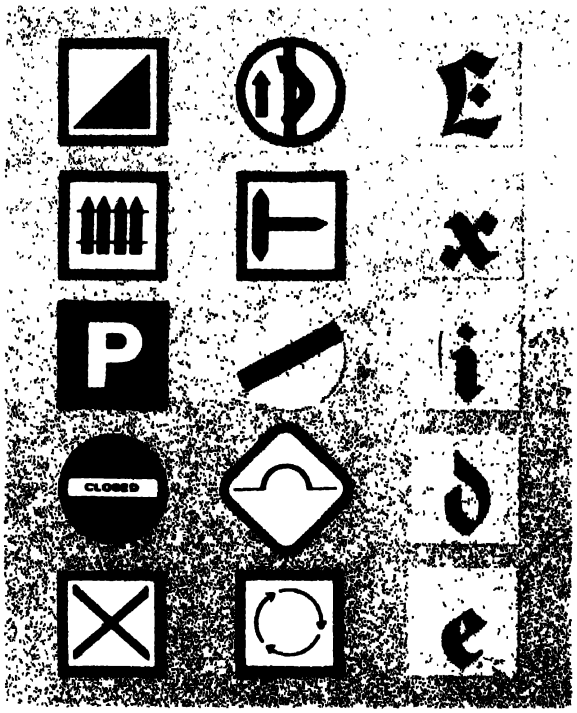
He knows, however, what he is going to do next. Says Prasad: "I'm [illegible] the Indian film, and it's [illegible] of the people."

avatar of the LFF flew out of post-prandial coffee at a dinner hosted by critic Dilys Powell, a Ray film was included to keep the other masters—Kurosawa, Fellini, Bergman—company.

Other than these, the pickings were remarkably slender as far as Indian cinema went. There was Buddhadeb Dasgupta's Bagh Bahadur, padded with two documentaries, Anand Patwardhan's Unna Mitran Di Yaad Pyaari and Vishnu Mathur's The Flying Bird. Even if there had been automatic inclusion of some award-winning films, without any scouting around for the more esoteric stuff, the number would have gone up appreciably. At the last festival, for instance, the line-up had been much more impressive: Ray's Ganashatru, Kumar Shahani's Khayal Gatha, G. Aravindan's Marrattam, Mani Kaul's Siddheshwari, Mrinal Sen's Ek Din Achanak, Sudhir Mishra's Main Azaad Hoon and Sahji's Piravi, which people are still talking about.

Festival director Sheila Whitaker has her explanation ready. "Maybe it's because I couldn't go to Calcutta (the International Film Festival)," says Whitaker. "The films we have shown here were picked from Cannes where I did manage to go. But I hope to be in Madras next year and I hope we will have many more films from India at the next festival."

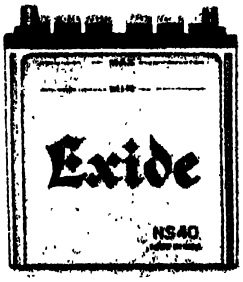
Whatever the reason, Indian representation at the LFF was surprisingly meagre. Unlike most countries, which had a section to themselves, Indian films were relegated to the section on films from the "Three Continents", that is, from Asia, Africa and Latin America. Even miniscule Hong Kong had more films, with top star Jackie Chan—who couldn't make it finally—billed as a favoured guest.



The small Indian presence notwithstanding, this year's LFF was the largest ever, with roughly 200 films from 35 countries on show. Spread over three weeks, it was a sprawling affair, with movies playing at several theatres, including three main ones at the National Film Theatre, the main focus of the festival. The fact that there are so many films meant that there were fewer screenings, and audiences were often forced to make hard choices. "The festival has to be as big as it can be, to get back as much money as it can," says Whitaker. "But people seem to like its size. My view is there should be films for everyone--it's not just a number game."

But there were films for everyone, ranging from the mandatory Godard and Fellini (probably included to keep the completists happy) to B-grade stuff from the USA. Thus, while there was a large audience for Godard's eclectic Nouvelle Vague, Mathew Jacob's Hallelujah anyhow had people cheering much after the screening.

A close look at the section on British cinema, however, revealed that most of the films on show had been made by television companies, specifically the BBC and Channel Four, the film industry having little to show for itself. The depressing state of affairs, according to some observers, was bound to last for some time. Film director and one of the greats of British cinema, David Lean (82), seemed to agree with this view. He regretfully informed an interviewer that he intended to migrate to France. "They don't want to make movies in England any more," said Lean. "But they like movies in France so I've decided to live there."



Though he may well fly down for the next festival in London. •

There's no such thing as a sex tonic, says Dr Prakash Kothari

Masters and Johnson were always considered the last word as far as sexual studies were concerned. Until Dr Prakash Kothari came along to turn the conventional wisdom they'd created on its head. In his recently-published book Orgasm New Dimensions, Kothari controverts the view held by Masters and Johnson—and shared by most other sexologists—that orgasm and ejaculation are synonymous.

To further popularise his theories on the subject and thereby educate the public, India's well-known sexologist intends to hold a conference on orgasm at Delhi early next year (3-6 February), the culmination of a dream that began in Caracas, Venezuela, when Kothari was honoured with the most exalted title the world of sexology has to offer.

Kothari wrote to colleagues about the proposed conference to trade information about orgasm, not only in men and women but also in eunuchs and animals. The response was good. Nineteen top sexologists from all over the world accepted with alacrity. Masters and Johnson, however, declined, ostensibly because they suffered from 'travel phobia'.

This will not prevent the International Conference on Orgasm organised by the Indian Association of Sex Educators, Counsellors and Therapists from getting underway. Financed by the doctor's friends in the jewellery business, the conference—apart from the usual reading of papers—will include Exhibition Erotica, featuring erotic paintings, manuscripts and sculptures. Also on display will be ivory dildos used by women in 18th century India.

An added attraction will be Protima Gauri Bedi, performing an Odissi ballet, Erotic Sight, based on traditional songs and dances of India. The music will be composed by Ashit Desai, and sitar maestro Pandit Ravi Shankar has promised to grace the occasion. Dr Kothari will chip in with an audio-visual show, Kamasutra which he claims will stun every delegate. A tour of the famous temples of India featuring erotic sculptures has been organised, though the delegates will have to bear travel and hotel expenses themselves. Discussions, meetings over cocktails and study groups will also be organised during the conference.

Some of the papers which are to be read promise to be interesting. Dr Hanny Lightfoot of America will talk about the orgasmic pattern of 2000 women in Africa and Sudan who had been circumcised, Dr A.K. Slob of the Netherlands will talk about orgasm in non-human species while another sexologist will read on the orgasmic pattern in eunuchs.

Says Dr Kothari: "Even in the West, they do not have diagnostic labels for women's orgasmic problems. And with men, whatever diagnostic labels are given are confusing and propagate myths. I hope this conference changes all this."

But for the present, in an interview with SUNDAY, Dr Kothari debunks some popular myths about aphrodisiacs and sex tonics.

SUNDAY: What are aphrodisiacs?
Prakash Kothari: Aphrodisiacs are substances that are supposed to enhance sexual desire. The search for such substances has been going on for centuries and continues even today. Indeed, almost every culture has attributed powers of sexual arousal to some foods or drugs. Sometimes, these even remotely resemble the male phallus, for example, carrots, asparagus and ginseng.

Claims have been made for the aphrodisiacal qualities of many prescriptions and recreational drugs too, but none of them have been proved to be directly sexually stimulating. Indirectly though, they can help sometimes.

Q: What do you mean?
A: For instance, marijuana and alcohol temporarily reduce anxiety and allay inhibitions, thereby allowing sexual desire, freer expression. Some drugs like yohimbine and papavarine increase the flow of blood in the genital apparatus, thus inducing erections. Finally, cantharidine (Spanish fly) causes irritation and inflammation of the genito-urinary tract, leading to reflex erections, but the margin between the therapeutic dose and a lethal dose is very narrow.

Q: What is papavarine?
A: Papavarine is a drug that acts as a vasodilator and muscle relaxant. It has been discovered in the recent years that a solution of the drug injected directly in the penis will result in a firm and long-lasting erection. Papaverine must, however, always be used with caution. One problem is of the erection failing to subside. If it lasts more than four hours, you must contact your physician. He can get rid of the erection by using another pharmacological agent like diluted saline solution containing epinephrine.

One shouldn't use papaverine more than twice a week as it may lead to scarring, bruising etc. Long-term use may also cause fibrosis and occasionally curved penile erection. The drug also loses its effectiveness over a period of time.

Q: Have you come across a sex tonic which can rejuvenate a person?
A: I think Karl Marx once said, "If God did not exist, Man would have to invent Him!" The same thing is true about sex tonics. Despite spending 20 years in this field, I have yet to come across anything that directly stimulates sexual desire.

Q: So you don't prescribe sex tonics?
A: No, never.

Q: Have you never prescribed tonics for your patients?
A: Well, if a patient is suffering from a physiological problem like iron deficiency-anemia and his or her sexual inadequacy is a consequence of that, then of course I prescribe iron salts. But I never prescribe anything purely as a sex tonic.

A few years ago, a patient from a Middle Eastern country was referred to me. After I treated him, he insisted that I write down a prescription for a sex tonic. I refused. Some time later, the referring physician told me that the patient's potency was failing and begged me to at least prescribe a vitamin pill. I was furious, but I finally decided to prescribe a sort of baby food and told the man to take one teaspoonful three times a day. After six months he called back to say he was fine. In fact, he felt so good about his sex life that he asked me if he could increase the dosage!

GAUTAM PATOLE

"In the Sixties, ginseng was the largest selling aphrodisiac in the American market. In fact, ginseng sometimes disrupts a woman's menstrual cycle"

Q: What about vitamin E?
A: At one time many people believed vitamin E boosted one's sex drive. This stemmed from studies that found that rats deprived of vitamin E developed sexual problems and that these abnormalities were partially reversed when the rats were given vitamin E.

Unfortunately this did not happen among human beings!

In fact, an overdose of vitamin E may result in headaches, nausea and muscle weakness.,

Q: Isn't it wrong, then, for doctors to prescribe sex tonics?

A: Yes, this practice is most unethical. Moreover, many doctors are ignorant about these matters. The psychopathology and psycho-physiology of sex and sexual dysfunctions are not taught to medicalstudents and amajority of psychiatric residents neglect such problems. As a result, very often when a patient with a sexual disorder approaches a physician, either he gets no advice at all or he is told to take some sex tonics that may do him more harm than good.

If it works, then it is purely because of faith like the example of my patient from the Middle East.

Q: You'd said earlier, that alcohol can indirectly induce freer expression of sexual desire. So what's wrong with alcohol?

A: Don't forget Shakespeare's lines that "it provokes and unprovokes, it provokes the desire but takes away the performance!" A small amount of alcohol may loosen inhibitions but an overdose will prevent an erection. Moreover, alcohol can damage the liver and lead to irreversible brain and nerve damage. Impotence caused by this kind of damage is almost impossible to cure.

Women who drink too much often report menstrual irregularities, decline in desire and difficulty in reaching orgasm.

Q: Is brown sugar a sexual stimultant?

A: At times brown sugar may have the same indirect effect on sexual desire as alcohol does. But patients addicted to brown sugar have often reported to me a tremendous decrease in sexual pleasure at the time of orgasm.

Q: Let's turn to ayurveda. There are ayurvedic medicines in the market that claim to cure all sexual dysfunctions. Do they work?

A: Absolutely not. Premature ejaculation may occur because of excessive arousal and retarded ejaculation and impotence may be the consequence of reduced arousal. How can one drug be useful for both conditions? Such claims are made to exploit the ignorant public. In fact, even in ayurveda different medications are advised for different sexual dysfunctions.

Q: What about ayurvedic medicines sold over the counter? Are they beneficial?

A: Ideally they should be prescribed . There is no generalisation in ayurveda. It clearly mentions that without knowing the prakruti (physiology) or vikruti (pathology) of a person the drug should never be administered . Charak, the authority on ayurveda mentions, "A medicine used without adequate knowledge could affect one like thunder, a sword's edge or like poison."

Q: Doesn't the preparation of ayurvedic medicine also have a bearing on its efficacy?

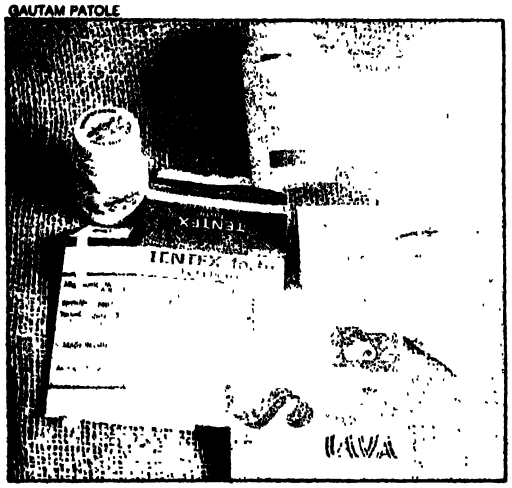
A: Of course it does , not only the preparation, but also how the herbs are grown. Chemical fertilisers could affect the efficacy of the product. The texts Charak Samhita, Krishiparashar and Amritsagar clearly mention that the plants should be grown naturally without using any artificial fertilisers. I doubt that this is truly practised today. Some classical ayurvedic authorities even specify the kind of land on which the plants must be grown. Does any one bother about that?

Dr Prakash Kothari: sex tonics can do mo

Q: What about the application of oils to increase penis length?

A: Sometimes men with perfectly adequate functioning fall prey to quacks in the hope of achieving some heroic standards of sexual performance. Research has shown that a two-inch long erect penis can satisfy a woman since only the outer third of a vagina has sensitive nerve endings.

Q: Physicians frequently prescribe Manix herbal capsules by Idoss, (a division of Wockhardt Company) for infertility and impotence. They say one must take five capsules twice a day with milk and emphasise that it is necessary to take one teaspoonful of pure ghee and one teaspoonful of honey for the desired response.



A: This is unbelievable. It violates the basic principles of ayurveda, and could be most dangerous. As Shushrut, in his book Shushrut Samhita (one of the most respected treatise on ayurveda) says, "Honey and ghee, if taken in equal proportions, are poisonous!

It appears that they have realised their mistake: they now prescribe only pure ghee!

Q: Is it a fact that ayurvedic herbal medicines do not have any expiry date at all?

A: Of course they do. Herbal churans and powder pills should be used in about three to six months and oils may rm than good be for a year or two.

Q: What about homeopathy?
A: In homeopathy there are no particular sex tonics. According to its founder, Hahnemann, homeopathy is a science based on the concept of individualisation and the concept of totality. It believes that disease is a reaction of the constitution to certain environmental stresses, external as well as internal.

Then how can homeopathy decide on the remedy for a sexual disease? It is not the analysis of the environmental factor alone but the peculiarity of the individual, of how he reacts to these factors that determine the curative homeopathic medicine. This system is highly individualistic.

Q: So you can't rely on homeopathic remedies mentioned in newspapers and magazine articles?
A: By and large, these medicines are the so-called specific drugs. Since they do not take into account the vital constitutional dimensions of the person, they are totally incapable of curing the illness. I know of a case, in which the patient was having diabetes mellitus as well as depression. After reading the newspaper remedy, he began taking the medicine for depression but the cause of his impotence was diabetes mellitus, not depression.

Q: Do homeopathic medicines have any side-effects?
A: As mentioned by Kent, a noted authority on homeopathy, "These small pills can cure sick folks, at the same time it can also kill sick folks." It's not true that homeopathic medicines have no side-effects.

Q: What about the male hormone, testosterone?
A: Testosterone is rarely necessary before the age of 55. The symptoms and metabolic tests suggest that it should only be used when there is testosterone deficiency. Moreover, tests should be done very carefully, since testosterone levels vary considerably even in the same person.

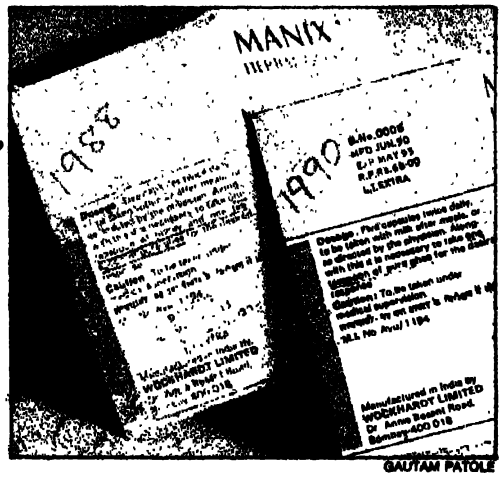
Q: Should any precautions be taken before administering testosterone?
A: Yes, older people must be rectally examined. Testosterone is known to precipitate certain kinds of cancer of the prostate gland. It can also alter liver functions and may make the previously stable diabetes mellitus unstable.

Q: Which preparations of testosterone would you recommend?
A: Oral testosterone undeconate which bypasses the liver would be safer.

Q: What is the harm in using testosterone or ayurvedic and homeopathic medicines as placebos?
A: The cost is too great. Firstly, all medicines have side-effects. Secondly, a placebo gives the patient the feeling that there is something wrong with his body when, in fact, the problem may be situational.

Q: Can pornography stimulate sexual desire?
A: Erotic art or literature may have a beneficial effect on a couple's sexual desire and could be a psychological aphrodisiac. In fact, indirect scientific evidence also suggests that pornography helps in increasing testosterone levels.

Q: Do you sometimes recommend extra-marital relations as a sex tonic? Will an affair rekindle sexual desire?
A: While I don't condemn affairs, I don't recommend them either. But I'd like to point out that a flower in someone else's garden always looks more attractive when you ignore your own.



Q: So what is the best sex tonic?
A: An understanding, sensuous and affectionate partner.

Q: If herbal ingredients are filled in gelatin capsules of animal origin, packed or stored in plastic bottles and aluminium foils, can it have a deteriorating effect on the product?
A: Yes, it may. Vaghbhat—another ancient authority on ayurveda—clearly mentions in his book Rasaratna Samuchaya that certain drugs need to be stored in a particular variety of containers only,like glass, silver, copper etc. I wonder how much the methods of preservation used today affect the efficacy of the product.

Q: What about ginseng?
A: In the 1960s, ginseng was very popular and was the largest selling aphrodisiac in the American market. It has always been known that aphrodisiacs come and go rapidly. As a matter of fact, in women, ginseng sometimes interacts with the endocrine system and disrupts the woman's menstrual cycle. ●

The centenary mess

Calcutta's Mohun Bagan Club is in the doldrums

Mohun Bagan Athletic Club of Calcutta has landed itself and the All India Football Federation (AIFF) in a mess. Celebrating its centenary, the club organised a soccer tournament which proved to be a damp squib. Besides, Mohun Bagan also faced a humiliating defeat against a young Chinese club side. At other times, this may have been taken in good grace, but with all the noise surrounding Mohun Bagan's entry into the Asian Cup Winners Cup competition, this defeat will only raise doubts about the club's entry into the Asian Football Confederation (AFC).

The situation is such that the All India Football Federation will have to do some explaining to the AFC with regard to Mohun Bagan's activities. First, the club organised what it termed as an international tournament, so substantial fees have to be paid to both the AFC and the world body, FIFA. Secondly, Mohun Bagan's name was entered in the first-ever cup winners cup competition organised in Asia, as India's representative. And now it is trying to wriggle out of the return-leg match with its Chinese rival, Dalian F.C.

The tournament was a three-team competition. The much-touted foreign team taking part was a second rate club side from Cameroon. It was stated initially that this would be a representative Cameroon team with at least six members from the side that played in the last World Cup. But that was a hoax, because the only player from that squad who took part in the tournament was Roger Milla.

The only other competitor was East Bengal, a club which drew with the Cameroon side, Diamant F.C., and also with Mohun Bagan, leaving the latter last in the three-team competition, because Mohun Bagan had earlier lost to the foreign side.

In fact, Mohun Bagan had had a dismal season in its centenary year. Its lone triumph was in the Calcutta league. Thereafter, it had failed to reach even the semi-final stages of the major competitions held in the country. This was what provoked East Bengal club to claim that it should represent the country as its champion club in the inaugural year of he AFC-run tournament.

The AIFF, however, stated that Mohun Bagan was selected on the basis of its performance in last year's competitions. There was initial confusion because the AIFF had issued a circular to the leading clubs saying that a points system had been initiated for teams reaching the semi-finals and finals of certain listed tournaments in the country, on the basis of which the champion club would be decided.

Rumours that Mohun Bagan—a club which had, till this year, refused to take part in commercially-sponsored tournaments—were enticed into entering the DCM tournament for the first time with the promise of being India's representative in the first year's Asian level club competition. But the fact remains that Mohun Bagan were in no shape to play in this kind of tournament.

Mohun Bagan had expected to achieve a lot through the tournament it had organised. But with one player of repute, Milla, in its ranks, the foreign side did not attract many spectators. And then Milla left without playing the final because he was not told that he would have to play more than one match!

With the competition a flop, Mohun Bagan pinned their hopes on the Chinese side. But even here, there was disappointment. They had hoped that Dalian would agree to play even their return-leg fixture here. But the Chinese team refused to give away their home advantage. As a last resort, they were requested to play at least an exhibition match. They refused once again.

With stands being empty on all the days that the two competitions were organised, Mohun Bagan officials panicked and asked to be excused from playing the second leg. They cited their lack of funds for making a trip to China which would cost them about Rs 4 lakhs. But the AFC stood firm and cautioned the AIFF that the Indian football body would itself be penalised if Mohun Bagan refused to play in China on 9 December.

ALOKE MITRA

Mohun Bagan playing Cameroon: dismal performance

Realising that there was no way out, the Mohun Bagan officials implored the AIFF to extend financial aid. President Priya Ranjan Das Munshi came up with an offer of almost two lakhs to bail out the club of trouble. Mohun Bagan will now make the trip, but subject to a postponement being granted if the club does not get seats on its air journey.

Now some Mohun Bagan officials are blaming it all on the AIFF, saying that it had taken the club for a ride by touting the Cameroon team as almost a national side and then luring them with the Cup winners Cup bait and forcing participation in the DCM tourney where the club performed poorly.

But all these are just excuses as club politics is said to be the main problem for Mohun Bagan. The team has played almost throughout the season and has paid dearly for it. But East Bengal officials are surely relieved that the AIFF did not give them the opportunities that were offered to Mohun Bagan. ●

Death of a PM

Ritu Sarin reconstructs the assassination of Indira Gandhi. An extract from a significant new book

Prime Minister Indira Gandhi had read the newspapers, bathed and was at her working table by 7.30 that morning. As she waited for Shyam Lal to serve her breakfast she glanced at the day's schedule prepared by her special assistant, Rajinder Kumar Dhawan.

After a two-day election tour in Orissa the programme seemed relaxed. Her daily morning darshan had been called off to accommodate a telesion interview to be conducted by Peter Ustinov of the BBC.

Breakfast was served in the study. Indira Gandhi usually ate the morning meal with the family, but on 31 October 1984 she breakfasted alone. Her son, Rajiv, was electioneering in West Bengal. Her Italian daughter-in-law, Sonia, was still in her bedroom. The grandchildren, Priyanka and Rahul, had left for school.

Breakfast was over in a few minutes. At 8.15 am Indira Gandhi came from her study to a small room at the entrance to the porch. Several people awaited the Prime Minister. Peter Ustinov's car was directed to the entrance of her office in the adjoining bungalow: 1, Akbar Road. The BBC crew were cleared by security and Ustinov's cameramen began setting up their equipment with H.Y. Sharada Prasad, the Prime Minister's information adviser, looking on.

Doctor K.P. Mathur of the Central Government Health Service, who had been Indira Gandhi's personal physician since 1966, drove in through the main gate of 1, Sarfdarjang Road and waited for the Prime Minister in the veranda. Two Doordarshan make-up artists, Kanta Pant and D.V. Nanda, who had received telephone calls from the Prime Minister's house a short while ago, were ready for the make-up session.

Indira Gandhi asked her Man Friday, Nathu Ram, to call for Dr Mathur. She sat on a stool as Kanta Pant held up a mirror and Nanda applied cream and blusher on her face.

In the lawns of 1, Akbar Road, Ustinnov and his crew were ready with their cameras mounted. Sub-inspector Rameshwar Dayal, who usually rode in the Prime Minister's pilot car, had arranged three chairs and a small table on the lawns. As he was walking across to 1, Safdarjang Road to bring flowers for the table, he saw the Prime Minister approaching.

Her last walk

It was a familiar sight. Every morning the Prime Minister would come out from the bungalow surrounded by her aides and walk down the concrete path that connected her residence and office. On 31 October 1984, when she left the house, she was followed by Dhawan. They were joined by head constable Narain Singh, who had been waiting for the Prime Minister with a black umbrella. As soon as Indira Gandhi appeared, he held it up to shield her against the sun.

Indira Gandhi noticed that one of her trusted guards, sub-inspector Beant Singh, was on duty at the wicket get which she was approaching. With him was a young constable, Satwant Singh, who had joined the Prime Minister's security a year ago. She turned back to say something to Dhawan, but stopped mid-sentence to acknowledge the greetings of the two Sikh guards with a smile. Two steps from the gate, she again turned her attention to Dhawan. Just then Beant Singh pulled his service revolver from under his jacket and pointed it at her.

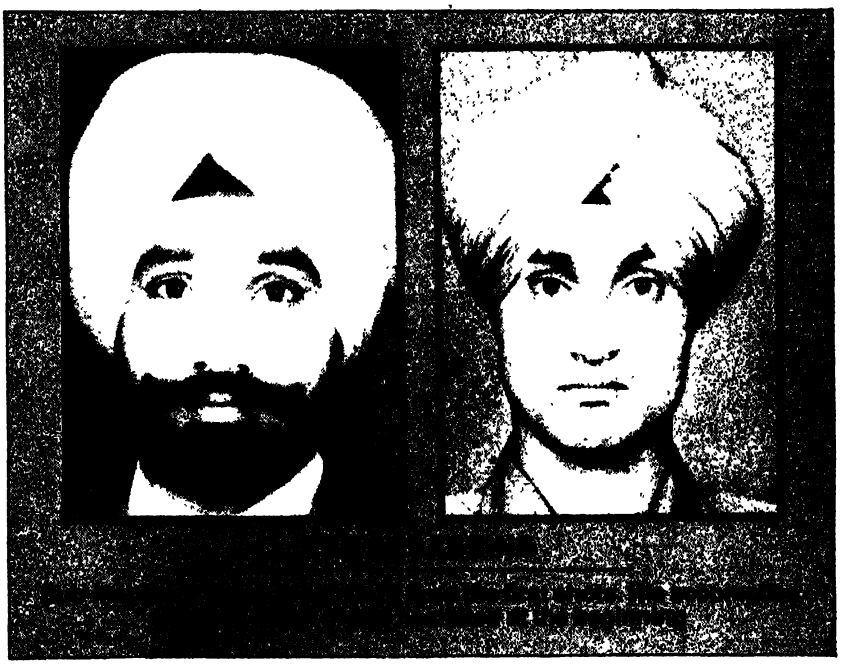
"What are you doing?" asked Indira Gandhi.

Those were the last words she spoke as the first bullet pierced her abdomen. Beant Singh kept his finger pressed on the trigger and shot her four more times at point blank range. Indira Gandhi raised her right hand to save her face from the fusillade as bullets hit her armpit and waist. Satwant Singh, who was standing outside the sentry booth five feet away, wavered for a moment before he opened fire. He had never seen the Prime Minister at such close quarters. She looked so helpless and frail. Should he fire? Or save her?

Beant Singh glared at the vacillating constable. "Are you going to kill her or not?" his expression seemed to say.

Satwant Singh had the carbine in his hand, pointed at his target. He pressed the trigger and pumped twenty-five bullets into Indira Gandhi's body. It had taken exactly 2.8 seconds to reduce India's first woman Prime Minister to a bleeding heap on the ground.

"We have done what we wanted to. Now you can do what you want to," said sub-inspector Beant Singh as he was overpowered by Narain Singh. Satwant was secured by another sub-inspector, Ganga Singh. The two were taken away to the ITBP guardroom.



Two men, who had been in the vicinity but had not seen the shooting rushed up. Dinesh Kumar Bhatt, one of the Prime Minister's personal security officers squatted beside Dhawan as Dr Opeh tried to give the dying Prime Minister mouth to mouth respiration. The Prime Minister's political adviser, Makhan Lal Fotedar, came running from the house crying loudly. He gave instructions that the escort car parked in the porch should rush Indira Gandhi to the All India Institute of Medical Sciences (AIIMS).

Half-an-hour after they had shot the Prime Minister, Beant Singh and Satwant Singh were attacked in the ITBP guardroom by the agitated commandos on duty. Instead of manacling them the commandos began to abuse and beat them up. Then, losing control, they opened up their guns. When senior Delhi police officers arrived they found Beant lying dead over the bullet-ridden body of Satwant. The two were rushed to Ram Manohar Lohia hospital in an ambulance.

At the hospital

The doctors in the AIIMS were totally unprepared to meet th crisis. Four interns were on duty in the emergency ward when Indira Gandhi was wheeled in at 9.32 am. Before the junior doctors realised who their patient was, a nurse had recognised Sonia Gandhi, who was crying silently by the side of the stretcher. One intern ran down the corridor to fetch the medical superintendent, Dr A.N Safaya. Minutes later, Dr Rajendra Prasad, a medical officer on duty that day in the casualty ward recorded the case history of the Prime Minister:

> Patient is unconscious. Face is pale. Pulse not felt. Peripheral parts cold. Blood pressure not recordable. Pupils dilated and cannot react to light on both sides. No spontaneous respiration. Heart sound not heard.

It is evident from the preliminary medical report that Indira Gandhi was clinically dead when she reached the hospital.

In the operation theatre, a team of thirty-four doctors headed by the chief of surgery, Professor P. Venugopal, struggled to revive the Prime Minister.

The death certificate was signed at 2.23 pm. By the time of the announcement of the Prime Minister's death several members of her Cabinet had arrived at the hospital. They stood in a queue silently in the corridor. Indira Gandhi's aunt, Sheila Kaul, was crying hysterically. She was from time to time comforted by Sonia Gandhi, who had by then changed into a white sari.

While the operation and the post-mortem were in progress, crowds began to gather outside the AIIMS. The first indication that all hope was lost came to them from Indira Gandhi's yoga teacher, Dhirendra Brahmachari, who came out of the hospital gates and in response to questions waved his hands in a gesture of resignation. "It all depends upon God now," he said gravely, as he left.

Indira Gandhi's estranged daughter-in-law, Maneka Gandhi was there with her son, Varun, trying unsuccessfully to reach the floor of the operation theatre. After a few minutes Maneka left the hospital with tears streaming down her cheeks. "I pray that she lives a 100 years," she wept.

Rajiv Gandhi heard the news as he was touring the Kolaghat district of West Bengal. A police jeep intercepted his Mercedes Benz and an officer told him that an accident had taken place at his home. Rajiv Gandhi switched on his transistor and learnt from the BBC that his mother had been critically injured. A plane was arranged to fly him home.

Unlike the earlier two occasions when a Prime Minister had died in office in independent India, on 31 October 1984, the question of succession was not disputed. In 1964, when Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru had died and in 1966 when his successor, Lal Bahadur Shastri, passed away, Union home minister Gulzari Lal Nanda had taken over as caretaker Prime Minister. There were no contenders for the post this time. Even before Rajiv Gandhi had landed in Delhi, a signature drive was on to swear him in as Prime Minister.

At 4.15 pm, all the ministers present in the AIIMS left for 1, Akbar Road where another minister, Shiv Shankar, had informed them that an informal Cabinet meeting would take place. Other leaders were told by P.C. Alexander to proceed to the Durbar Hall in Rashtrapati Bhavan where the swearing-in would take place. They were all waiting for President Zail Singh to return. The Presidential plane from Yemen landed at 5.10 pm and the President drove directly to the AIIMS. There he consoled Rajiv Gandhi in the conference hall.

As the President's motorcade left the hospital, some hooligans pelted the cars with stones. Nobody was hurt but it was the first incident in which the people of Delhi reacted violently against the Sikh community. By then it was known that two Sikh guards had assassinated the Prime Minister.

Soon afterwards, the President was given a handwritten letter by the general secretary of the All India Congress Committee (AICC), G.K. Moopanar. It said that the Central Parliamentary Board of the party had recommended the name of Rajiv Gandhi as Prime Minister.

At 6.57 pm Rajiv Gandhi was administered the oath of office in the ornate Ashoka Hall of Rashtrapati Bhavan. After the swearing-in, he returned home.

Twelve hours after she had been shot, Indira Gandhi's body was brought back to 1, Safdarjang Road in a gun carriage. Her body was draped in the national flag and was covered with garlands of her favourite marigold flowers.

Why was she murdered?

'Among the last to speak to Indira Gandhi before she was assassinated was D.V. Nanda, the cosmetician from Doordarshan. Nanda recalled an earlier assignment where he had been called to help with Indira Gandhi's make-up on 2 June 1984. On that day Indira Gandhi made one of the most momentous decisions of her political career—she ordered the Indian Army to storm the Golden Temple in Amritsar where militant leader Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale and his armed followers had defied the police for several months. Indira Gandhi felt that she should prepare the nation for the step she was about to take with a special television and radio broadcast.

In her speech Indira Gandhi appealed to the Sikhs to shun violence and invited leaders of Punjab's dominant political party, the Akali Dal, to return to the negotiating table.

Bhindranwale, an obscure 35-year-old preacher was discovered by the Congress in 1977 when he became head of the Damdami Taksal, the oldest theological seminary of the Sikhs. Encouraged by the patronage he received from people high in the administration and the Congress party, Bhindranwale changed his role from that of a purveyor of religion to that of a rabble-rouser.

In a few months Bhindranwale had all but abandoned his amrit prachar (baptism by nectar) which had won him many admirers among orthodox Sikhs and began to abuse Hindus and applaud the killings of prominent Hindu and Sikh leaders who had dared to criticise him.

His first targets were the Nirankaris, a breakaway sect of the Sikhs who had gained a sizeable following among the Hindus as well. The Nirankaris were holding a convention in Amritsar on the festival of Baisakhi on 13 April 1978. Bhindranwale declared he would disrupt the congregation. His disciples marched in procession to the venue, waving swords and shouting slogans. A pitched battle broke out in which three Nirankaris and 16 Sikhs were slain. Among the Sikhs was one of Bhindranwale's confidants, Fauja Singh. At the request of the Nirankaris the police case that was instituted against the combatants was transferred to Haryana where all the Nirankaris were acquitted.

Bhindranwale vowed to avenge

THE CAUSE

It was Operation Bluestar that so estranged Beant Singh that he decided to take his revenge on Indira Gandhi himself against the Nirankaris. On 24 April 1980, Baba Gurbachan Singh, the Nirankari chief who was injured in the 1978 clash, was murdered in his New Delhi residence. The police had enough reason to suspect that the killing had been ordered by Bhindranwale and mentioned his name in their report. On 9 September 1981, Lal Jagat Narain, proprietor of the Hind Samachar group of newspapers of Jalandhar (which had the largest circulation in northern India) and who was a staunch critic of Bhindranwale, was murdered while travelling by car on the Grand Trunk Road.

Emboldened by these 'successes' Bhindranwale extended his hit list to anyone who dared to cross his path. Shortly after dawn on 23 April 1983, a deputy inspector general (DIG) of police, A.S. Atwal, was shot in the Golden Temple as he left the shrine after saying his prayers. Barely a month ago Atwal had infiltrated Bhindranwale's ranks through a police informer and had laid a trap for one of the Sant's killer-gangs as they set out on a mission. One of them was killed and three injured in the encounter. For the success of the police trap, Atwal paid with his life.

All this while Bhindranwale and his henchmen camped in the Guru Nanak Niwas, adjoining the Golden Temple. On 15 December 1983, much to the chagrin of the Akali leaders, he shifted his headquarters to the Akal Takht. He took along with him Bhai Amrik Singh, the young president of the All India Sikh Students' Federation (AISSF), an organisation banned by Indira Gandhi in 1967.

Bhindranwale began to convert the sacred building into an armed stronghold. The fortification was handled by his military strategist, a retired army officer, major general Shahbeg Singh.

One of the first things Shahbeg Singh did after shifting to the Akal Takht was to take over high buildings surrounding the Golden Temple. Rooftops would provide his snipers strategic positions to deter an invading force. Arms and ammunition were smuggled into the Golden Temple in trucks carrying food-grains for the temple kitchen, pill-boxes were erected in the marble trellis along the parikrama. Mini firing ranges were constructed in the basement of the Akal Takht. Shahbeg Singh went about his job with military thoroughness. Murderous assaults on prominent Hindu and Sikh leaders continued. H.S. Manchanda, a pro-Congress Sikh president of the Delhi Gurdwara Committee, was shot dead in his car at a busy thoroughfare in the city. A few days later the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) leader, Harbans Lal Khanna, was killed in Amritsar. On 12 May 1982, Bhindranwale avenged his being named in the murder of Lala Jagat Narain, by having Jagat Narain's son, Romesh Chander, who had continued to attack him in Punjab Kesari, murdered in Jalandhar. The killing indicated that the hit lists, the militants kept referring to, did actually exist. By effortlessly ticking off targets from their lists, the militants reduced the government and the police machinery to impotence. In just five months in 1984 (from January to May) over 150 people were murdered by Bhindranwale's men.

Other serious developments took place in Punjab. The demand for Khalistan (literally, the land of the pure)—a sovereign Sikh state- -gained a measure of acceptance, and Akali leaders tacitly lent support to it by refusing to condemn it. The Akalis had their own reasons for not curbing Bhindranwale. They accused the government for having supported Bhindranwale when he was hardly known outside a few districts of central Punjab. They also blamed the government for not accepting the demands of the Sikhs spelt out in the Anandpur Sahib Resolution of 1973 and endorsed by the party convention in Ludhiana in 1978. In protest they launched a morcha (agitation) under the overall command of Sant Harchand Singh Longowal.

It was then that Indira Gandhi decided that the government had no option but to beard the Akali lions in their own den. Ten people were killed outside the Golden Temple on the very day Indira Gandhi made her broadcast to the nation. Even as she was speaking, three brigades of the Indian Army, including an artillery unit, had landed in the holy city. More troops were on their way to Amritsar from their units in Jalandhar. The previous day, a clean-shaven Sikh officer, Major General Kuldip Singh Brar, was seen walking along the parikrama making a reconnaissance of the Golden Temple. The general later briefed his men from the 9th Division on their mission.

Even President Zail Singh, with whom Indira Gandhi had discussed the deteriorating situation in Punjab three days earlier, had been kept in the dark about the nature of the military operation code-named Bluestar.

Operation Bluestar proved to be the second major blunder committed by Indira Gandhi as Prime Minister of India. The first was the imposition of Emergency in 1975. Both these actions were typical of the way she dealt with intractable problems.

Indira Gandhi also ignored the ethics of sending the army, meant to combat foreign invaders, to fight the country's own nationals. The army suffered from the basic disadvantage of having been trained for combat warfare and occupying enemy territory; it was not geared to face religious fanatics eager to achieve martyrdom.

She had been warned by the top brass of the army and the intelligence about what to expect once the troops were inside the temple. Lt General Krishnaswamy Sundarji, commander-in-chief of the Western Command, who headed the operation had estimated it would take five hours to flush the militants out from their entrenchments.

The government had chosen an inopportune time to storm the temple. Hundreds of pilgrims had come to Amritsar to celebrate the martyrdom of the founder of the Golden Temple, Guru Arjun Dev. Once the siege began, many of the devotees were trapped inside. Their situation was worsened because power and water supply to the temple had been disconnected. The rest of the country knew little of all this. Curfew had been imposed in Amritsar, and Punjab had been cut off from the rest of the country by rail and air. Press censorship had been imposed.

General Sundarji, who was in overall command, had worked out a blueprint for the operation. A communications cell had been set up near the temple with a hotline to New Delhi. In the capital, the unit was manned by deputy defence minister K.P. Singh Deo. Rajiv Gandhi was by his side. They kept the Prime Minister informed about the developments. Arun Singh had visited Amritsar but was back in New Delhi on 4 June, 1984, when the army assault began. Along with the Golden Temple, 37 other gurdwaras all over Punjab were invested. The firing began on the night of 4 June and carried on intermittently throughout the following day. Before the troops entered the main temple on the evening of 5 June, they neutralised the three structures used as observation posts and sniper nests by the militants. There were two 18th century bungas (minarets) and a high, ornate water-tower, which overlooked the main entrance of the temple. The tops of all three were blasted off by 3.7 inch mountain guns of World War II vintage.

After the approach road to the temple had been cleared, General Sundarji sent out his commandos and frogmen to see if they could approach the Akal Takht by crawling along the parikrama or by swimming across the pool.

While Bhindranwale had not desecrated the Harminder Sahib by his armed presence, he had no scruples in converting the Akal Takht into an impenetrable fortress. As General Brar said later, "It (the Akal Takht) was a bastion of automatic weapons." The attempt of army paratroopers to capture the fortified Akal Takht under the cover of darkness was a disaster.

On the morning of 6 June, General Sundarji approached New Delhi for permission to use tanks. Indira Gandhi was informed that the troops were facing tough resistance, the jawans were being butchered and the only way to end the resistance was to get to the Akal Takht in tanks. The Prime Minister reluctantly agreed. General Brar tried a last-ditch attempt to save the Akal Takht from damage. He sent an armoured personal carrier along the eastern parikrama. It was promptly knocked out by a rocket-propelled grenade. Intelligence reports had said nothing about the militants possessing rockets.

Soon after this, seven of the Indian Army's Vijayanta tanks entered the Golden Temple. The one in the lead rolled down the marble steps crushing them to rubble. It came to a halt about halfway down the parikrama from where it opened fire at the Akal Takht. Shells went through the darshani deori (outer gate of the Harminder) and others landed on the Akal Takht and brought down the upper roof on the heads of its defenders.

Around the same time, the library and archives of the Golden Temple were gutted by fire. Ancient manuscripts and handwritten copies of Guru Granth Sahib were burnt to ashes. The destruction of the library outraged the Sikhs as much as the demolition of the Akal Takht.

When the army finally stormed the Akal Takht they found 31 corpses in the basement. Among them were the bodies of Bhindranwale, his trusted aide, Amrit Singh, and General Shahbeg Singh. The militants had died fighting Indira Gandhi's army to the end.

The Sikhs protest

As news of Operation Bluestar spread, Sikhs all over the world went into mourning. When they learnt that the Akal Takht had been damaged and Bhindranwale killed, they condemned the attack on their Vatican as an assault on the entire religious community.

The first violent protest against Operation Bluestar came from Sikh soldiers—who constitute 11 per cent of the strength of the Indian Army, though the Sikhs form less than two per cent of the country's population. Rumours of genocide and the destruction of the Harminder Sahib were rife as hundreds of Sikhs deserted their regiments to answer the call of their faith.

Meanwhile civilian Sikhs demonstrated their displeasure in a variety of ways. In Punjab, two Congress(I) MPs—the scion of the Patiala family, Captain Amrinder Singh, and Devinder Singh Garcha—resigned from Parliament. In an interview given shortly afterwards, Captain Amrinder Singh claimed that nearly 3,000 pilgrims had been killed in the operation. He had arrived at this estimate on the basis of the unclaimed footwear found at the entrance of the shrine. Honours were flung back. Three eminent Sikhs—Khushwant Singh, Bhagat Puran Singh and professor Ganda Singh—returned the Padma Bhushan awards given to them by the government.

THE FUNERAL

It was the end of an era. Rajiv Gandhi, along with the nation, mourned the demise

As the backlash gained momentum, Sikhs almost triggered off a constitutional crisis in the country. President Zail Singh was under heavy pressure by his community to resign. Hundreds of letters and telegrams poured into Rashtrapati Bhavan—some blaming him, as supreme commander of the armed forces, for Operation Bluestar; others urged him to step down from office. Zail Singh said he would not take a decision till he had seen the damage done to the shrine with his own eyes. He was warned against such a move, but the President, a deeply religious man, stuck to his resolve.

Sniper's bullets still flew and pools of blood congealed on the parikrama when President Zail Singh visited the Golden Temple on 8 June, 1984. He was taken on a guided tour of the temple but no amount of explanation assuaged his anguish and he broke down and prayed for forgiveness.

Operation Bluestar and after

In the days following the operation, measures were taken by the government which instead of healing the hurt feelings of the Sikhs further alienated them. The army launched yet another operation code-named Woodrose, which involved searching the houses of the Sikh peasantry for terrorists. In over three months the army achieved little success.On the contrary, allegations of brutality committed by the army caused deep resentment. Stories began to circulate that the army and the police murdered captives they did not want to bring to justice in cold blood. Every confrontation was condemned as a faked encounter.

The resentment displayed by the Sikhs in India was matched by the violent protests of Sikhs living abroad. They marched in the streets of London, New York, Toronto and Vancouver holding banners claiming they would avenge Operation Bluestar. Dr Jagjit Singh Chauhan,a physician living in London who had earlier declared himself president of Khalistan, went as far as to announce in an interview with the BBC that Indira Gandhi would shortly be assassinated. "Mrs Gandhi made a fatal mistake in raiding the Golden Temple. Every man who thinks himself as a Sikh can never forget that she has signed her own death warrant," he told another interviewer.

Indira Gandhi knew she was a marked person. Among the papers found on her table was a note believed to have been written by her sometime in late June:

If I die a violent death as people have been plotting, I know the action of the assassin will be in the thought and action of the assassin, not in the dying-...for no hate is dark enough to overshadow the extent of my love for my people and my country, no force is strong enough to divert me from my purpose and my endeavour to take this country forward.

Although Indira Gandhi had a premonition that she would die a violent death, she was confident that she would be able to, somehow, win back the hearts of the people. But officials responsible for Indira Gandhi's security did not share her confidence. These included Ram Nath Kao, who was responsible for establishing the country's external intelligence service, the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW), in 1968, and R.K. Kapoor, the chief of the IB. While both kept the Prime Minister posted on security matters, her personal safety remained the charge of the Delhi Police.

The thrust of the reorganised security at 1 Safdarjang Road after Operation Bluestar according to H.D. Pillai, the additional commissioner who was among those suspended after the assassination, was to prevent an attack from the outside. "What we did not perceive was that an attempt could be made inside the Prime Minister's house," the officer admitted later.

Dangerous liaisons

Hindu militants attack V.P. Singh in Bhopal

MADHYA PRADESH

Suddenly V.P. Singh had lost his importance. Ever since the former Prime Minister announced his plans to visit the state capital on the sixth anniversary of the Bhopal gas disaster, activists of the Bharatiya Janata Yuva Morcha (BJYM), the youth wing of the BJP, and the Bajrang Dal, an organisation of Hindu militants, were out to create trouble. They were sulking since the events in Ayodhya last month in which several kar sevaks were killed for violating prohibitory orders at the controversial Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid site, and were bent on disrupting Singh's programme. And yet, the callous administration failed to take preventive measures.

When the Tamil Nadu Express, carrying Singh and other Janata Dal leaders, pulled into Bhopal on 2 December, Singh was greeted by a virulent crowd, shouting "Jai Shri Ram", "V.P. Singh wapas jao", "V.P. Singh gaddar hai" (Go back V.P. Singh; V.P. Singh is a traitor.) And as the leaders tried to find their way out of the station, a free-for-all ensued between the agitated BJYM workers and the Dal activists, who threw a security ring round their leaders. But in the melee, V.P. Singh sustained minor injuries.

Tension had been mounting from morning, as the BJYM and the Bajrang Dal had sworn to prevent Singh's entry into the city. So the activists of the two outfits thronged the station well in advance, and started raising slogans and pelting stones when Singh arrived. They also set alight an arch put up to welcome the Dal leaders, and complete chaos prevailed. The scene outside the station was equally violent. The crowd set ablaze a police jeep parked nearby and damaged private vehicles.

And the mob did not spare the press or the train passengers either. Many bystanders and mediapersons were beaten up, and one photographer was badly injured.

V.P. Singh at the dharna outside the CM's house, and an apologetic Patwa

Apparently, the police had been caught unawares. It swung into action belatedly, and there was a fierce lathicharge. They managed to whisk Singh and the other Dal leaders to the safety of the station superintendent's room, and later escorted them out of the station through the VIP exit. But the trouble was in no way over. The mob continued to pursue the leaders and as the convoy of cars started, acid bulbs were hurled at it. Though Singh and Dal president S.R. Bommai escaped this attack, the Indore Janata Dal leader, Bala Beg was injured.

Bommai, who was manhandled at one stage and got his spectacles broken, and other Dal leaders such as Sharad Yadav and Ramanand Singh, who suffered varied degrees of injuries, felt that the state government failed to make available the protocol arrangements due to a former Prime Minister and accused the administration of conniving with the attackers. The Dal leaders decided to abandon all programmes and sat in dharna in front of chief minister Sunderlal Patwa's house, refusing to budge even when Patwa asked them in. The chief minister then came out to express his regrets, which did not soften the smarting Dal leaders.

There is little doubt that the BJP leaders were nursing a grudge against Singh and other Janata Dal leaders loyal to him since the events in Ayodhya. Though Patwa and BJP MP Kailash Sarang vehemently denied that the BJP was in any way linked with the day's incidents, the Dal leaders pointed out to Patwa that two of his ministers, Babulal Gaur and Laxmi Narayan Sharma, besides Sarang himself, were present at the railway station and had been directing the attack.

When Patwa failed to persuade the Dal leaders to call off the dharna, he issued a statement that betrayed his mind. Though he regretted the attacks on Singh and others, Patwa hastened to remind the Dal leaders about the Ayodhya incidents and warned that the country would not forget the treatment meted out to the kar sevaks.

Significantly, Patwa has not ordered any inquiry into the incident and maintains that he would consider taking such a step only after he received a full report on the happenings.

In the face of a countrywide condemnation, BJP president L.K. Advani hoped that his partymen were not involved in the incidents and promised to get to the truth. But his party leaders in Madhya Pradesh were not happy with his remarks as they seemed to betray Advani's lack of faith in the denials issued by Patwa and his associates. It is unlikely, however, that the BJP national executive will openly censure the state unit on this issue and, once more, Patwa may throw political civilities to the wind. ●

Laloo gives berths

To a record number of ministers

BIHAR

Only Laloo Yadav could have done it. And he did. He inducted 60 new members to his 11-member ministry. So now the primary task of the state is to build rooms for the honourable ministers. Yes, rooms, just to counter the rumour that the ministry was taking the shape of an airbus. Besides, said the chief minister, this ministry was better looked upon as "the ninth fleet of Russia, fitted with all the sophisticated weapons, to counter every hostile move".

Laloo Prasad Yadav: thinking big

So much for confidence. And if five of his followers had not opted out, Laloo would have had 76 ministers in all. But one wanted to be deputy CM and the other four were not pleased with the berths offered. So Laloo now has 71 ministers and five potential trouble-makers in his government. Which undeniably breaks the 1980 record of Andhra Pradesh CM, T. Anjiah, who just had a 60-member ministry.

This comes in the wake of the "intensity of dissension" that Yadav assessed recently. But the doling out of ministerial seats did not help much. The caste balance has gone haywire, for one. The Yadavs, with 16 seats, have the lion's share. Harijans have 11, Brahmins, Bhumihars and Kurmis five each, Koeris three, other castes together have nine. No tribal has been given a berth, although Muslims have eight. This comes as a surprise, since the Jharkhand Mukti Morcha (JMM), which has 19 legislators and supports the state government, might retaliate.

The uncrowned members, of course, are not pleased. "The ministry is as large as Laloo's family," said one. And with the help of the ousted heavyweight of Bihar Dal politics, Raghunath Jha, these unhappy fellows are sure to find a voice.

For the moment, however, everybody is busy accomodating the CM's new "clout". "The immediate task at hand is to build rooms," said a top official, "and the rooms have to be fitted with various gadgets, too." At present there are only 40 rooms in the secretariat that can be used as official chambers of the ministers. And the finance department, which takes care of the ministers' transport, has a shortage of cars with VIP lights. Unhappily, the department agrees that there is no alternative to buying new cars for the new faces.

And once the ministry has sorted out where to sit and how to travel, the "ninth fleet of Russia" is sure to zoom off. •

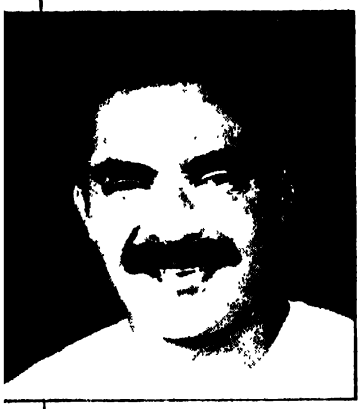
Mani matters

Shekhar leaves the Kerala Congress(M) chief high and dry

KERALA



It seems just like old times. After a protracted and unofficial ceasefire, things are on the boil in the Opposition UDF (United Democratic Front) in Kerala. A humiliated Kerala Congress (Mani) and a frustrated Muslim League—constituents of the UDF—are gunning for big brother Congress(I), who they feel has badly let them down. The two regional parties, which have deep roots in Kerala, always wanted a berth in the Union Cabinet. But Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar's ministry-making has left the two staunch Congress(I) allies in Kerala high and dry.

The advent of Chandra Shekhar's minority government at the Centre brightened the prospects of these two regional but basically communal parties of Kerala, representing the Christians and Muslims in the state. When Shekhar got down to the job of forming his ministry, the Janata Party leader, Subramaniam Swamy, offered on behalf of the PM, a berth to the Kerala Congress (Mani), which has one member in the Lok Sabha and another in the Rajya Sabha. For some time the 25-year-old breakaway Congress faction, which has been playing a key role in Kerala's delicately balanced communal politics on the strength of its Syrian Christian vote-bank, seemed to be close to its target. Kerala Congress(M), when it started negotiating with Subramaniam Swamy, made it clear that it wanted nothing less than a Cabinet post. Its argument was that in V.P. Singh's ministry the lone MP and leader of the Congress(S), K.P. Unnikrishnan, also from Kerala, was given a Cabinet post.

The party also decided that a post, if offered by the PM, would go to none other than its chairman K.M. Mani. And, if a lower post was offered, the nominee was to be chosen by Mani from the party's Lok Sabha MP, P.C.

Thomas, a political greenhorn, and Thomas Kuthiravattom, whose Rajya Sabha term ends in April next year.

Mani is one of Kerala's shrewdest politicians and an able administrator. He has presented as many as eight budgets as finance minister for various coalition governments led by the CPI, CPI(M) and the Congress(I). The Congress(I) and the CPI(M) had, in the past, tried to cut Mani's political clout but failed. Each time he rebounded with greater force and today Mani is one of the most powerful men in Kerala politcs.

A shrewd politician and an able administrator, Mani was promised a seat in Shekhar's Cabinet. A few hours before the swearing-in, he was dumped unceremoniously Swamy, after consulting Chandra Shekhar, readily agreed to Mani's request. The Janata Dal(S) was keen on inducting Mani, for the sake of the Christian community, and also to give representation to the state at the Centre. But as Mani went shopping in Delhi to buy an achkan for his swearing-in ceremony, Congress(I) MPs from Kerala opposed Shekhar's decision. Said a top Congress(I) MP from the state: "Mani is a master manipulator and even if he became a Union Cabinet minister for a week it would hurt the Congress(I)'s interest.

So Congress(I) veterans Karunakaran and A.K. Antony quietly worked to nip Mani's ambitions. When Mani got wind of Karunakaran's plans to sabotage his chances, he met Congress(I) president Rajiv Gandhi and complained against the party's Kerala leaders. Rajiv, apparently, assured him a berth, but Vincent George, Rajiv's Man Friday from Kerala, advised Mani to sort out with Karunakaran a way to get into the Rajya Sabha.

On the day before the swearing-in ceremony, Swamy asked Mani to be at the Rashtrapati Bhavan at 8.45 am. Passes were even set aside for Mani's party colleagues so that they could be present at the "historic" event. Mani went to bed happy and contented.

At about 1 am Swamy called Mani up to deliver a shocking piece of news: Chandra Skekhar wanted to induct sitting MPs only in the first round. Mani, a heart patient, nearly collapsed and his colleagues say that he was trembling with rage. The Kerala Congress(M) leaders then raced to Karunakaran's house, woke him up and hurled abuses at him.

Chief minister Nayanar also picked up the issue to discredit the Congress. Faced with a barrage of criticisms from the public and the press, the state unit of the Congress(I) sought to make amends by promising to work for Mani's induction at the time of Shekhar's Cabinet expansion.

But the Congress(I) has others to placate as well. The Muslim League, the second largest constituent of the UDF, is pressuring the Congress(I) to secure a berth for it also in the Shekhar ministry. Sources say that Karunakaran was in no position to antagonise the League by supporting Mani's inclusion, as the party already has two MPs in the Lok Sabha. As it is, the Congress-League relations have been strained in recent times and Mani's induction could have caused a rupture. ●

CPI(M) dissidents hit out at the party leadership

WEST BENGAL

The carefully hidden cracks in the Marxist citadel have suddenly come under the spotlight. CPI(M) dissidents belonging to 16 Marxist organisations and till now working in isolation, decided to come out in the open and organise a joint rally in the city on 30 November. The rally was against the ruling Left Front, and accused the CPI(M) of corruption, nepotism and destroying the very values which had helped the party to grow to its present strength in West Bengal. The dissidents called upon the left and democratic forces in the state to build a sustained movement and expose the bankruptcy of the CPI(M).

Some years back, when a handful of expelled CPI(M) members in north 24 Parganas decided to contest a few seats in the civic polls against the party leadership in the Barrackpore industrial belt, many thought it to be an adventurous task. But today the dissidents suddenly appear to have the Burial of the dead

Locals protest against a public place being used as a graveyard

When 72-year-old Abul Hasim died on 3 December, his son Afaque Zaman Khan approached the Calcutta Improvement Trust (CIT) seeking permission to bury his father in their family burial ground. That, however, is now a part of the Mukta Mancha (open-air theatre) complex owned by the CIT. This request was so surprising that the CIT officer-in-charge, Tamal Dasgupta, promptly referred the case to the chief valuer, Rupendra Kumar Mitra, who—as the officer in charge of land disputes and legal affairs—went through all the relevant papers to grant permission to Khan. The letter stated that when the premises had been acquired, on 31 March, 1975, under CIT scheme no. LXXIV (Rabindra Sarovar), "12 square feet was excluded from the limit of acquisition, to be utilised for the burial of Sheikh Jummon Mistri, the Wakf and other members of his family".

The permission granted, Khan and the funeral procession reached the Mukta Mancha complex, only to be stopped by the local police officer-in-charge (OC), Mihir Kumar Gupta. Says Gupta, "We needed to verify certain technical details before allowing the burial—namely, the exact location of the graveyard, whether the letter was genuine and if Khan had the final disposal orders from the municipality." Khan was able to satisfy Gupta and after due consideration, the police allowed the burial to take place at 7.30 pm.

But this bizarre incident was strongly opposed by the locals, who object to the burial not only because it sets a bad precedent, but also for reasons of hygiene. "It is a public place," says a visibly irritated local. "Even if the land belongs to that family, does that mean they can bury their dead in it? Am I allowed to cremate a body in my backyard?"

That hardly helps the situation at hand. And the CPI seems to have a lot of answering to do.

potential of providing an alternative to the Marxists. In the earlier strongholds of the CPI(M), like the southern areas of the city—Dhakuria, Jadavpore, Garia, Tollygunge—and in many districts of the state, CPI(M) cadres are getting increasingly disillusioned with the party and building alternative fora to air their views.

"The CPI(M) is no longer the party where debates and discussions could be held," said the party septuagenarian leader from Jadavpur, Sachin Sen, whose association with the party spans more than four decades. "I have pointed out to the leaders many times the rampant corruption among party members, but no one bothered to take any notice of it. Instead they decided to expel me from the party."

Another veteran CPI(M) leader and former legislator of the party from Burdwan, Harmohan Singh, pointed out how members are expelled from the party on utterly flimsy grounds, simply if they dare to raise any questions regarding the corruption in the organisation. "They charged me of carrying out developmental work without the party's sanction," he said. "But that did not stop them from highlighting the developmental work that I had done for the area in their election speeches."

The significance of the rally was not in the size of the crowd (the turnout was not too impressive, anyway), but in the fact that this was the first time since the Left Front came to power in the state in 1977, that the CPI(M) rebels have decided to come out in the open and throw a challenge to the party leadership. Till now, CPI(M) dissidents forced to leave the party had been operating in splinter groups in different districts. But now, the dissident leaders point out, over the last few years the splinters established contact which resulted in this broad-based unity of the 16 Marxist organisations. Reduced to a party of yes-men, nepotism within and outside the party had stifled the voice of protest and those party members who dared to protest were summarily thrown out of the party, the dissidents said. "Though the government of the working class is still firmly ensconced in the Writers Buildings, life continues to be unbearable for the people of the state," said a dissident leader from Nadia, Arun Bhattacharya. "The CPI(M) has been in power for 14 years on the strength of the communist movement all of us helped to build—yet the masses continue to be exploited."

Realising the growing strength of the Congress(I) in the state, the dissident leaders stressed that their primary task would be to re-instill confidence and faith of the people on the left movement. Dulal Chakraborty, former district secretariat member of the north 24 Parganas district committee, said that the apathy of the CPI(M) leaders towards launching any kind of movement had turned the people against the leftists. "We have to re-instill the faith of the people that leftism is still the answer to their problems." Ruling out the possibility of launching a new party at the moment, Chakraborty pointed out that such a step would not help solve the problems of the masses. "We have to begin our mass-contact programme now," said the dissident leader, adding that the overdependence of the CPI(M) on elements like Lallu and Billu had distanced the people from it.

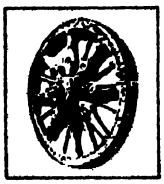
Enthused by the rally's success, the dissident leaders are now thinking of holding a state convention in the city early next year. The response of disgruntled members, they said,had been overwhelming. Members who are still within the organisation only because of the lack of a proper platform, had expressed their willingness to join the dissidents, it seemed. Not only those who had been expelled from the CPI(M), but other leaders, who had once been part of the Left Front, are being contacted. One such leader, former PWD minister, Jatin Chakraborty, recently expelled from the RSP, not only attended the dissidents' rally, but also assured them of his active participation in future programmes.

But the dissidents have not yet chalked out their alternative programme to counter the CPI(M). "At present, we just want the CPI(M) to implement its party programme adopted in 1964—but the Marxists are not even doing that," said Chakraborty. The dissidents would like to bring about some changes in the party's earlier programme, he added, and a change in the party's structure.



Jatin Chakraborty also pointed out that the present situation was similar to that in 1964, when the undivided Communist party of India split to give birth to the CPI(M). The people of West Bengal were looking for an alternative to the ruling Left Front, he asserted.

Political circles in the state, however, remain skeptical about the future of the dissidents. Unless the dissident leaders can actually come out with an alternative programme, they cannot hope to have much of an impact.●

Invitation to a battering

Biju advises the people to take the law into their own hands

ORISSA

Beat up corrupt officials, said Biju Patnaik to his people, and promptly got beaten up himself. Undaunted, he nursed his broken nose, washed his bleeding face, and stuck to his appeal to the public. So, the next day, it was the party's deputy chief whip in the Assembly, Pradip Maharathi's turn. That too in his own constituency, Pipli.

Stop, cried one's senses. But not Biju's. He had appealed to his people, declared his "helplessness" as chief minister faced with such a "corrupt" bureaucracy, and asked the public to go ahead and beat up the crooks. This he did at a public meeting at Sambalpur, on 29 November. Later he confirmed the statement at a press conference, and added that MLAs, ministers and even the chief minister should not be exempted. And the assaulters should send a telegram earlier, just to inform the officer that he would be assaulted, and if the officer is found to be truly corrupt by the state, then no action would be taken against the attackers.

Hardly had the news spread, when Biju faced people willing to take up his request. On 3 December, a group of young enthusiasts in Kalahandi flung a barrage of questions at him, on his government's "failure" on all fronts. Soon brickbats replaced the questions. But a most battered Biju refused to accept this as an answer to his call to the people. He blamed the Congress(I).

Biju Patnaik: yes, chief minister

He had not, however, blamed the Congress(I), when the chief medical officer of Puri, Dr Gunanidhi Bhuyan, was allegedly assaulted by local Dal members for violating government orders by using the official vehicle on a Saturday. Bhuyan's explanation that he was going to check out a sudden outbreak of gastro-enteritis, did not satisfy the agitated public. And the CM stoutly defended the hooligans. "He must have deserved it," he announced. Somehow, the assault on himself did not bring out the same emotions in the CM.

But former Congress(I) minister Niranjan Patnaik points out that the place of attack was Kalahandi. The locals are naturally quite upset over lack of development activities in the poverty-stricken area, and might have taken the cue from Biju's call to the people.

Even West Bengal chief minister Jyoti Basu, on holiday in Puri, commented that the whole thing was "unfortunate", and hurried to add that he had no concrete idea about the CM's call to the people. Unlike Basu, Janata Dal (S) leader and minister of state for railways, Bhakta Charan Das, was blunt. This reflected Biju's "inability to meet the people's growing disenchantment with his rule," Das declared. And the dissident Dal members, who are trying their level best to split Biju's party, seem to have scored, thanks to the CM himself. Besides, his own admission of "helplessness" and appeal to the people to take the law into their own hands has prompted the Congress(I) to demand his resignation.

All said and done, his idea of moralistic punishments has not gone down well at all. It will only alienate the bureaucracy further. And that might not help Biju achieve his much-publicised dream of a prosperous Orissa. Said an administrative official, "It is the proverbial case of the bad workman blaming his tools." A battered chief minister may be just the beginning. ●

ODDS AND TRENDS

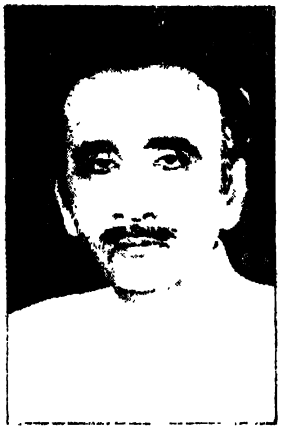
■ Indians may soon find former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher consoling herself in Bhagwan Rajneesh's ashram in Pune. That is, if she accepts the invitation recently sent to her by the ashram, to rid her of a "deep sense of inferiority"

Swami Devageet, the late Bhagwan's dentist, believes that Thatcher's "Queen-like behaviour is just a strategy to conceal a deep-seated feeling of inferiority. What she needs first is a cleansing catharsis, with plenty of screaming and beating pillows to release her repressed anger and frustration."

Did anyone say Indians didn't care?

Second to one

■ Believe it or not. A recent survey conducted by The Sun, a London tabloid, ranked the Delhi Police second among the police forces of seven major cities around the world for "courtesy and responsiveness".



Delhi just lost out to London, while Moscow, Munich, New York, Brussels and Paris followed, in that order.

In the survey, the basic questions asked were: How do I get to the nearest train station? Where is the nearest doctor? Where do I catch a bus out of the city; and so on. The Delhi Police ended up with 38 marks, behind London's 39.

But, all said and done, it was a great show.

NEW DELHI: A simian visitor broke the security cordon around Parliament House, taking over the security staff's job of screening visitors for some time. The securitymen had a tough time packing off the monkey, who insisted on staying put.

The main door of Parliament House was closed for some time to ensure that there were no further attempts to breach the cordon.

But this did not deter the monkey, which sat for some time on the footsteps leading to the door allowing everyone to pass, except the watch and ward staff, who had behaved harshly with him. The Statesman (Deepali Sinha, Patna)

BOMBAY: "Stop smoking if you love Mumbai," the ticket checker told a first class passenger on a Western Railway local train.

The checker's admonition on the occasion of the 'I love Mumbai' festival, prompted the passenger to retort: "But I love my cigarette more than Bombay."

Finally, the passenger put out the cigarette on being shown the notice in the train compartment that smoking was prohibited and could attract a fine of Rs 500. The Hindu (H. Rajaraman, Madras)

NEW DELHI: The ambulance that follows the Prime Minister's motorcade seems to be merely a 'decorative piece'.

Mr P.P. Balachandran, correspondent of a Bombay-based newspaper, who received a deep cut during a scuffle between securitymen and newspersons, was rushed to the Prime Minister's ambulance for first aid. But to his dismay, there was no tincture or Band-aid available. The Hindustan Times (E.J. Patro, Bhubaneshwar)

CALCUTTA: A pickpocket, caught stealing by bus passengers, escaped arrest by playing dead at Judges Court Road in south Calcutta this morning.

The pickpocket feigned death to escape from the angry mob, which dragged him from the vehicle and started beating him up. Fearing that they had killed the man, the passengers panicked and fled. The pickpocket, who was lying on the ground where he had collapsed, availed of this opportunity and ran for his life. The Telegraph (Raja Banerjee, Balasore)

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—ARIES

The practical outlook of the Aries man makes it difficult for him to empathise with the emotional highs and lows of the Scorpio woman. This leaves the Scorpio feeling unloved and neglected. However, the two share some wonderful moments of fun and frolic.

What now, Nehru?

What news of Arun Nehru, legendary master manipulator of Indian politics?

Two new developments are of some consequence. One, the former commerce minister is now making his differences with V.P. Singh public. He tells interviewers that he disagreed with the timing of the Mandal move. And though the Raja is trying hard to cultivate a Muslim constituency, AKN is busy spouting pro-Hindu rhetoric, and talking about the damage to the Hindu psyche caused by Mulayam Singh's refusal to allow the VHP to destroy the mosque.

Arun Nehru: spouting rhetoric

Two, Nehru has a full-scale battle on his hands. His successor at the commerce ministry is busy scouring the files to find the dirt on his predecessor. Subramaniam Swamy seems convinced that he can tie Nehru up in endless corruption controversies.

So, what will Nehru do now?

Return of the prodigal

Arun Jaitley had quit the BJP when it became clear that he wasn't likely to achieve much in the face of opposition from such heavyweights as Madan Lal Khurana and Dr L.K. Jain. The last straw came when Khurana effectively prevented him from contesting the Lok Sabha elections from South Delhi. Piqued beyond measure, Jaitley began cultivating the Raja and managed to wangle appointment as additional solicitor-general to the Government of India.

But the change of government forced Jaitley out. And recognising that, in the changed political climate, the BJP was a force to reckon with, Jaitley began manoeuvering to get a toehold in the party once again. His lobbying with party president L.K. Advani paid off, with a nomination to the national executive of the BJP.

And no prizes for guessing who's most unhappy at this turn of events. Yes, it is M.L. Khurana.

CHECK-LIST

The secretaries who are in with Shekhar's government

- A.R. Ganesan: Secretary, civil aviation. An upright bureaucrat, Ganesan was regarded as a favourite of his previous boss, Arif Mohammad Khan. And he's apparently found favour with the new minister Harmohan Dhawan as well. Dhawan has asked Ganesan to continue as secretary, and the civil servant has agreed in his most civil manner.

- N.N. Vohra: Secretary, defence. Has been part of the ministry for a decade and is tipped to continue in his current post. If, on the outside chance, he moves out, it will only be to move into the home ministry, on an equally important assignment.

- A.N. Verma: Secretary, industry. The Raja tried his best to remove Verma from his post but failed in the face of Ajit Singh's insistence on keeping the bureaucrat. Now that Shekhar is in South Block, Verma is tipped to continue in office, either in industry, finance or as principal secretary to the Prime Minister.

- S.P. Shukla: Secretary, commerce. Has perfected the art of getting in the good books of his minister, be it V.P. Singh or Arun Nehru. Among the Janata Dal(S) ministers is regarded as being close to finance minister Yashwant Sinha. Hence, reports which suggest that he may find a prize post in the finance ministry if he fails to retain commerce.

- S.K. Mishra: Secretary, agriculture. The Tau relies on him completely. And thus, Mishra is expected to call the shots in tourism as well as agriculture. His wife Sukhda Mishra's (she's a minister in Mulayam Singh Yadav's Cabinet) connections ensure that the civil servant will occupy a pre-eminent position in the new dispensation.

Justice for all

Guess who's the most-sought after man these days?

None other than the Chief Justice of India, Ranganath Mishra, never mind his less-than-fortunate utterances about the place for women.

Apparently, the Prime Minister has taken to consulting Mishra on every contentious issue on his agenda—Mandal and Ram Janmabhoomi among others—to be acquainted with the correct legal position on these matters. And in his best man-of-the-people manner Chandra Shekhar makes it a point to call on Mishra, instead of standing on protocol, whenever he's in need of the learned Chief Justice's advice.

Critics of the PM, of course, insist that there's more to this than meets the eye. According to them, Shekhar owes Mishra one. When the constitutional crisis was at its height, President Venkataraman summoned Mishra to ask if he could ask Shekhar, as leader of an "unattached" group, to form the government. Mishra was quick to clarify that there wasn't any constitutional provision which prevented him from doing so. A relieved Venkataraman immediately invited Shekhar over to offer him the prime ministership. Hence, Shekhar's preference for the Chief Justice's point of view.

Pilot is better

He'd always held a measure of importance in the Congress. Rajiv Gandhi, however, made sure to balance him off by granting Ghulam Nabi Azad equal eminence. But with the hugely-successful kisan rally at the Boat Club, all that is likely to change, with Rajesh Pilot finding himself in the forefront of party affairs.

Rajesh Pilot: the rally did it

Already a campaign has begun to appoint Pilot to the Congress Working Committee in place of that other Gujjar leader Ram Chandra Vikal. The argument is that given Vikal's recent obsession with naturopathy and yoga, he's better qualified to run health classes than function on the CWC. And what better man to take his place than Pilot, who's proved his organisational ability and mass base with the kisan rally.

Swami at large

Chandra Swami may have become a regular at 3 South Avenue Lane, but his presence goes down ill with well-wishers and friends of the Prime Minister. Though their public stance is that there is no reason why Swami should be ostracised by Shekhar, in private they admit that it would have been better for the PM's image if the godman had continued pulling strings from his haunt in America.

But Swami hasn't restricted himself to visits to the prime ministerial residence alone. He turned up in Ayodhya (see cover story) to declare that the mandir should be built at the site of the garba griha. While the VHP leaders ignored the Swami when they weren't abusing him virulently, the BJP remained very silent on his presence in the temple city.

The reason was obvious: the Swami still retains close links with such BJP stalwarts as Vijayaraje Scindia and Dr J.K. Jain. Readers will remember that a year and a half ago, Swami had arranged for Mrs Adnan Khashoggi to be awarded the World Peace Prize at the Rajmata's residence, the function being organised by Dr J.K. Jain.

And now that the Swami claims that he can get the Gulf countries to pressure the Babri Masjid Action Committee to accept a compromise formula, he's bound to become a favourite in several other quarters as well.

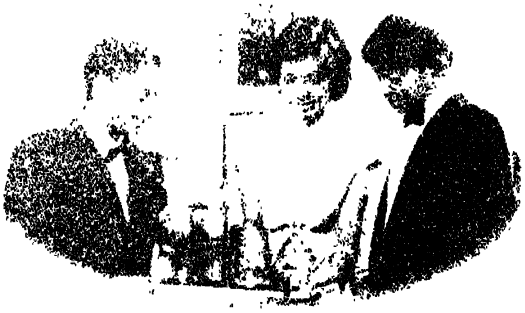
Power without responsibility

The announcement took everyone by surprise. Dr Manmohan Singh, vice-chairman of the Planning Commission, had been appointed economic advisor to the Prime Minister, not Dr S.K. Goel, long-time crony of Shekhar's. What made the appointment even more piquant was the fact that Singh had been very close to both Indira and Rajiv Gandhi during their stints in office.



But no, this didn't mean that the Congress president was calling the shots as far as appointments were concerned. According to sources close to the PM, Goel himself had turned down the post of economic advisor, for reasons which were still far from clear. Yes, he'd told Shekhar, he would visit him every day and offer him advice on economic matters, but he didn't want an official post.

We suppose power without responsibility has its attractions.

Religion and politics

The decision of the BJP to construct the Ram temple (The fires of Ram, 2—8 December) by demolishing the mosque at Ayodhya will be a national disaster.

The BJP's claim that by constructing the mandir it will regain national prestige and honour, is purely illogical. Instead, the prestige of Hindus will suffer as they will never be successful in their attempt to construct the mandir under any circumstances.

The Ram temple issue is now in the hands of some power-hungry politicians. These people want to come to power by any means.

Balkunthanath Sasmal, Baripada (Orissa)

■ The new Prime Minister, Chandra Shekhar, hopes to succeed where V.P. Singh failed so ignominiously. He believes he can resolve this contentious issue, soothe communal passions and take the sting out of the BJP's campaign. But given the state of affairs prevailing in the country, it will be quite difficult for the new regime to bring the situation under control. But if Shekhar flounders, India will be the biggest loser. Therefore, he should tread carefully and if he slips up, he might have to leave like V.P. Singh.

Biased profile

The profile of Jaipal Reddy (Reddy for the attack, 25 November—1 December) is biased and motivated. The article failed to mention his stint in the eighth Lok Sabha. He won laurels as a good parliamentarian until he resigned along with hundred-odd MPs on the Bofors issue. Reddy's performance as an ordinary member as well as deputy leader of the Dal Parliamentary Party was in the best traditions of parliamentary democracy.

Comparing Reddy to K.K. Tewari and Subramaniam Swamy is not in good taste. Also, he was one of the few who never aspired for positions of authority and this appears to be the only reason for calling him a nonentity. Your main plank appears to be misinterpreting Reddy's publicity-loving nature as a sort of crime. For that matter, all politicians are publicity-hungry and they are always looking for an opportunity to hog the limelight. Therefore, there is no reason to compare him with power-hungry and publicity-loving politicians.

N. Anjaiah Goud, Secunderabad (Andhra Pradesh)

Jaipal Reddy: a media flop

Target: Rajiv

The Bofors story (The curse of Bofors, 18—24 November) has brought to light a shocking revelation about the level to which our politicians can stoop to grab power. The investigations so far seem to be aimed at discrediting the Congress(I) and Rajiv Gandhi in particular. And these episodes were masterminded by people who preached value-based politics. So in order to uphold the ethics of journalism, all those who misled the nation by planting false stories should make a public apology to Rajiv Gandhi.

Michael Noronha, Mysore (Karnataka)

Pop mania

The article (The Indipop boom, 18—24 November) made for interesting reading. What was missing was the mention of Usha Uthup who ranks as one of India's best pop singers. Usha is head and shoulders above Sharon Prabhakar.

Usha Uthup's exclusion from the article is unpardonable.

R.Joseph, Madras (Tamil Nadu)

Uthup: the best of the lot?

■ Indipop won't be around for too long. It is rightly mentioned that today's Hindi film music is littered with copies of Western chartbusters.

The death of stalwarts like Kishore Kumar and Mukesh has also heralded the death of authentic Indian music.

Is it any wonder that a few genuine music fans have lost interest in the state of the music industry as a whole?

Mahesh Kumar, New Delhi

Wanted: a new system

The cover story reflects the true situation prevailing in the country today (The desperate hours, 11—17 November). It is high time that India adopted the presidential system of government, where no parliamentarian or legislator gets elected unless he polls more than 50 per cent of the valid votes cast in the elections. And at the same time, the people should elect their President and chief ministers through ballot. This system will eliminate the instability caused by politicians greedy for power.

Chandra Shekhar: will he provide stability?

R.N. Vaswani, Bombay (Maharashtra)

A lost cause

The article (Suicide fever, 4—10 November) was shocking to say the least. A few sentimental students killed themselves over nothing. Self-immolation is not the way to protest, regardless of the cause. The government does not bother and neither does society in general. The only ones hurt are parents and relatives. It is hoped that the students will learn a lesson and find better ways to prove a point.

Parimal Sarkar, Burdwan (West Bengal)

Intellectuals protesting the glorification of self-immolation

■ Mandal is not the only reason for suicides by Indian students. The media have played their part. Most people who have committed suicide are children of the lower middle class.

The attention of politicians needs to be drawn to this corrupt and inefficient political system which encourages kids to kill themselves.

I.P. Gandhi, New Delhi

Back to the barracks

The article (The Benazir saga, 11—17 November) deserves certain clarifications. The Pakistan People's Party made a tactical blunder by making the poll a referendum on corruption against Benazir and thus played into the hands of its opponents.

However, Benazir's best bet now is that the coalition government would be unstable. As for now, the fate of the Pakistanis lies in the hands of the generals and religious fundamentalists.

Chayan Gupta, New Delhi

Majority phobia

The Ayodhya imbroglio is a frightening replay of the medieval crusades carried out by the Christians to liberate Jerusalem from the clutches of the Muslims (Groping in the dark, 18—24 November).

The only reason for the Muslims to feel claustrophobic in India is due to the fact that Hindu fanatics are being arrested for plotting violence against the minority community. Evidently, the Muslims have reasons for fear, since the Hindus are being galvanised by unscrupulous politicians.

Chiranjib Haldar, Trivandrum (Kerala)

Benazir Bhutto: battered and beaten

Defying tradition

The suspension of three students from IIT Kharagpur is a direct mockery of the very foundations of decency and good conduct that this institution is supposed to stand for (Ragtime blues, 18—24 November). The suspension of these students should be revoked. These students could be the models for future generations, not to mention the present ones who are engaged in ragging.

Suresh Kumar, Bagepally (Karnataka)

Elitist press

The press is indifferent to the problems of rural India (Paper chase, 18—24 November). Pages of major newspapers carry comments of discredited political leaders, salacious comments on the lives of film stars and cricket news. Most newspapers and journals of the country do not reflect the viewpoints of the poorer sections.

The poor people have to struggle for existence, a fact which is largely ignored by the country's press.

Abir Padhy, Berhampur (Orissa)

Distorting culture

Our attention has been drawn to the feature Finally, the film (2 - 8 December). We feel constrained to mention a few words in response to some of the points raised

There certainly has been a controversy about the film. But we may categorically state that formal clearance of the script and permission to shoot was never denied to the filmmaker. The correspondent was perhaps unaware of the fact that the onus for clearing a script by a foreign filmmaker lies not with the state government but with the Government of India. In fact, the producer and the director of the film had sought unofficially to evince the views of the state government about the script. Frankly speaking, we found the novel on which the film is based to be utterly reprehensible since its basic aim appeared to be to humiliate the denizens of the city about the socio-economic realities that historically exist here. The script, too, we think, goes a long way in hurting our national sentiments.

A few random quotes from the 'novel' would, we believe, tend to confirm to your readership the raison d'etre of our attitude towards the film:

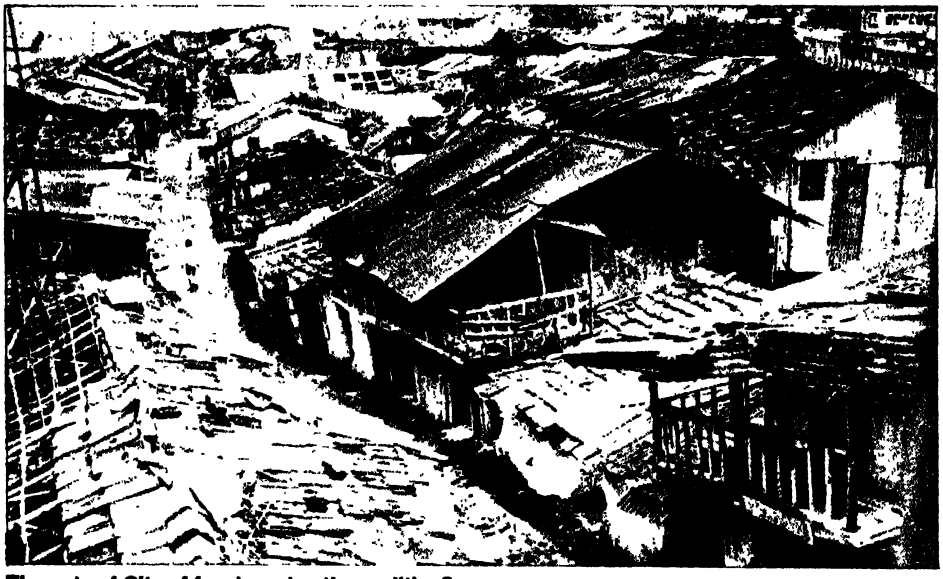
"Like the majority of other Indian women still untouched by feminist liberation movements, the women in the City of Joy had no way other than seduction to attract masculine attention and assert their identity."

"They used the embryos and foetuses either for scientific work or in the manufacture of rejuvenating products for a clientele of privileged people in specialised establishments in Europe and America. The demand had provoked a fruitful trade for which Calcutta was one of the central sources."

"He had taken refuge in an air-conditioned suite in Calcutta's luxury hotel, The Grand. A foaming Niagara of perfumed froth was already tumbling into the bathtub of his marble bathroom. The nightmare of the City of Joy had receded to another planet. He slipped a ten-rupee note into the servant's hand. Just as he was leaving, however, the servant swung around in a half-circle. He was a very wrinkled little man with a grey beard."

'Would you like a girl, sahib? A very pretty young girl?'

Startled, Max put down his glass of whisky.



'Very pretty and sweet-natured,' elaborated the servant with a wink. The American swallowed another mouthful of alcohol. 'Unless you'd prefer two girls together urged the Indian. 'Young girls, but very, very skilful. The entire range of the Kama Sutra, sahib.' The Indian plucked up his courage. He knew his clientele all too well. As soon as they arrived in Asia, Europeans and Americans turned into devils. No temptation seemed spicy enough for them. 'Perhaps you'd prefer a boy, sahib? A fine looking young boy, sweet and...' The servant made an obscene gesture and matched it with another wink. With the same air of complicity, this time he suggested two young boys. After a few moments, he volunteered 'two young boys and two girls together', then a eunuch, and finally a transvestite 'Very clean, sahib, very safe.'

"In a few years the city was to condemn its ten million inhabitants to living on less than twelve square feet of space per person, while the four or five million of them who squeezed into its slums had sometimes to make do with barely three square feet each."

"Nothing is going to change the fact that there are over a million poor bastards without work in Calcutta, and that if you eliminate the livelihoods of a hundred thousand rickshaw pullers, you'll condemn eight or nine hundred thousand more people to starvation. It's a matter of common sense, but then, politics and common sense are not the teats of the same cow."

There are some people who end up being hateful of the realities that prevail here. Therefore, it is our considered opinion that just as filmmaking is a basic right, so it is within the definition of human rights to have certain kinds of media creation.

VINOD MEHTA

Medium cool

The new Chandra Shekhar: A TV star!

Those of us for whom the daily ups and downs of public life are of irresistible concern, sometimes forget that the average citizen has little or no interest in politics. His response to those who rule, or seek to rule, is made up of prejudices, gut feelings, vague notions, word-of-mouth anecdotes and self-certified opinions. Facts, deeds, views of newspaper pundits rarely cause him to adjust his conclusions.

My paanwala, for instance, is devotedly and doggedly anti-Chandra Shekhar ever since he heard that our Prime Minister had decided to shorten his name from Chandra Shekhar Singh to Chandra Shekhar in the name of some alien ideology. "How can you trust a man who has betrayed his own caste?" he asks. "I am also a sochalist, but I still go by the name my father gave me." Chandra Shekhar could turn India into a haven of peace and prosperity, yet I suspect my paanwala would never vote for him.

My purpose in presenting the meandering musings of paanwalas is to report a gradual but perceptible change of mood vis-a-vis our Prime Minister in a significant section of the electorate. Just as V.P. Singh was being shown the door, I asked a friend, who is a paid-up member of the Malabar Hill Elite Club, how he viewed the prospect of the Old Turk stepping in. He curled up his nose and said, "That man is evil" – and he put a lot of feeling into the word "evil". Without the benefit of an opinion poll I would claim that my friend reflected the sentiments of large sections of the urban intelligentsia. Four weeks after assuming office, Mr Chandra Shekhar has made that same population sit up and think. Could it be that they were wrong? Perhaps he is not as evil as they thought him to be?

Of course, the subtle change in mood could be the result of incumbency. The Prime Minister's Office has built-in glamour and awe-inspiring trappings. The occupant of 7, Race Course Road is splashed across our front pages and TV screens, he is seen receiving high foreign dignitaries, he whizzes off to international conferences and rubs shoulders with statesmen and assorted glitterati, he is seen comforting those who have suffered through natural or man-made calamity. He is here, there and everywhere. Not surprisingly, the ubiquitous, frequently healing visibility helps soften part of the hostility.

Mr Chandra Shekhar is the recipient of another lucky benefit—public expectation of him and his government is so low that he simply cannot fail. No one expects him to perform or accomplish anything, he has no manifesto to implement, no promises to keep. The single task he has before him is to survive. Even here, survival not for four years but for 12 months. Never in the history of democratic governance has a Prime Minister been asked to do so little, so leisurely.

Given the fact that the Prime Minister has accomplished precisely nothing, how has he been able to make a positive impact on the country in so short a space of time?

It is a truism that in politics perception is more important than reality, and as I indicated earlier, perception is the composite of intangibles—received impressions, random signals that may or may not have anything to do with reality. Experience from other parts of the world confirms that the single most powerful instrument for transmitting impressions, favourable and unfavourable, is television. In our country, television assumes even greater potency because competing instruments (lobbies, press, professional fora, cable TV etc.) are either non-existent or have restricted reach. It is through television, then, that Chandra Shekhar has, to some extent, won the hearts and minds of the very people who till a few weeks ago were calling him "evil".

Interestingly, unlike Mr Thatcher, R. Reagan and J. Kennedy, Mr Chandra Shekhar has had no coaching in the medium. Mrs Thatcher hired a consultant (Gordon Reece) who, among other things, taught her to stand properly in front of a microphone and how to speak into it. Our man in South Block, meanwhile, seems to be a TV natural who comes off best when he has no script and when he speaks in Hindi. I can think of no other politician in recent times who has used television to such advantage. And it has been done without Doordarshan management or the plastering of Chandra Shekhar on our TV screens. Indeed, I am quite sure that the Prime Minister is not even aware of the sublime effect he has been having on the air waves.

People are talking of three Chandra Shekhar 'performances'. The first was at SAARC. His official speech in English was mundane, but just before he ended he switched to extempore and Hindi. Even those who did not understand the words he used to sketch out his "one world" vision found the sincerity and simplicity of his oration moving. The second was at an indoor stadium in Delhi where he pleaded with the audience not to fall prey to

It is through television that Chandra Shekhar has, to some extent, won the hearts and minds of the very people who till a few weeks ago were calling him 'evil'

"people who want to divide this country in the name of caste and religion. Hunger has no caste, poverty has no religion. Let us fight these, not ourselves". Finally, in western UP he delivered the same message. The impact of all three performances on viewers was electric.

On occasions V.P. Singh spoke eloquently too, but he had the distressing habit of straying into Hindi film dialogue which sounded not merely theatrical but also shifty. Rajiv is incapable of rousing a crowd because he is invariably reading other people's lines. Indira Gandhi, when in trouble, resorted to shrieking and shouting. Chandra Shekhar, in contrast, knows how to pitch his words and since he is well-informed with views on everything from regional cooperation to five-star hotels, he has no need for prompters or slips of paper. He looks his audience straight in the eye and rattles off at a cracking pace. The impression left is of a man who, while not fully in control of his destiny, knows exactly what he is doing. However spurious, however counterfeit, there is a sureness of touch, a self-confidence exuded by a Prime Minister believed to be living on life-support systems.

Through intelligent and forceful use of television, Mr Chandra Shekhar has been able to cool caste passions in the country. He has not reneged on Mandal, he has simply put various riders to make the recommendations 'more complete'. And he makes sure that when he refers to caste inquities he also mentions the shame of poverty, wherever it is found. As a result, the anti-reservationists have no cause to pursue on the streets, while quota champions cannot claim they have been betrayed. Nothing solved, just a little respite gained.

On the Ram Janmabhoomi question, Chandra Shekhar has managed to present on our screens nightly a motley collection of sadhus, mullahs and self-styled religious leaders allegedly engaged in serious parleys. Again, nothing substantial has been registered, but the very sight of feuding holy men sitting across a table in the elevating company of Mulayam Singh Yadav, Sharad Pawar and Bhairon Singh Shekhawat is enormously reassuring for a frightened nation. Whether by trick or by fraud, a perilously insecure Prime Minister using old-fashioned communication techniques has been able to convince a few of his countless critics that he has the skills to heal the wounds of a deeply wounded nation.

TV images are notoriously unreliable. However, it is difficult to manipulate them for too long. If the Prime Minister talks about bringing the country together and privately does deals with communalists in order to secure his tenure, the same medium which is serving him today will mercilessly expose him. For the moment, however, it must be noted that Mr Chandra Shekhar has a formidable TV presence which for the moment is paying him dividends. •

RED ALERT!

Andhra Pradesh witnesses an upsurge in Naxalite violence

Nobody saw it coming. To the residents of Narmatta, a tiny village in Andhra Pradesh's Warangal district, 4 December seemed like it would be just another uneventful day. Until about noon, that is.

The Bank of Baroda which is housed in one of the few pukka buildings in the village- was virtually deserted as it was nearing lunch hour Suddenly, a group of about six men marched in and confronted the branch's assistant manager, K. Sairam Gopal. "Come with us quietly," they demanded and Gopal had no choice but to comply

The abduction of Gopal was only one of the many carried out by the dreaded Naxalite People's War Group (PWG) in Narmatta that day. Only a few minutes earlier, another group of PWG men had kidnapped the village's head constable, Yakub Ali, as he was on his way to the marketplace. During the day, the PWG picked up five others at intervals of an hour or more. Among them, the mandal president Pengali Raju Reddy, the mandal development officer and three other government employees

The provocation for the abductions was the arrest on the same morning of Kalyanam Chandramouli, the leader of the Radical Youth League (RYL). And on the following day, 5 December, the PWG kidnapped 18 others, bringing the total to 25.

There was also violence in Narmatta on that day. The Naxalites forced a large number of residents of Narmatta to demonstrate in front of the police station. The villagers were made to chant anti-government slogans as the extremists sang and danced to 'revolutionary songs'. When the crowd became restive and violent, the police resorted to firing. Three policemen were injured and the Naxalites claimed that as many as 13 people (all "peaceful demonstrators") were killed.

The district administration, which by then was in a frightful panic, announced that Chandramouli would be released on 6 December. The RYL leader was freed only on the following day as, apparently, no one had come forward to sign the bail application on his behalf. By then, the Naxalites had kidnapped a number of others and released a few in their custody. One of those 'abducted' -head constable Yakub Ali—was killed;, his body was recovered from a nearby village. Others such as Bala Bhaskara Raju were lucky, being released after a night in captivity. "They took me to one of their hide-outs near the forest. But they did not ill-treat me," he says.

But even after Chandramouli was freed, as many as 15 people remained in PWG custody.

Narmatta is no isolated incident. Over the past few months, Naxalite groups—particularly the dreaded PWG –have become extremely active in the Telengana area of Andhra Pradesh. Abductions have become very common and the state government appears to be clueless about how to deal with the extremists.

Consider the other incidents of Naxalite violence which took place in the state during the first week of this month.

- Three policemen were shot by PWG men at Belampalli in Adilabad district on 7 December. The Naxalites got away with the policemen's firearms and some gelatine sticks. Coming as it did on the heels of Narmatta, it sent shock waves through the state administration.
- A forest official V. Srihari, who had earlier been a stringer for a Telugu daily, was kidnapped on 4 December. His body was discovered with multiple stab injuries near a temple at Govindraopetta, about 100 kilometres from Warangal town.
- On the same day, a village sarpanch was also abducted in Warangal district. He was shot dead the following morning, ostensibly because he refused to agree to distribute benami land among the poor

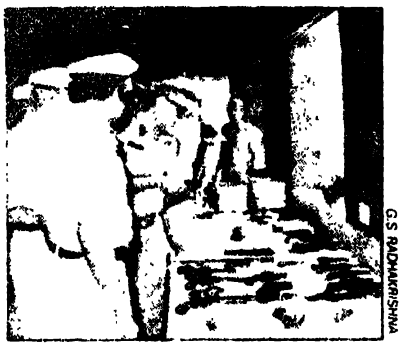
Tag these along with the violent incidents, abductions and 'executions' that have taken place all through this year and the list appears endless

To many, the upsurge in Naxalite activity has one main cause: the attitude of former state chief minister Marri Chenna Reddy. When Reddy assumed office late last year, he had suggested that N.T. Rama Rao's Telugu Desam regime—which, for the most part, had treated the Naxalite menace as a law and order problem—had resorted to unnecessarily repressive measures in dealing with extremism. Reddy had evolved a three-pronged strategy that was aimed at curtailing the illegal activities of Naxalites while permitting non-violent political expression. The three prongs were:

- Allowing Naxalites to carry out peaceful campaigns -that is, rallies, demonstrations and the like.
- Releasing all Naxalites detained in prison without trial.
- And, finally, maintaining a close watch on law and order violations by Naxalite groups which chose to reject the government's accommodating approach

Reddy had hoped that this relatively soft approach would help bring the Naxalites around and restrain them from acts of violence. But, clearly, it has been a dismal failure.

His attitude had led to embarrassing allegations as well. As early as last year, in the run-up to the December 1989 Assembly polls, Reddy was accused of having struck a deal with the Naxalites and seeking their support for the elections. Later, many eyebrows were raised when he appointed his long-standing friend and adviser, Kondapalli Chandramouli Reddy, as the state Dairy Development Board chairman. Chandramouli Reddy is said to be related to the PWG chief, Kondapalli Seetharamaiah. Some of Chenna Reddy's detractors go to the extent of claiming that he himself is a relative of Seetharamaiah's.



As a part of his strategy of winning over the Naxalites, Chenna Reddy withdrew numerous cases against their

SUPERANNUATION SCHEME

deCunha LIC 4 90

How to prevent key employees from leaving you...

LIC's Group Superannuation Scheme – for increased employee loyalty and morale, and tax savings.

LIC's Group Superannuation Scheme provides an added incentive for employees to continue in their current organisation. It guarantees regular post-retirement income, based on number of years in service and last salary drawn or contribution made.

- Contributions (inclusive of PF), are tax-deductible up to 25% of salary.
- If implemented retrospectively, up to 80% of contributions (with respect to past years of service), are allowed for tax deduction in the year of payment.
- Interest accrues at 11.4% to 12% p.a., depending on the size of the fund.
- For those who are members of LIC's Group Gratuity Scheme, higher interest rates will be applicable for both schemes. The Superannuation scheme can also be linked to life insurance cover.
- On retirement, a choice of pension-payment plans is available.

For more information and advice about the scheme, send this coupon to your local LIC Divisional Office.

leaders. He also instructed that the state government's controversial Special Task Force (whose men were known as the Greyhounds), which was created by NTR to deal with the Naxalites, be disbanded. A Rs 65-crore Remote Area Development Programme (RADP) was launched in the nine Naxalite-prone districts of the Telengana region to improve the economic condition of the people. And, finally, Reddy also hit upon the idea of having praja sadassus (or people's gatherings), which state ministers were to attend along with local officials. The idea was to provide a forum for the people in remote areas to talk about the problems and voice their grievances.

These were not bad ideas in principle, but their execution left much to be desired. For instance, the RADP scheme hardly benefited those it was targeted at. As for the praja sadassus, they became something of a farce. Ministers began to find excuses for not attending the meetings as, apart from the security risk, they were given a hard time by Naxalite sympathisers who taunted them about their VIP status, their wealth and their irrelevance at such gatherings.

The only time during Chenna Reddy's reign that the Naxalites were dealt with firmly was when the former chief minister had left for the US this July for medical treatment. The four-member coterie which ran the state during his absence, comprising Samarasinha Reddy, Diwakar Reddy, Geetha Reddy and Rosaiah, decided that it was time to get tough with the extremist groups. The state police were instructed to crack down on the Naxalites and nearly 30 of them were killed in the encounters that took place in the month that Chenna Reddy was away.

But, for the most part, Naxalite violence has been unabated in the state during the last year. For instance, in 1990, the PWG alone accounted for almost 90 abductions, including those of two MLAs, one IAS officer and several other government officials from the banking sector and the state revenue department. During the same period, the PWG also burnt six railway stations, raided three police stations and killed large numbers of people. What was easily the ghastliest Naxalite attack was that on a train on 9 October near Hyderabad. Forty-seven passengers were burnt alive after a bogie was set on fire by the extremists.

None of this, of course, can be used to conclude that NTR was successful in dealing with the Naxalites. But despite the fact that he has for long maintained that the Naxalites were his "friends", the TDP supremo did attempt to deal with them more firmly.

The state's Naxalites were extemely angry with NTR and had often charged him with using terror tactics to repress civil rights campaigners. During his reign, the Naxalites suffered heavy casualties. But the PWG kept up its strategy of abducting government officials to pressure the NTR regime into releasing its cadres from state prisons. In 1989, the PWG stepped up its campaign to destroy public property to protest against the encounter killings. When its leaders, Daggu Rayalingu and Puli Ramulu, were killed in encounters in Warangal and Karimnagar respectively, the PWG took to burning buses, railway stations and government offices.

CHENNA REDDY

He tried to win the Naxalites over, but violence increased during his reign

Like Chenna Reddy, there were times he did make attempts to weaken the movement by winning them over. For instance, following the public uproar after the the kidnapping and murder of one of the Telugu Desam's mandal presidents in Karimnagar district, T. Malhar Rao, NTR evolved a voluntary surrender scheme. Naxalites who gave themselves up were rehabilitated and given state assistance. About a hundred middle-ranking Naxalites did seek rehabilitation, but the scheme failed in the end as most of them returned to the jungles after accepting the government doles.

At the moment, there are about half a dozen Naxalite groups active in the Telengana region. But it is the People's War Group of Kondapalli Seetharamaiah's which is the largest, the most ruthless and the major cause for concern.

The writ of the PWG and the other groups runs through many remote parts of Telengana, where they evoke considerable sympathy among the tribals and the poor. The Naxalites have helped them escape the clutches of the landlords, provided them with basic literary and numerical skills apart from financial assistance in the form of interest-free loans (which are given by Naxalite-promoted cooperatives).

Given the record of work of some groups with the poor, the Naxalites have earned some sympathy in certain quarters of the urban intelligentsia. Human rights campaigner and lawyer K.G. Kannabiran, for instance, has represented Naxalites in a number of court cases and is known to be close to many of them. "I don't approve of Naxalite kidnappings. But at the same time, you cannot talk only about the violence of the radical elements and turn a blind eye to the illegitimate methods used by the state," he says.

Men like Kannabiran—unlike those who advocate annihilation of the Naxalites—probably believe that the problem must be tackled at both the social and economic levels. When Chenna Reddy came to power last year, he appeared to suggest pretty much the same thing. But his economic programmes, such as the RADP, to benefit the poverty-ridden, Naxalite-infested regions seemed more like publicity stunts than serious attempts to alleviate the lot of the people. At the same time, he failed miserably in checking Naxalite violence, which had grown considerably during his reign.

It may have been the communal carnage that ravaged Hyderabad last fortnight which forced Chenna Reddy to resign. But his successor—irrespective of who he is—will have to find a way of meeting the Naxalite challenge. As Chenna Reddy had discovered, it is threatening to become an extremely difficult and dangerous problem. •

This should be a reporter's cardinal principle

In tension-filled Ayodhya, a charred body is found. There are no marks of identification and the reason for his death is yet to be established.

The Press Trust of India, supposed to be the more sober of the two English-language agencies strangely enough went on to report that the body was that of a sadhu who had self-immolated himself in support of his demand for the construction of the Ram temple in Ayodhya And PTI's source? The vice-president of the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagna Samiti, Mahant Ramachandra Paramhans.

Was the Mahant a reliable source? Did he know more about the sadhu who had allegedly set himself on fire? PTI does not say. But this was enough for some of the national newspapers. Indian Express came out with a headline about a sadhu immolating himself and The Daily followed suit. Fortunately, a number of other papers did not lead with the PTI report but mentioned it only towards the end of their reports.

The PTI report was objectionable If the Mahant did say that the body was that of a sadhu, the agency should have tried to confirm it. And how reliable are these mahants, swamis and mullahs? They are only adding fuel to the fire. Didn't the PTI know that the reasons for the death were still unknown when it filed its report? The Hindustan Times said that "certain eye witnesses claimed that he was chased by a mob, lynched and set ablaze." Sajeda Momin of The Telegraph reported that "Ram bhakts in the area believe the corpse was that of a Muslim youth who had come to the town with a crude weapon to damage the temple: when kar sevaks came to know of this, they burnt him alive. Another version said the body was that of a kar sevak who had immolated himself in support of the Ram Temple."

If the PTI version was irresponsible, the attitude of some of the newspapers to have led with that and even headlined the event, was even more irresponsible. Will the press ever learn of its responsibilities?

Speaking of responsibility, The Sunday Observer had a lead story that many of the contract workers, employed by the Department of Atomic Energy at the Kalapakam power plant, near Madras, are being excessively exposed to harmful radiation.

This conclusion is drawn, not from any investigating reports by the paper's staff. It is based on studies undertaken by certain organisations like the Campaign for Peace and Prevention of Nuclear Threat, a Madras-based anti-nuclear group and one Mr C.N. Deivanaygam, convenor for Physicians for Peace.

Nuclear safety is serious business. The convenor's study states that between 1982 and 1988, there were 13 cancer-related deaths among 3,000 workers, and 14 among their family members. There were 11 infertile ovules.

It is quite clear that the organisations and the individuals who are behind the study are no supporters of nuclear plants and hence their conclusions may not be as objective as one would like them to be. What The Sunday Observer should have done was to have sent a senior journalist to study the issue, talk to the Kalapakam plant officials and scientists and use the findings of the anti-nuke protesters as backgrounders. The lead story, as it stands, is too one-sided and taxes one's credibility.

Cigarettes for money

The Times of India would do anything for money. Even then, I was shocked at the extensive coverage given to the launch of Legend Kings, the country's first allegedly low-tar, low-nicotine cigarette. One presumes that the launch was a glittering affair on board a launch off Bombay's Gateway of India with expensive liquor, eats and Legend Kings.

The staff reporter, who covered this mighty event, waxes eloquent quoting one Harsh Wardhan, a marketing vice-president. According to this whiz kid, the new brand is aimed at the health-conscious executive, 30 plus, who can't kick this habit but wants to reduce the health risk! (Do health-conscious executives really smoke?). Wardhan says a lot more. His low-risk cigarette contains the finest tobacco blended with the famous American Burley and it uses high-porosity paper. Legend claims to contain 12 mg tar, 0.8 mg nicotine average per stick. "The actual content is less", claims Wardhan virtuously. "We have taken the maximum limit."

Wardhan is confident that Legend will be a runaway success. And why not? With such coverage in the venerable Times of India, you can sell any death formula. Legend comes from the stable of the notorious Ms brand whose launch some time back ran into a controversy. How did this item get past the environment conscious Times of India editor?

The 'free press'

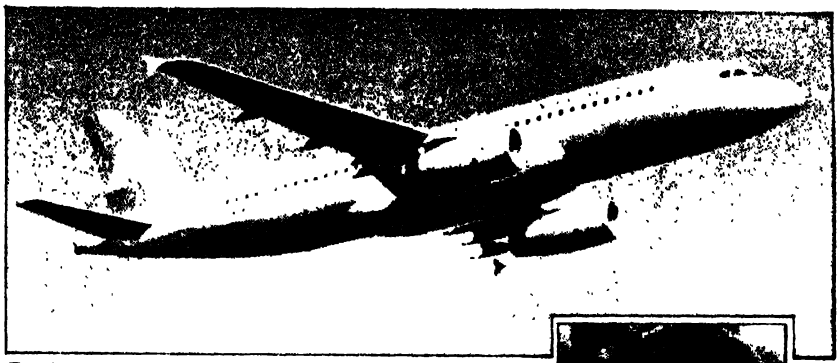
More on the antics of the representatives of our 'free press' who are a law unto themselves. During a special Airbus A320 flight from Delhi to Bombay, despite a 'No Smoking' rule observed on domestic routes, most of the scribes puffed away merrily, even when the 'No Smoking' sign appeared. The crew could only watch uneasily as even the honourable minister for civil aviation was puffing away.

That was not all. Even before the plane had come to a halt, the journalists jumped up to open the overhead lockers, despite pleas from the crew. During the best part of the flight, the 'moulders of public opinion' were crowding the aisles, preventing the crew from moving about and performing their duties.

Finally, it was an all-play-and-no-work trip. Many of the journalists who had boarded the plane had nothing to do with civil aviation and were only the special invitees of the minister.

Harassed hacks

From the antics of the privileged press to the problems of the regional press in Lucknow. Rajiv Saxena of The Sunday Observer has done his homework before filing his story on the Lucknow press. Here is a summary of the tragi-comedy situation.



Very few journalists are actually on the company pay roll and are paid in a bizarre fashion -reporters getting money through lekhan puruskar (writing awards) and sub-editors, sampadan puruskar (editing awards). A young journalist who insisted on a proper letter of appointment was slapped by the manager and told that he could walk out, if he so desired.

So hard up are employees of the National Herald, that they pilfer parts of expensive machinery from the press and sell them off at ridiculously low prices. The general manager appeased an agitated staffer who demanded payment, by presenting him with a large, home-grown pumpkin in lieu of hard cash!

'Managers' who know nothing of journalism strut about, harassing journalists. One of this tribe, on being told by the chief reporter that he is finishing his story, retorted, "You are paid to report news. Write your stories when you are at home!" Another proprietor-editor who had made a pile from selling spices spent hours with his journalists discussing the exact positioning of the 'bottom spread'!

The 'editor bug' has bitten quite a few characters in Lucknow, including a former cinema hall manager, a taxi operator and an owner of godowns! With such people running the show, one can imagine the plight of professional journalists. Recently, the management of a Hindi daily sent two reporters -one male and the other a female- to Ayodhya and booked them a single room at the local hotel. Not in a position to rent separate rooms, the journalists shared the room for the night, with the two beds in two corners of the room. But such news travels fast and the distraught wife of the male reporter, despite protestations of his innocence, left for her mother's place.

Thank you, Mr Rajiv Saxena. I'm sure honourable members of our esteemed Editors Guild would not have read this 'trivia' news report.

During a special Airbus A320 flight from Delhi to Bombay, despite a 'No Smoking' rule, the crew could only watch uneasily as even the honourable minister for civil aviation, Harmohan Dhawan, puffed away

Brotherhood!

A very interesting letter from Chanchal Sarkar published in The Hindustan Times: "Judges of the Supreme Court and other judges address their fellow judges on the bench as 'Brother'. Recently I was privileged to witness an example of 'brotherliness'. Mrs Ratna Mukherjee, widow of the late Chief Justice, Sabyasachi Mukherjee, was taking a tearful farewell from Delhi, leaving for Calcutta by the Rajdhani Express. Not a single 'brother' of the late Chief Justice was present, and not any Sister (Judges' wife) either."

What's in a headline?

And special mention to the Indian Express sports sub editor for this headline 'Pak kneel before Bishop' (based on the happenings of the Lahore cricket test, Pakistan vs West Indies). •

Here comes the judge

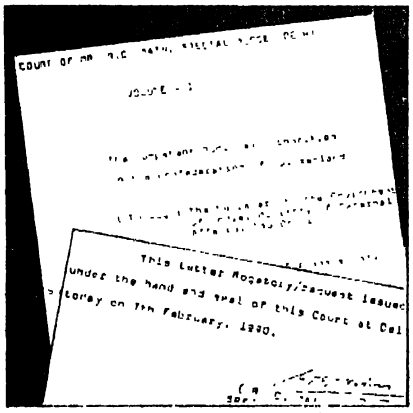
The curse of Bofors reaches the judiciary

The curse of Bofors strikes again. The latest casualty of the long-running howitzer scandal is the judiciary. Over the last fortnight, the Delhi High Court has witnessed unprecedented mayhem as lawyers have accused the Bench of impropriety, political parties have entered the fray, a Central Bureau of Intelligence (CBI) official has got up to disown his own counsel and an additional solicitor-general has given the impression that he is arguing his opponent's brief. Moreover, the court has been rocked by bomb scares, the media have suggested that the judge is behaving strangely and the law minister has been dragged into the controversy.

While these developments can only be dated to the assumption of office by the Chandra Shekhar government, the case itself has been in existence since 18 August, 1989. That was when an H.S. Choudhary filed a public interest petition seeking to squash the First Information Report (FIR) filed by the CBI in the case and asking that the Letters Rogatory (LR) be withdrawn.

At the time, the attitude of the V.P Singh regime was that this was a nuisance petition intended to hamper and delay the investigation. Nobody thought it had much chance of success. And even the regime's critics thought that the most damage it would do would be to force the CBI to part with the LRs, which it had, till then, regarded as classified information.

Then, two things happened. The CBI began to feel that Justice M.K.Chawla, who was hearing the case, seemed surprisingly well-disposed towards the petitioner. Next, the government changed, and additional solicitor-general Arun Jaitley, who was arguing the case for the regime, resigned.



At that stage, the matter took on an entirely new dimension.

For a start, there was the attitude of Justice Chawla. Normally, judges dispose of habeas corpus petitions first on the grounds that these have priority over most other matters, especially public interest litigation.

However, according to lawyers, Justice Chawla has decided to hear this

FARCE AND FASTER ■ How the case progressed

This Letter Rogatory/Request issued under the hand and seal of this Court at Del... torney on 7th February, 1990.

Letter Rogatory

Public interest litigation is filed challenging the Bofors FIR

Arun Jaitley

The government argues against the quashing of the case

Chandra Shekhar

The change of government means that all those arguing the case resign case on a priority basis. As he is due to retire on 5 January, 1991, the suspicion has grown that perhaps he wants to finish hearing the case before he steps down.

While Chawla has been in the news before (he was one of the three judges who confirmed the death sentence in the Indira Gandhi murder case), most advocates have regarded him as a fairly diffident, mild-mannered individual

Why then is he in such a hurry to hear this case even if it means overturning established legal norms?

In a representation to Chief Justice Ranganath Mishra, senior advocates posed this and other questions: "The unseemly anxiety which he is showing to keep the matter with him, the undue priority which he has accorded to the matter and the undue haste which he is showing to dispose of the matter have not gone unnoticed by the people..."

This was unprecedented enough. But there was more to come. Once the V.P. Singh government fell, several other entities felt that the new regime would not pursue the case with the necessary vigour. So five parties (three political parties: the BJP, V.P. Singh's Janata Dal and the CPI(M); and two individuals, Padma Bhushan N.Ram and Prashant Bhushan, son of a former law minister) filed applications asking to be impleaded in the case.

Justice Chawla was not impressed. On 6 December, he told Ram Jethmalani, who was appearing on behalf of the Janata Dal: "I will not hear you. I will not hear any of you now. I can't tell you at this stage when I will hear you."

The lawyers were appalled. Ram Jethmalani then walked out of the courtroom declaring: "The proceedings in this case are ceasing to be judicial."

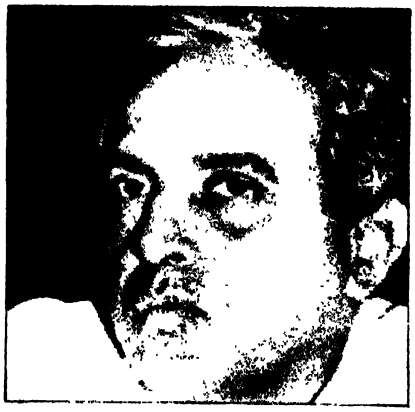
The matter was eventually settled by the Supreme Court, which issued a directive on 10 December asking Chawla to hear the applicants.

Almost as soon as Jethmalani made a legitimate return to the case, he decided to go for Chawla. On 11 December, the courtroom watched in stunned astonishment as Jethmalani made a passionate appeal to the judge:

"In this thoroughly abnormal situation, I say with the greatest humility as an officer of your court that I beg you to rescue yourself from this case. Please don't deal with this case any more."

The suggestion that Chawla was on the verge of committing impropriety was blatant enough and the judge reacted with outrage. He threw his papers on the table and loudly declared that he would not hear the case if the Bar was against him.

That should have been that but in a day's time, Chawla had rediscovered his old enthusiasm for the case. He would continue, he decided after all, adding that he would not be cowed down.



Now, it was the turn of the lawyers to get outraged. The exchanges continued on 13 December with Jethmalani claiming that the judge's statement was an "assault on the rights and privileges of the Bar".

Apart from the anger and the outrage, there was also the legal matter.

Rajiv Gandhi

Oddly enough, it is now Rajiv Gandhi who wants the investigation to proceed

"The new regime wants the Bofors case quashed"

Says Soli Sorabjee, the former attorney-general

If there is one thing that is troubling former attorney-general (AG) Soli Sorabjee these days, it is the manner in which the Chandra Shekhar regime is pursuing the Bofors case, which at present is being heard in the Delhi High Court. Says Sorabjee, "It is obvious that the new government wants the Bofors case quashed. But why don't they say so? This is because they don't have the candour to withdraw the request to the Swiss authorities and want to use the judicial machinery by devious means."

Personally, Sorabjee was convinced that there would be little headway in the Bofors case now. The intentions of the new government, he feels, is clear enough: the director of the CBI, who was pursuing the case, was axed and the new attorney-general, G. Ramaswamy, has admittedly been consulted by the Hindujas in the past. "Therefore," feels Sorabjee, "the high tradition required that he (Ramaswamy) should not touch the case."

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi

Hadn't Chawla declared in an open courtroom that he did not want to hear the case? The counsels for the impleaders (the parties that had later demanded a right to be heard) took the line that according to law "a judgement of a High Court judge becomes effective the moment he pronounces it verbally in court".

Nonsense, responded Chawla. "You mean I have no right to change my mind?"

By now any detached observer might have begun to wonder what the proceedings had to do with Bofors—or with jurisprudence for that matter. But there was more to come.

The Chandra Shekhar government asked K.T.S. Tulsi, the additional solicitor- general to represent it in the case. Tulsi's job ought to have been to defend the FIRs and I.R and argue against the public interest petition.

But that wasn't the way it came across.

Rising to support the government's position, Tulsi told the court that the CBI's FIR "did not contain any definite charges or allegations against specific persons and it relied only on some inferences and referred to some documents."

This argument caused widespread incredulity in the courtroom because it seemed to suggest that Tulsi was arguing the other side's brief. An outraged CBI official, K. Madhavan (who has made numerous foreign trips while pursuing the case) then got up and offered to make a submission on behalf of the CBI against the government counsel's stance.

Enter Subramaniam Swamy. The new law minister is technically the man who decides what to do if his officials behave strangely. So it was to Swamy that lawyers and the media turned.

Yes, said Swamy, a public official had behaved strangely. And he thought action should be taken against Madhavan.

Madhavan?

Absolutely, retorted the law minister. The CBI officer had no business getting up in court and trying to contradict poor Tulsi, who was only doing his job.

This declaration caused even more amazement than any of the bizarre goings-on that had characterised the trial so far. How could Swamy possibly claim that he was satisfied with Tulsi?

Justice M.K. Chawla

By some accounts, the Prime Minister's Office then got in on the act and Tulsi was replaced. The government announced that A.D. Giri, the new solicitor-general, would personally argue the case.

But Swamy was unrepentant. He stood by his earlier stand, he said. The only reason he was replacing Tulsi was because he feared for the poor man's safety. Apparently, he had received threats to his life and a concerned law minister thought that it would be better for him if he was off the case.

Nobody can predict with any degree of certainty what will happen next. Justice Chawla has now passed the stage where he can be embarrassed. He has only a few days left in office (because of court vacations) and little to lose. From all appearances, he will fight any attempt to take the case away from him. Perhaps he will even manage to deliver a judgement before he retires.

The judiciary, however, is not past the stage where it cannot be embarrassed. And over the last fortnight, there has been such sustained criticism of Chawla's role in the case from lawyers and the media that the reputation of the Bench has come under something of a cloud. This has distressed most reasonable members of the legal fraternity.

Meanwhile, having declared that the Bofors enquiry was a sub-inspector's job, the Prime Minister now seems loathe to even nominate that sub-inspector. Rajendra Shekhar, the upright director of the CBI has been transferred and Madhavan who, despite his reputation as a tired and emotional junketeer, at least understood the case, is in disgrace.

Oddly enough, the failure to proceed with the enquiry has drawn an angry response from an unusual quarter. The Congress(I) is confident that should the names of the beneficiaries come out, they will exonerate Rajiv Gandhi and his friends. Thus, this delay has caused some muttering at 10, Janpath.

If anybody pushes Chandra Shekhar into speeding up the investigation, it will be Rajiv Gandhi.

In this bizarre comedy of errors, that will be the final twist. ●

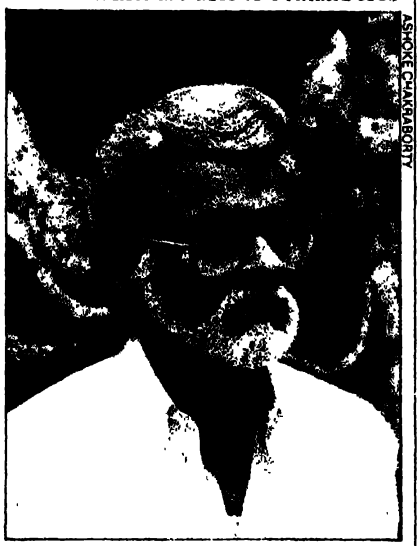
KHUSHWANT SINGH

Brahmin power



I have a consuming interest in castes without having the slightest bit of prejudice for or against any of them. Whenever I am in a conference, seminar or a social function, I count how many of the most important belong to what castes. It has never been more than a matter of curiosity. But one conclusion is inevitable: whatever be the sphere of curiosity—literary, scientific, bureaucratic or whatever—the Brahmin remains the top dog. It may be ethnic; or it may be the result of several generations of learning of which they held the monopoly till the last century, or both combined. Before I give details, we should bear in mind that Brahmins form no more than 3.5 per cent of the population of our country.

My statistics come from a pen friend, Brother Stanny, of St. Anne's Church of Dhule in Maharashtra. He has compiled figures of different castes in government employment during British rule in 1935 and as they were 35 years after Independence in 1982. During British rule, the largest proportion of government jobs (40 per cent) were held by Kayasthas. Today their figure has dropped to 7 per cent. Next came the Muslims who were given special privileges by the British. They had 35 per cent jobs in 1935; in free India their representation has dropped to 3.5 per cent. Christians likewise favoured by the English had 15 per cent; their figure has dropped to 1 per cent. Scheduled Castes, tribes and backward classes, who had hardly any government jobs, have achieved a representation of 9 per cent. But the most striking contrast is in the employment of Brahmins. Under the British they had 3 per cent—fractionally less than the proportion of their population; today they hold as much as 70 per cent of government jobs—I presume the figure refers only to gazetted posts. In the senior echelons of the civil service from the rank of deputy secretaries upwards, out of 500 there are 310 Brahmins, ie 63 per cent; of the 26 state chief secretaries, 19 are Brahmins; of the 27 Governors and Lt. Governors 13 are Brahmins; of the 16 Supreme Court judges, 9 are Brahmins; of the 330 judges of the High Courts, 166 are Brahmins; of 140 ambassadors, 58 are Brahmins; of 98 vice-chancellors 50 are Brahmins; of 438 district magistrates, 250 are Brahmins; of the total of 3,300 IAS officers 2,376 are Brahmins. They do equally well in electoral posts: of the 530 Lok Sabha members, 190 are Brahmins; of 244 in the Rajya Sabha, 89 are Brahmins. These statistics clearly prove that this 3.5 per cent of Brahmin community of India holds between 36 per cent to 63 per cent of all the plum jobs available in the country. How this has come about I do not know. But I can scarcely believe that it is entirely due to the Brahmins' higher IQ.

Satish Gujral

The creative artist has never had it so good. Our top singers and instrumentalists are able to demand fees of between Rs 50,000 to Rs one lakh in hard cash per performance. Paintings by celebrated artists fetch upto Rs 3 lakh per piece. Satish Gujral, who combines painting, sculpture and architecture as his specialities, has become one of the biggest money spinners of our times. Last week he had an exhibition of 23 of what he describes as icons on the Ganapati theme. I got to see them two days after the inauguration. By then 21 exhibits had little red bindis indicating they had been sold. I was curious to find out how much they had fetched and who were the buyers. Since there was no catalogue or price list available, I approached Satish and his lovely wife Kiran who interprets for him. I could not extract details of the price of each piece but Satish told me that the majority of buyers were Indians; only one piece had been bought by the ambassador of Brazil. "Middle class Indians like you and me have come into the art market in a big way. They think nothing of spending between Rs 35,000 and Rs 60,000 for a painting," he said. And added, "For appreciation of art or as investment, I do not know." However, amongst the purchasers were the Birlas—nothing middle class about them.

ASHOKE CHAKRABORTY

Satish Gujral: a money spinner

The icons are made of charred wood and leather to give it the required pitch-black and sombre background. The rest of the woodwork is covered with gold dust. Blue and red beads are placed at strategic points. Though it is difficult for the untrained eye to locate Ganapati's trunk, arms or paunch, the effect is quite spectacular and pleasing. One can sense how much visualisation and work had gone into every piece. It must have taken him years to mould or chisel the wood before it fitted the image he had conceptualised. The one thing missing was the rat which is Ganapati's vahanum (vehicle). I put it to him, "Chhoohey nahin hain!" He smiled broadly and replied, "Daur gaye—they ran off when I put up the icons for public display."

Happy ending

At a recent Lions Club meeting, a political heavyweight gave a very long speech to the embarrassment of all members. However, his beaming private secretary said, "This political speech had a happy ending." At the end of the row one member was heard to remark, "Yes, it was so, everybody was happy when it ended."

Ethnic violence drives Sindhis across the border and into Rajasthan

Amid controversy over Pakistan's role in the Punjab unrest, Pakistan is busy thinking up ways of accusing India of fiddling with Sind. At least that is what the Pakistani Hindus seeking refuge in India believe. And recently there has been an influx of such hapless aliens in Rajasthan.

"The Pakistani police blame us for spying and smuggling arms into Sind," says Lakshman Das, a Rajput gardener who fled from Umarkot, Sind, in end-November. Lakshman Das is among the hundreds of Hindus who have been pouring into Jodhpur, Rajasthan, to seek citizenship from the government of India. According to these refugees, more than 600 families arrived in Jodhpur in 1990 itself, because of the political instability across the border. The official figure, of course, is much less. An official of the state Criminal Investigation Department (CID) put the number of families seeking refuge at around 200. "It is wrong to call these people refugees," the official said. "They come to India with valid visas which we have been extending from time to time. Whether or not they are granted Indian citizenship is to be decided politically."

The seeds of the present communal unrest had been sown during the 1947 Partition. While thousands of Hindu families continued to live in the border belt of Pakistan, many Mohajirs who were living in India infiltrated across afterwards. "The Mojahirs and the local people of Sind are at war with one another and we Hindus are caught in the crossfire," said Shankar Lal, a cobbler who has come over from Sind.

Unfortunately, in Sind, the reality is far worse than just an unrest between two communities. Not only are the Hindus in a minority there: they are also economically the weakest community and therefore susceptible to harassment and intimidation. Today, there are four major politiçal forces operating in Sind, and the student wings of all the groups have taken up a militant posture against the Hindus. Arms are frequently used and proudly flashed and, as one migrant described it, during a shoot-out, most of the roof tops are "taken" by one armed group or another.

The movement launched by the Muslim inhabitants of Sind is called the "Jiye Sind Movement" and is headed by the aged Gulam Mohammad Sayeed. The people of the Jiye Sind have for decades been at loggerheads with the Mohajir Quami Movement (MQM), whose leader, Altaf Hussain, is dreaded by most Hindus. Also in the fray for autonomous rule in Sind are the Pathan leaders, most of whom have settled in the region from Afghanistan and Baluchistan and have added an extra dimension to the economic struggle in the state. The Pathans initially came to Pakistan as refugees; were given a dole by the government but gradually began to arm themselves and usurp business including the transportation trade. There are allegations, however, of the government giving arms freely to the Pathans to continue the period of instability in Sind.

The first bloody clashes between the Pathans and the Mohajirs started around 1986. President Zia had tried to suppress both the armed factions and several colonies of Pathans had been flattened by bulldozers. By the time Benazir Bhutto came to power, the scenario had somewhat changed. Bhutto went into an electoral alliance with Altaf Hussain, who brought her a rich haul of seats from Sind. However, Benazir also began to support Wali Khan, a prominent Pathan leader, and the Mohajirs began to campaign against her.

Again, there have been occasions when activists of the Jiye Sind and Benazir's Pakistan People's Party (PPP) have joined hands. The PPP is the fourth political front which the Hindus have to deal with in Sind, and with its activists and those of the Jiye Sind joining hands, the differences between the Mohajirs came into sharper focus.

Many of the Hindus who have come over from Sind complain that they are treated like second-rate citizens, if not bonded labour, in Pakistan. Among the 200 families who have rented small houses in Jodhpur's Housing Board Colony is that of a Rajput, Sukh Ram, who lives with his wife Ganga and two children. Sukh Ram ran a watch-repair shop in Umarkot, before he fled. According to him, most of the Hindus are forced to desert their homes because of their religion. "We are not allowed to pray peacefully in the temple or celebrate Hindu festivals," he said.

Also, it seems that Hindus in Sind are even finding it difficult to perform the last rites, in the event of a death in the family. At several places in Sind, cremation grounds have been usurped by the Mohajirs and funeral processions would be pelted with stones. Women were not safe either. "Though we are much poorer in India, at least here we can live with respect," said a vividly relieved Ganga. "I never want to go back to Sind."

For a majority of such families, Jodhpur has been a first choice for resettlement, though a trickle of aliens has also reached Bombay and Ahmedabad. The Sindhis are granted three-month visa permits at the Wagah-Attari border, and mostly travel to Amritsar by train. But, in view of the persistent threat of military aggression between India and Pakistan, the Government of India has prohibited resettlement along border towns like Barmer, Bikaner and Jaisalmer. The desert city of Jodhpur is an obvious choice as it already has a sizeable Sindhi population and accommodation is

For most such Sindhi families, Jodhpur is the first choice for resettlement, though a trickle of aliens has also reached Bombay and Ahmedabad. They are granted three-month visa permits at the Wagah-Atari border cheaper than in other parts of the country.

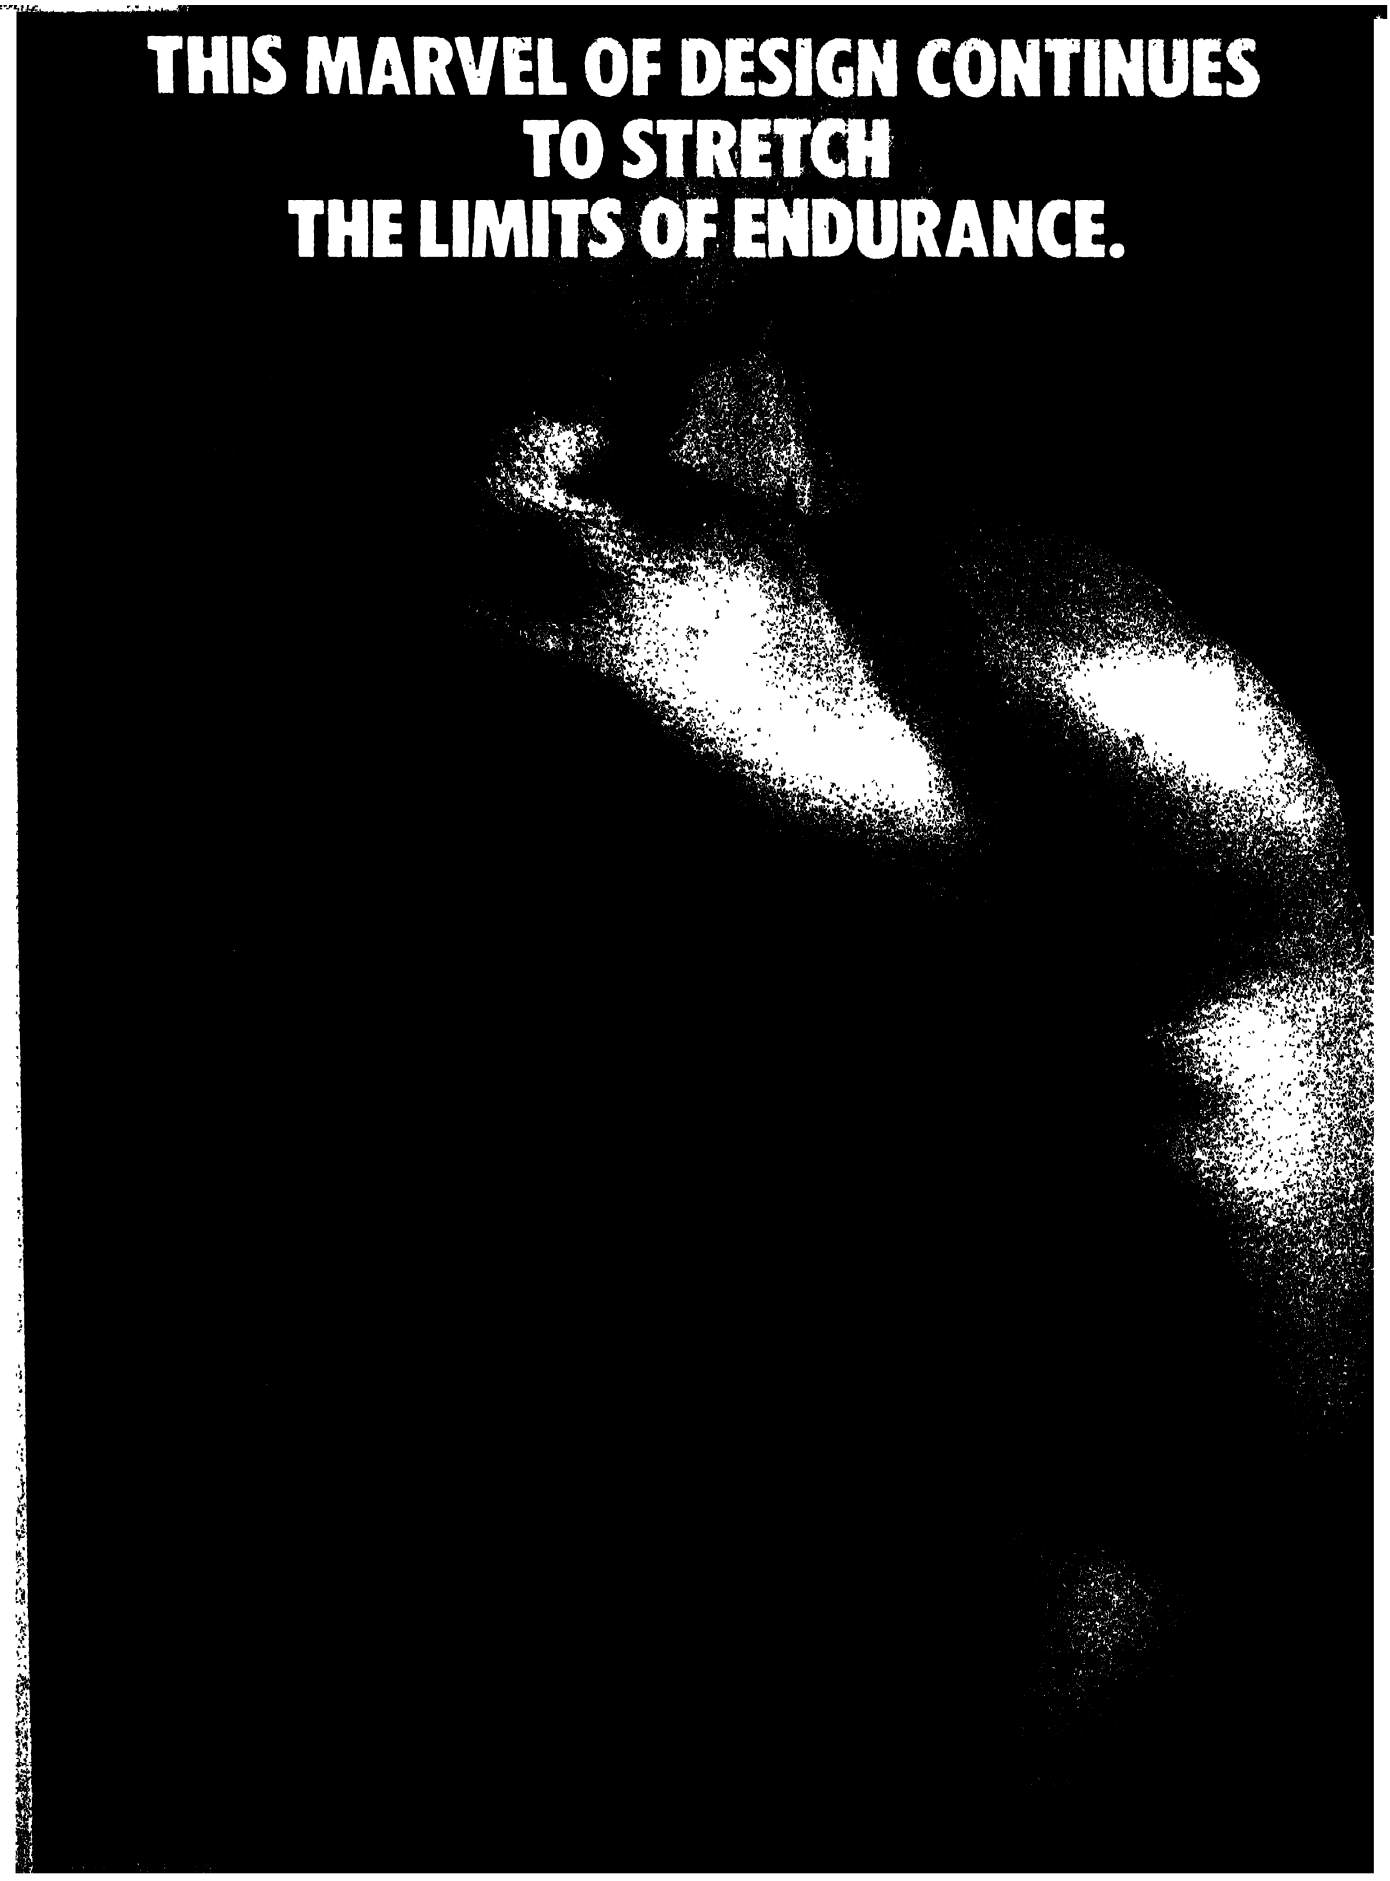
This is the third time that there has been such a heavy influx of Hindus from Sind—the first two being after the 1965 and 1971 wars. In those years, the refugees infiltrated illegally into Rajasthan, and a majority of them were eventually granted citizenship when the BJP came to power in the state. It also helped the party electorally, with the votes of the newly-registered citizens assured to the party. And now the question of citizenship seems to be in the melting pot again.

Though hundreds had filled forms for citizenship, these aliens have little hope of anything materialising soon. But it seems that during the Congress(I) regime many of them got their names in the voters' list and even got ration cards, though they are still officially Pakistani citizens. The method was easy, and still in practice, says Narayan Das, who had migrated from Sind as early as 1982: some relatives of the Hindus from Sind would stand guarantee for the aliens in Rajasthan and the Pakistani families would keep getting their visas renewed every three months.

Giving accounts of their life in Sind, the Hindus recount how every time there was a Hindu-Muslim clash in India, it would have its repurcussions in Pakistan. It started with the communal riots in Meerut last year. And ever since the Babri Masjid/Ram Janmabhoomi issue has flared into a major controversy across the border, the Mohajirs in Sind have been making life difficult for Hindus there.

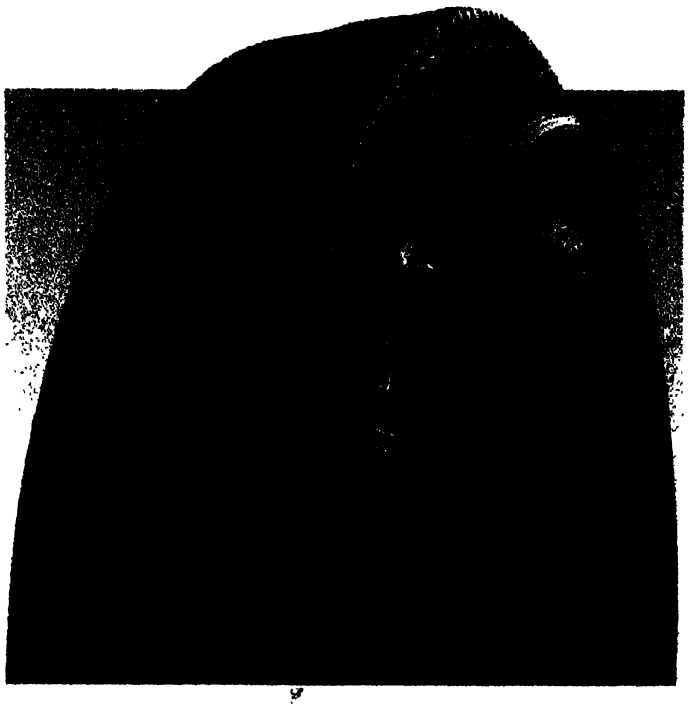
In fact, there is a clear parallel between the situation in Sind,and in Punjab,today. Only, while the militants in Punjab have a common demand for the formation of a separate Sikh state; in Sind there are disparate groups, of different communities, all wanting control of the fertile province. Both Punjab and Sind are agriculturally highly productive areas and while Punjab is the grain basket of the country, Sind has the added attraction of having the port of Karachi. More recently, oil has been struck in Sind—all the more reason why the Mohajirs, the Sindhis and the Pathans want to gain control over what is described as the "heart of Pakistan ".

What is not known is that the violence in Sind has reached the level of terrorism in Punjab. Around ten people are killed in communal clashes every day. Nand Lal, a cobbler who has come to Jodhpur's Pratap Nagar from Hyderabad, Sind, described how even children are seen armed with Kalashnikovs. The colleges are schools for armed activists. "If the Mohajirs get to know there is a wedding, they will come and take away the jewellery," said Lal. "Things did not improve when Benazir took over and we think they will worsen now that Nawaz Sharif is the Prime Minister."



Ever since the Babri Masjid/Ram Janmabhoomi issue flared into a major controversy in India, the Mohajirs in Sind have been making life difficult for Hindus in Pakistan

The frequent ethnic violence in Sind was one of the factors that brought Benazir down in this election. And the new PM, Nawaz Sharif, who was earlier the chief minister of Punjab, is not really much concerned about the rival state of Sind. In fact, none of the Pakistani leaders have taken decisive steps to curb the flow of Hindus out of Sind. They seem to be encouraging Hindus to leave the country. Chela Ram, a 16-year-old boy, whose father had fled from Sind in 1947, declared: "We all think here that Pakistan is a country for Muslims and only Hindustan is the country for us Hindus."



Such feelings will only aggravate the sense of alienation between the two communities in Sind, and probably make things more trying for the Hindus living there. Though there is pressure on the Indian government to grant citizenship to the Hindu Sindhis, their rehabilitation can trigger off a diplomatic controversy. Presently, the refugee problem does not only comprise the people from Sind, but also refugees from Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and Afghanistan. The people from Sind might be trickling into Rajasthan in ones and twos every day, but granting them citizenship would invite similar demands from thousands of people of other nationalities who have been waiting at India's doorstep for years. ●

THIS MARVEL OF DESIGN CONTINUES TO STRETCH THE LIMITS OF ENDURANCE.

SO DOES THIS.

For once we disagreed with international experts.

Performance is fine. That's why the R-90 responds to acceleration, steering and braking with the grace of a ballerina.

But what we considered more critical was the endurance factor.

So we built more rubber into the tread (5mm to be exact), lowered the rolling drag and made the R-90 more resistant to wear and tear.

We strengthened the sidewall by adding a flex - durable compound. And beefed it up further with an unique sidewall protector rib.

We broke another convention. We heat-set the nylon not once, but twice. So the R-90 could better cushion the impact from potholes and bumps.

What about the international experts? Were they unhappy?

On the contrary. Their words reaffirmed what lakhs of car-owners have always believed about the R-90.

TROOPS PATROLLING ALIGARH: a riot-ravaged city

Winter of hatred

A wave of communal madness sweeps across the country

It all began on 4 December, in the Ganj Dundwara area of Etah district. Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) leader Uma Bharti was scheduled to address a public meeting and insisted on passing through the Muslim-majority area of Patiyali Gate en route to the rally. Despite the possibility that violence may result, given the surcharged atmosphere, the administration chose not to prevent Bharti. The procession wound its way through the narrow lanes of the Muslim locality, raising provocative slogans. The BJP MP, of course, claimed that some persons shot on her motorcade from a mosque, injuring one of those accompanying her, a charge strenuously denied by the police.

But whatever the truth of the matter, it wasn't long before rioting broke out. Shops belonging to both communities were looted and destroyed. And as highly exaggerated reports of the violence did the rounds, Muslims in nearby villages were also assaulted and killed. Within two days, the official death toll stood at 15.

Worse was to follow. By 7 December, the day after the kar sevaks commenced their peaceful satyagraha at Ayodhya for the "liberation" of Ram Janmabhoomi, communal violence had erupted in several Uttar Pradesh towns and down south in the city of Hyderabad. As the number of dead and wounded increased with every passing day and the Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) let loose a reign of terror in the best traditions of Maliana, it was clear that things would never be the same again.

As the politicians played their games and the policemen shirked their responsibilities, nobody seemed to care for the innocent men, women and children who lose out in every communal riot

In Hyderabad, a private land dispute sparked off the riots. One person was stabbed in this connection on 6 December and in no time at all the city was in the throes of a communal conflagration. The death toll said it all: 17 killed on 7 December, 30 on the 8th, 13 on the 9th, 11 on the 10th, eight on the 11th , ten on the 12th, 13 on the 13th...Charred bodies were left on the roadside by frenzied mobs who appeared from nowhere and then disappeared into the narrow bylanes of the walled city. The army was called in by the beleaguered Chenna Reddy government, but the violence continued.

As both communities claimed to be the worst-affected, the traffic of the dead and injured continued at the Osmania General Hospital even a week after the orgy of violence. Both Hindus and Muslims began deserting their homes for safer places, fearing a repeat of the rioting.

The Andhra Pradesh chief minister took the view that the riots had been engineered by his rivals within the party to discredit him and the violence was being perpetrated by hired goons. The team of AICC(I) observers blamed the BJP, while it, in turn, passed the buck on to the Majlis Ittehadul Muslimeen (MIM). And while the politicians quibbled on this issue, the situation got progressively worse.

The communal divide was apparent even in the police force. On 12 December, for instance, a Muslim constable shot dead his superior officer, an additional commissioner of police (ACP), while the latter was talking to headquarters over the wireless. Apparently, the constable was upset at the stern measures the officer had taken against some Muslim demonstrators and resorted to this extreme step to express his displeasure. Not surprisingly, after this incident police officials displayed considerable nervousness about going on their rounds, accompanied by Muslim juniors.

THE ARMY IN HYDERABAD: uneasy calm

In Aligarh, the communalisation of the security forces was only too apparent. Trouble began in the city on 6 December, when two Hindus allegedly attacked Munni Devi, a Hindu woman who'd been living with Nabi Sher, a Muslim milk vendor. Sher retaliated the next morning with his men, and soon large-scale rioting had commenced in the city.

On 9 December, after Friday prayers at the Jama Masjid in the Uppercoat area, a PAC constable Vijendra Singh was reportedly attacked by the crowd that emerged from the mosque. Some policemen alleged that shots were fired from the masjid while petrol bombs and grenades were hurled by the crowd. The Muslim version, however, was that the sound of a bomb blast in the neighbouring Sarai Sultan induced panic in the crowd. The PAC jawans immediately opened fire, killing two persons. And it wasn't long before the Hindus joined the PAC offensive. Even the imposition of curfew didn't deter the PAC. In Manubhanja, Jogipara, Khydora, Kazipura and several other areas, the jawans went on a rampage. On 9 December, some of them stopped an ambulance carrying medicines to the affected areas, and beat up the driver.

The same story was repeated in Kanpur. On 11 December, a number of Muslim-owned shops in the Gumti area were set ablaze, apparently with the connivance of the police. At the Hiramanka Purwa outpost, where it was rumoured that a call to resist the PAC had been given from a mosque, the jawans went berserk and opened fire on those emerging from the masjid. At Phulamati Tirha, a Muslim-dominated area, a group of women and children, who were moving from one locality to another, were stopped at gunpoint by the PAC.

But the most shocking incident took place at Goshiana in Chamanganj, where six persons including a woman and her two children were shot down because they were "defying the curfew". It was only after Subhashini Ali, member of Parliament from Kanpur, pressured the administration that the PAC was pulled out of the streets and confined to police stations.

17 December

Riots spread to Bulandshahr in Uttar Pradesh, where 25 persons are killed. Two more people are killed in Hyderabad.

Cassette communalism

Incendiary audio and video-tapes inflame passions and increase violence

Buried amidst the clutter of reports on communal violence, the news item could be missed only too easily. Just when the security forces had restored a semblance of normalcy in one of the bylanes of Hyderabad, some miscreants began playing an audio-cassette on Ayodhya, comprising an inflammatory speech by Sadhvi Rithambra. The tape roused the rabble only too easily. Armed hordes were soon scouring the streets, looking for trouble and some easy targets. And the situation was back to being virtually uncontrollable.

This scary scenario was replayed in almost every city where riots erupted. In Aligarh, Kanpur, Lucknow, Agra, Hyderabad and innumerable small towns of the country, such incendiary cassettes—both audio and video—played on frayed tempers and raised passions to further worsen communal relations and increase violence.

Behind that small news item lurked a story of far greater significance. Technological warfare was being waged between the lunatic fringes of the minority and majority communities, with propagandist video and audio-cassettes being circulated with impunity, while the government pretended that no problem existed.

M.L. KHURANA: careful not to identify with Rithambra's speeches

True, the Delhi administration had banned the playing of Sadhvi Rithambra's cassette, produced by the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP). But several other cassettes, Dr J.K. Jain's film on Ayodhya among them, remained in circulation, including, claimed VHP members, one containing the Shahi Imam's speech in which he asked Muslims to break the legs of ministers for their failure to control the situation.

SADHVI RITHAMBRA: rabid utterances

DR J.K. JAIN: inflammatory cassette

The Union government took the line that this was a matter for the state governments and local police to contend with. The circulation of these cassettes affected the law and order situation, and since the maintenance of peace was a state concern, the Government of India could not be expected to intervene.

Such Muslim leaders as Insaf Party chief Syed Shahabuddin appealed that the Jain Studios-produced video-film on Ayodhya be banned, but to no avail. The Prime Minister, apparently, met Dr J.K. Jain and asked him in his characteristic style: "Kyon musibat khadi kar rahe ho, Doctor? (Why are you creating problems, Doctor?)." But the ban was not forthcoming, despite the BJP video doc declaring, a trifle facetiously, that such a move would benefit him most.

The BJP, however, made out as if the cassette had been banned. The party held demonstrations at Palika Market, New Delhi, playing Rithambra's cassette, earlier publicised as comprising a speech by BJP member of Parliament Uma Bharti, for the benefit of those assembled. And then exhibited the film on Ayodhya, giving the impression that even the video had been banned.

But the BJP members were not charged with playing a banned cassette. Instead, the police arrested them for violating prohibitory orders issued under Section 144, that is, for unlawful assembly. Said M.L. Khurana: "If they had charged us with playing a banned cassette, we would have challenged them in court."

For, the BJP's contention was that the ban was illegal and violative of the fundamental right to freedom of speech and expression. Said party spokesman K.L. Sharma: "People attacked Advaniji and the rath yatra every day. No action was taken against them. If the cassette contains anything objectionable, then why has the government not prosecuted Rithambra? Why have they just banned her cassette?"

But the party is careful not to identify itself completely with the rabid utterances of Sadhvi. "If certain sentences had not been there, the cassette would have been much better," said M.L. Khurana when asked to comment on Rithambra's statement to the effect that Mahatma Gandhi had destroyed the Hindu community ("bede garh kar diya"). Nonetheless, argued Khurana, that was not reason enough to ban the playing of the cassette, especially when the Iman had not been arrested for his inflammatory speech at the Boat Club, despite warrants being out against him.

K.L.SHARMA: "why ban the cassette ?"

Dr J.K. Jain, however, transferred the argument to a more elevated plane, deftly turning the controversy into a matter involving the freedom of the electronic media. The 1952 Cinematography Act, said the video doc, had been evolved for the censorship of feature films, ie, fiction, and the government was wrong in arbitrarily extending it to video newsmagazines. "My contention has always been that pre-censorship of information cassettes is illegal and unconstitutional," said Jain. "If no such restrictions are imposed on the print media, why should the electronic media suffer?"

According to the BJP member, he'd been making what he called "political education cassettes" since 1987 for such leaders as Devi Lal and Ram Jethmalani, which were used during election campaigns. None of these had been submitted for censorship and nobody had ever objected to their public distribution. So, why all the fuss about Ayodhya?

The doctor dismissed allegations of communal reporting out of hand, never mind the near-continuous refrain of 'Jai Siya Ram' on the soundtrack and the frequent references to VHP activists as Ram bhakts. His defence: "The media give news as well as views. And the Ayodhya cassette was made with a target audience in mind: that of VHP and BJP members.

It was not a Hindu-Muslim question he was addressing himself to in the cassette, claimed the doctor, but a human rights issue. The police and the state administration had indulged in destruction of evidence, and failed to conduct post-mortems on the bodies of kar sevaks. He expressed indignation at the [illegible] as if nothing of consequence had happened at Ayodhya. In such a situation, it was the duty of the media to project the truth.

Taking the lead from Dr Jain, the BJP and VHP propagandists also posed as crusaders of the desi version of Amnesty International. Said B.L. Sharma, general secretary of the VHP's Delhi unit: "If anyone talks of atrocities on Muslims, nobody objects. But if we try to project the injustice done to Hindus, we are said to be communal."

The BJP's position, then, was that it was absurd to take to task those who informed people about a crime, while letting off those who had committed it. Instead of banning the Ayodhya (and such other) cassettes, the authorities should investigate the events of 30 October and 2 November and punish those guilty of atrocities against the people.

CURFEW-BOUND HYDERABAD: mindless mayhem

Nonetheless, the VHP was planning to appeal to the Delhi High Court against the order banning the Rithambra tape, according to B.L. Sharma. And Dr Jain was just waiting to be prosecuted for distributing the Ayodhya video-cassette so that he could challenge the government's right to pre-censor information cassettes, while minister of state for information and broadcasting Subodh Kant Sahay maintained bravely that if "someone walks around naked on the street I don't need any legislation to stop him".

Clearly, it would be a long time before the last was heard of cassette communalism. ● anti-Muslim slogans were flown and the Dr J.K. Jain-produced film on Ayodhya beamed through dish antennae. Protests by the Muslim community went unheard, while the police made it only too clear where its sympathies lay. For instance, when a group of Muslims were on their way to meet Mufti Abdul Qayoom, the Imam of Aligarh's Jama Masjid, to tell him about the mischievous kites, they were stopped by the PAC. In the ensuing struggle, three people were killed in police firing and curfew imposed.

Despite repeated requests by the residents of the city, however, the PAC continued to patrol Aligarh, while the BJP fact-finding team returned to Delhi to hold a press conference and allege that only Hindus had died in Pakistan-inspired violence.

The Aligarh Muslim University (AMU) was projected as the epicentre of the violence by BJP leader V.K. Malhotra and others. According to them, hordes of angry young Muslims emerged out of the campus every day, armed to the teeth, and raided Hindu-majority areas. Journalists who'd been on the spot hotly contested this version, but the party stuck to its story.

Disinformation, in fact, was the order of the day. It was widely reported that a PAC jawan, Aparwal Singh, who was fast recovering from a stab injury, had died. On 10 December, all major newspapers reported that several Hindu patients admitted to the Jawaharlal Nehru Medical College Hospital, situated within the AMU campus, were dragged out of their beds and killed. No such incident had occurred, but the report led to the resurfacing of Hindu fury anyway.

JAGDISH YADAV

KAR SEVAKS* IN AYODHYA: rousing communal passions

Eight members of a Muslim family were burnt alive at Katra near Hamdard Nagar the same day. The papers even had it that AMU had been transformed into an arsenal, but barring stray incidents the campus remained quiet.

Contrary to press reports and the stories put out by the BJP fact-finding team, there were no organised offensives launched by the Muslims. Even the Harijans of Saifi Colony, who were attacked by some Muslims admitted that their retaliation had been far more violent, and executed with the connivance of the PAC. As a CPI(M) delegation, which made an on-the-spot assessment of the situation, stated: "Casualties are there on both sides but the brunt has been borne by the minorities."

By 7 December, the day after the kar sevaks commenced their satyagraha at Ayodhya for the liberation of Ram Janmabhoomi, communal violence erupted in several Uttar Pradesh towns and the city of Hyderabad

Surprisingly enough, Varanasi, the centre of Hindu revivalism in UP, didn't witness large-scale violence, despite the build-up by the BJP and VHP. Said Riazuddin, a member of the Small Scale Weavers' Federation: "The memories of the riots that occurred in November 1989 are still fresh in people's minds. Neither Muslims nor Hindus have forgotten the extent to which their earnings are affected." But while the residents of the city remained passive, students of the Banaras Hindu University created a stir by assaulting a Muslim student and smashing the doors and windows of the Urdu and Persian departments. The students even clashed with the administration on not being allowed to organise a procession within the campus. There was no widespread rioting, though, like other UP towns.

But this didn't hold out much comfort for the government, as the communal virus spread to other areas. On 14 December, 11 persons, including nine children were locked up within a house in Bulandshahar district and burnt alive. The VHP's asthi kalash yatra, with the urns of those killed in the firing at Ayodhya, inflamed passions in Agra, and curfew was imposed on the tourist city after incidents of stabbing were reported.

The credibility of the security forces reached rock-bottom when policemen in Aligarh refused to resume duty after one of their colleagues was attacked, and demonstrated outside the office of the senior superintendent of police (SSP). And the Shahi Imam of the Jama Masjid, Syed Abdullah Bukhari, made matters worse by asking that the United Nations Peace-Keeping Force be deployed in Uttar Pradesh as the Muslims had lost faith in the local police force. The BJP and the VHP reacted only too quickly terming the call "anti-national", going on to allege that massive infiltration had taken place from Afghanistan and Pakistan and that it was these foreigners who were clashing with the PAC and giving it a bad reputation.

It was a time for pointing fingers and levelling charges. But as the politicians played their games and the policemen shirked their responsibilities, nobody seemed to care for the innocent men, women and children who lose out in every communal riot.

They are the true victims of this winter of hatred. •

Reddy, unsteady, gone

Communal violence accounts for a second Congress chief minister

In many ways, the parallels between Karnataka's Veerendra Patil and Andhra Pradesh's Chenna Reddy were too stark to ignore. Both were Congress chief ministers at odds with party president Rajiv Gandhi; both became victims of the communal violence that ravaged their states; and both were asked by the party high command to go.

The similarities, however, ended there. While the riots in Karnataka provided just the excuse that Rajiv Gandhi needed to fire Patil, the Congress president seemed to be—initially at least—in two minds about Chenna Reddy's continuance. Then, while Patil defied his party president by refusing to resign until the end, Chenna Reddy—after a brief display of reluctance—stepped aside without a fight. And, finally, while Patil was regarded as an innocent victim of Rajiv's temperamental ways, there were few tears shed for Chenna Reddy. Most people—whether in the Congress, the Opposition or the press—felt he deserved to go.

If Reddy, unlike Patil, left unsung, it was partly because of the extent of the communal violence which consumed Hyderabad for much of the last fortnight—perhaps, the worst in recent memory. His own explanation for the carnage—which he attributed to Congress dissidents—was hardly convincing. At the same time, there were allegations that Reddy himself was responsible for the state police's failure to check the riots as he had, time and again, interfered in the affairs of the force. And then, there were the numerous and growing problems during his year-long reign—particularly, the Naxalite menace and Congress dissidence.

Reddy believed the writing was on the wall ever since the five-member Congress team led by Balram Jakhar arrived in Hyderabad on the evening of 9 December—three days after the violence broke. "They are Rajiv's hatchet-men," his supporters kept suggesting. "He has sent them to do his dirty work." Sources close to 10 Janpath, however, denied the allegation and suggested that it was Chenna Reddy's attitude to the fact-finding mission that finally made up Rajiv's mind.

Although most of the local press did not buy Jakhar's repeated assertion that "the team was not a fault-finding mission and was only there to assess the situation", there were indications that the 'hatchet-men' theory may have been somewhat simplistic. For one, the team squarely blamed the carnage on the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and the Majlis Ittehadul Musalmeen (MIM) and suggested that the violence was a fall-out of the satyagraha to perform kar seva in Ayodhya. Moreover, the fact-finding mission went as far as commending some of the measures that the state government took to contain the violence.

Whatever the truth, there is little doubt that Chenna Reddy resented the presence of the team. The first slight, in the former chief minister's eyes, was its decision to meet state government officials and visit the riot-affected old city area before calling on him. Then, when pro-Chenna Reddy legislators tried to accompany the delegation to the old city, in order to brief it on the violence, they were told brusquely by team-member P.Chidambaram to stay away. To make matters worse, the team sought the assistance of APCC(I) chief V. Hanumantha Rao, a Rajiv Gandhi loyalist, during its visits.

What really upset Chenna Reddy, however, were the complaints of Chidambaram's behaviour. The Congress MP is said to have behaved like the state home minister ordering police officials about and even transferring some of them out of the riot-hit areas. Understandably, Reddy expressed his displeasure at the team's behaviour to the party high command. "They are trying to undermine my role as chief minister," he complained. It is not clear how Rajiv responded to this but Jakhar, at any rate, was at pains to clarify the role of the delegation to the local press, which by now was full of stories about how Chidambaram had insulted Chenna Reddy. The former Lok Sabha Speaker, who had earlier admitted that there were lapses on the part of the state government, now gave the impression that all the team had done was to go around the sensitive areas and suggest steps to improve the situation. "It is up to the chief minister to accept our suggestions or not," said Jakhar.

By the time, the Congress team left Hyderabad for New Delhi on the evening of 11 December, there was no doubt that it was going to blame Chenna Reddy's government for failing to contain the violence. The chief minister, however, told the press that there was no question of his stepping down. After all, communal riots occur sporadically in Hyderabad, he argued. And wasn't what happened in the state capital this time related to the Ayodhya kar sevaks anyway?

To an extent, Chenna Reddy's attitude was related to his meeting with the Congress team just before its departure. Its members had expressed satisfaction about the "corrective measures" that he had taken recently particularly, the arrests of BJP and MIM leaders. This has had a great impact on improving the situation Reddy was told.

The team also gave the chief minister the impression that there was no question of replacing him at that juncture—when the city was still in turmoil. It is probable that Reddy was deluded into believing that he had saved his chair. For, he was shocked and angry the following day when Congress MP M.L. Fotedar called up and asked him to resign. Reddy is said to have banged the phone down after complaining that the violence was engineered by Congress dissidents.

On the same night, the chief minister summoned some of his loyalist ministers and MLAs and told them he was going to quit. He even showed them a copy of a resignation letter he had drafted to Rajiv Gandhi. It was to reach the party president first thing the next morning (13 December), Reddy told them.

The news of his decision to step down was broadcast by All India Radio that day. And the next morning's newspapers front-paged similar stories. But, to everyone's surprise, Reddy decided against sending that letter to Rajiv. And soon enough, Hyderabad was agog with speculation and rumour. 'Had the high command undergone a change of heart?' 'Had Reddy decided to defy Rajiv?' 'Is he going to be the next Veerendra Patil?'

It is not very clear what led Chenna Reddy to hold out. But to Rajiv's frustration and anger, the septuagenarian chief minister behaved as if nothing had changed. He called for a meeting of the state Cabinet on 14 December, which was cancelled at the last minute on the orders of Rajiv himself.

One theory went that Reddy was delaying his resignation for a couple of days so that he could hand out favours. The 14 December Cabinet meeting, for instance, was to grant permission to two private sector groups—Essar of Gujarat and GVK of Andhra—to build power plants at Kakinada and Rajahmundry. Both of these proposed decisions were controversial as plant construction was initially handed over to the National Thermal Power Corporation (NTPC). Moreover, the prices tendered by Essar and GVK were not the lowest.

There was another reason to believe that Reddy was planning to use his last few days as chief minister for this purpose. On the 14th and 15th, he appointed as many as 40 chairmen to government corporations. In some cases, the beneficiaries themselves brought appointment letters to the chief minister's secretariat for Reddy's signature. As many of the appointees were state legislators, it seemed likely that Reddy was trying to gather support within the party before stepping down.

Seeing the way things were going, Rajiv decided it was time to turn the screws on Reddy. On the evening of the 14th, Congress spokesman V.N. Gadgil announced in Delhi that the party's working committee had decided to accept the chief minister's 'resignation'. A letter containing Reddy's offer to quit had supposedly been received by party president Rajiv Gandhi that morning.

If the Congress high command believed that Reddy would immediately follow this up with a resignation letter to Andhra Governor Krishna Kant, it was mistaken. And on the following day (the 15th), Gadgil was grilled by the press about Reddy's stubborness. "Where is the delay?" an embarrassed Gadgil snapped. "We expect Dr Reddy to go to the Governor in the course of today." Later that day, the AICC(I) spokesman told the press that Reddy had informed Krishna Kant of his desire to quit. But, in truth, no such thing had happened.

THE RACE TO THE TOP

INITIALLY, a number of heavyweights such as J. Vengala Rao, P Shiv Shankar and Vijaybhaskara Reddy lobbied to be made chief minister. But their hopes were deflated with the high command's decision that Chenna Reddy's successor must be elected by the Congress Legislature Party (CLP).

Furious over Reddy's defiance, Rajiv telephoned APCC(I) chief V.Hanumantha Rao in Hyderabad on the evening of the 15th and ordered that he convene a legislature party meeting the following day to elect a new leader. As the right to convene a CLP meeting is the chief minister's alone, Rao contacted Reddy and informed him of Rajiv's decision. This led Reddy to throw in the towel: he called Krishna Kant late that night and told him that the much-awaited letter would reach him the next morning (the 16th). Krishna Kant invited Reddy for breakfast, during which his resignation was finally handed over.

Meanwhile, the Congress dissidents, who had been pressing for Reddy's ouster, were lobbying desperately for the post. Among the aspirants were heavyweights such as former Union minister P. Shiv Shankar and former chief ministers Jalagam Vengala Rao and Vijaybhaskara Reddy. Former Governor P. Venkatasubbaiah and MP Y.S. Rajasekhar Reddy also jockeyed to be selected

The hopes of these contenders were squashed when the Congress high command announced that Chenna Reddy's successor would be elected from the state legislature party. This left four serious candidates: education minister N. Janardhan Reddy, animal husbandry minister N. Srinivasulu Reddy, APCC(I) chief V. Hanumantha Rao and former chief minister Nadlenda Bhaskara Rao.

As soon as the four AICC(I) observers—H.K.L. Bhagat, G.K. Moopanar, Janardhan Poojary and A.K. Antony—arrived in the state capital, the Lake View guest house where they stayed became a beehive of activity. In time, the choice was narrowed down

While Veerendra Patil was regarded as an innocent victim of Rajiv Gandhi's temperamental ways, there were few tears shed for Chenna Reddy even further. Srinivasulu Reddy, who was NTR's number two before he defected to the Congress, was ruled out because of his unpredictability and his tendency to shoot his mouth off. And Nadlenda Bhaskara Rao—the man who betrayed NTR to become chief minister for a few days in 1984—would hardly have been an inspired or popular choice.

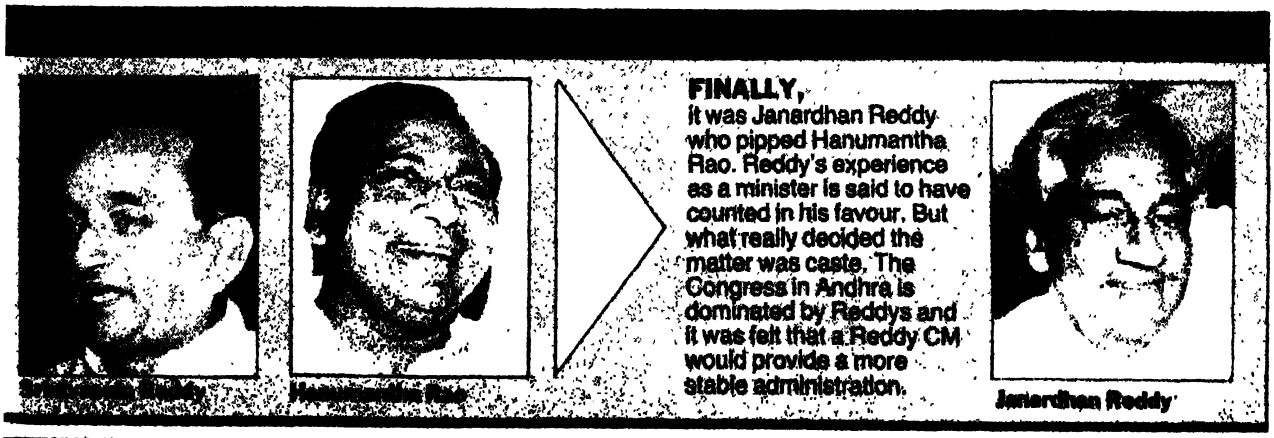
This left Hanumantha Rao and N. Janardhan Reddy. Rao's credentials were impressive: he was a hard worker and enjoyed a consistent record of being a Rajiv loyalist. Moreover, he enjoyed backward class support, an impressive attribute in the post-Mandal political scenario. But, in the end, the party bosses finally gave the nod to Janardhan Reddy.

A number of factors advanced Janardhan Reddy's prospects. He was well-disposed to Rajiv, had administrative experience by virtue of being a minister and enjoyed the support of more party MLAs than Rao. But it was caste considerations that swung things his way. Traditionally, the Congress has been dominated by the Reddys in Andhra and it was felt that the state would be more stable in the hands of a Reddy leader. All the same, Janardhan Reddy did receive the support of non-Reddy heavyweights such as J. Vengala Rao and P. Shiv Shankar. Later, Rao complained privately that he was done in by the Reddy combine and betrayed by friends such as Shiv Shankar, who like him is a backward class leader.



The motions of the CLP meeting were gone through on 16 December and Janardhan Reddy was elected its leader. The new chief minister, however, has his work cut out for him. Apart from ending the communal violence—which has abated but not yet stopped—Janardhan Reddy will have to find ways of containing party dissidence, a problem that dogged Chenna Reddy all through his year-long reign.

In an immediate sense, his first challenge may be the constitution of the Cabinet. Janardhan Reddy had promised just about every third Congress legislator a ministerial post in return for his support. "If he keeps his promise, he will have a Cabinet twice as large as Laloo Prasad Yadav's," muttered a woman M.L.A.

As for Chenna Reddy, it is difficult to say what he will do now. Some estimates had it that he enjoys the support of a sizeable 50 M.L.As—a number which was attained after his distribution of largesse. But it appears that many have deserted him. For instance, on 15 December, only 21 of the 36 MLAs invited to breakfast (which was intended to be a show of strength) by one of Reddy's close associates turned up.

One thing, however, is clear. Congress politics in Andhra will be no less turbulent and dissidence-ridden with the exit of Chenna Reddy. There are enough factions in the state to ensure that. ●

ON THE BRINK

Can Mulayam Singh Yadav survive?

There was a certain inevitability to the denouement. For most of 1990, the rise and rise of Mulayam Singh Yadav has been one of the most extraordinary features of politics. A man who had been dismissed as just another Yadav leader with an inferiority complex about those who spoke English, emerged as the kingmaker of Indian politics and the saviour of Indian Muslims.

And yet, while Mulayam was rewriting the rules of Indian politics, there were those who expressed reservations. The Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), of course, regarded him as Maulana Mulayam, a traitor to his own people. But even within the Janata Dal, Ajit Singh, his rival for prominence in UP politics, treated him as a mere demagogue, while Arun Nehru and Arif Mohammad Khan believed he was a dangerous rabble-rouser whose actions would damage Muslims more than they would affect Hindus.

In the Congress(I), Mulayam's successful cultivation of a Muslim constituency was treated with alarm as local UP leaders saw their traditional vote-bank slipping away. But Rajiv Gandhi refused to make common cause with Mulayam. His views were not dissimilar to Arun Nehru's: he felt that the UP chief minister was pandering to Muslims and thereby creating new communal conflicts. These views first found expression in Rajiv's now famous SUNDAY interview (Time to be frank, 12—18 August 1990) and though they were never again exposed with quite the same force, they guided the Congress' thinking.

Thus, last week, as riots spread across UP and the state administration seemed unable to control them, it was the Congress that made the demand for Mulayam's head. Though Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar tried to shield his friend from Rajiv Gandhi's wrath, the feeling was growing that Mulayam had overplayed his hand.

Yes, he had become the leader of the minority. But he had also become a hate object for the majority.

The way the Congress sees it, the situation is simple enough. The party replaces its chief ministers when they prove incapable of controlling communal violence. It demonstrated this with Veerendra Patil in Karnataka and again, with Chenna Reddy in Andhra Pradesh.

By that criterion, Mulayam has to go. This is the first time that riots have taken place in nearly every important UP town: Kanpur, Meerut, Aligarh, Varanasi, etc. Both the state police and the Provincial Armed Constabulary have also revolted against the Mulayam government.

The man who was dismissed as just another Yadav leader with an inferiority complex about those who spoke English has emerged as the kingmaker of Indian politics and the saviour of the country's Muslims

Moreover, such is Mulayam's personal unpopularity that he finds it impossible to visit areas in his own state. His car is often attacked and his helicopter has been stoned, as it was recently in Nainital. In Chandra Shekhar's own constituency of Ballia, the chief minister stalked off the stage at a public meeting after chappals rained down on him.

According to the Congress, such a man cannot be expected to maintain law and order, particularly when the majority community hates him so much. His cultivation of the Muslims might have paid off had he been able to make the minority feel secure, but as Muslim homes have gone up in flames in the current riots, Mulayam has not been able to achieve that either. Also, because the Muslims believe that the state armed constabulary is pro-Hindu, Mulayam is perceived as being unable to protect their interests.

The Congress has another reason for getting rid of Mulayam. The political scare-mongers told Rajiv earlier this year that their party had lost the support of the Muslims to Mulayam. Rajiv did not react. A few months later, when the Janata Dal split, the Congress backed Mulayam against V.P. Singh's efforts to topple him.

Then, the same scare-mongers told Rajiv that their party had lost the support of the Hindus because it backed Mulayam.

So far, at least, Rajiv has been unwilling to accept this see-saw approach, though he must be perturbed by reports that the Congress has lost 12 per cent of its vote to the BJP in UP.

His position is slightly different: forget the vote-bank and concentrate on law and order. Regardless of which community supports/does not support Mulayam, the Congress cannot be expected to back a man who is incapable of maintaining the peace.

There is a logical basis to the Congress argument, but it puts Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar in a difficult situation. At the time when the Congress was first asked to back Mulayam, Rajiv suggested that Yadav be brought to Delhi as Union home minister. Somebody else from within the Janata Dal(S) could take over as UP chief minister and be guaranteed the Congress' support. This quite reasonable proposal met a premature death because of Mulayam's intransigence. "I would rather sell peanuts on the streets of Lucknow than be home minister in Delhi," he announced melodramatically.

Now that the Congress' worst fears have come to pass, the party has revived that proposal with one proviso: Mulayam can have any portfolio except for home. The Congress feels that a man who can't keep the peace in UP can hardly be trusted to maintain law and order throughout India. One suggestion is to give Mulayam defence. Another is to give him industry. (At present, Shekhar holds both portfolios.)

So far, Mulayam is refusing to shift to Delhi, though Shekhar has upped the ante to include the deputy prime ministership. On 17 December, he rushed to Delhi to meet both Shekhar and Rajiv and explain his position. Chandra Shekhar was sympathetic, but Rajiv was uncompromising because he had to contend with the UP state Congress, whose leaders are in favour of unilaterally withdrawing support from the government.

As the communal situation in UP continues to give cause for concern, Mulayam's position seems increasingly untenable. How long can he survive? ●

RISE AND FALL

The year of Mulayam Singh Yadav

MULAYAM AND V.P. SINGH

PHASE I

Mulayam was not V.P. Singh's candidate. The Raja wanted Ajit Singh to be UP chief minister, but Yadav made it because he had the support of Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal.

Ajit never liked him and V.P. Singh remained suspicious.

ADDRESSING A RALLY

PHASE II

Certain that VP and Ajit would topple him, Mulayam carved out a base for himself among Muslims and backwards. This made it difficult to touch him. He began to be seen as a national figure.

MASJID/MANDIR

PHASE III

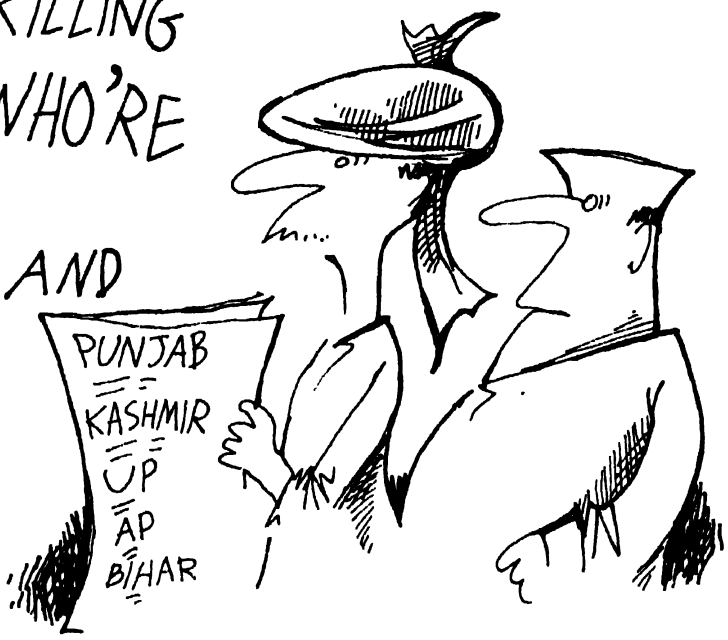
The test of Mulayam's credentials was the kar seva at Ayodhya. He used force to keep the kar sevaks from the masjid/mandir.

In the process, he antagonised the Hindus.

MULAYAM AND SHEKHAR

PHASE IV

While V.P. Singh was keen to be associated with the Ayodhya action, Mulayam accused him of double-dealing and broke with him to support Chandra Shekhar's bid for the prime ministership. VP tried to topple him. He stayed afloat with Congress support.



RIOT-TORN ALIGARH

PHASE V

Mulayam paid the price for his cultivation of the minorities when unprecedented communal violence rocked UP. He proved unable to protect the Muslims, control the police or win the trust of the Hindus. The Congress demanded his removal.

Agenda for Sri Lanka

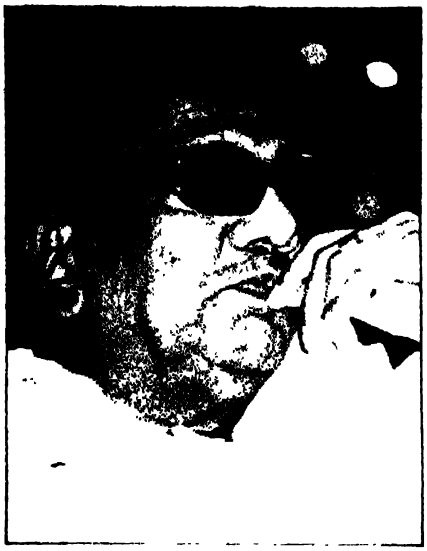
As a child, I used to love long drives through my home district of Thanjavur in Tamil Nadu. The green of the paddy fields stretching endlessly to the horizon in that particular Thanjavur shade of glistening green. The wind wafting through the paddy in waves of emerald chasing waves of emerald. The women, dressed in all the colours of the rainbow, bending to their tasks like column upon column of birds of paradise. The palm trees standing straight as sentinels, stretching dozens of feet into an azure sky, then suddenly throwing their arms out in protection. It is a land of great tranquility, peace and beauty, a land for the refined cultivation of the mind and the soul.

Not, alas, any longer. It is also now—thanks to the combined exertions of V.P. Singh and that startling son of its own soil, Honorary Doctor Great Artiste Muthuvel Karunanidhi (the titles are as integral to his name as chicanery is to his character)—it is also now, as I was saying, the maw in which is being crushed the hopes of the Tamils, both the Tamils of India and the Tamils of Sri Lanka and, to use a favoured phrase of the Great Artiste himself, "the Tamils of the World". For it is more in Thanjavur than perhaps even in the redoubts of the Jaffna peninsula or along the cutting scythe of the Trincomalee Bay or in the Killing Fields of Batticalao that the fate of the Tamils is being decided.

Let me explain.

Back in those grim days last December when not the electorate but sleight of hand brought upon our heads the V.P. Singh government, Inder Kumar Gujral manufactured a Sri Lanka policy before the mandarins of the ministry of external affairs could even commence the necessary process of detoxifying the National Front's foreign policy manifesto prescriptions.

Determined to show the Sinhalas what good little chaps we were (a fact which, incidentally, had not escaped the Sri Lankans even if it had our homegrown Rajiv-baiters), the first assumption of the National Front's Sri Lanka policy was the need to apologise to Sri Lanka for the previous government.



So, before you could say Junius Richard Jayawardene, the V.P. Singh government unilateraly announced that we were pulling out the IPKF and leaving it to Sri Lanka to implement—or not implement—(as their fancy took them) the Indo-Sri Lanka Agreement of 29 July 1987. Not even Ranjan Wajeratne, the street-smart foreign minister of Sri Lanka, could believe his luck. He thought he'd better check out if the Incredible were, in fact, the Truth. So, without even an invitation—let alone a by-your-leave—Wijeratne plopped down at Palam like an unsolicited bread basket dropped from the skies. Where another government would have firmly—if politely—escorted the Sri Lankan foreign minister back to the airport and snapped a finger to hail a passing aircraft to take our friend back to Colombo, Gujral—who would have made a great protocol assistant if destiny had not reserved for him the external affairs ministership—slipped a disc rolling out the reddest carpet available for the Man Who Came to Dinner.

Could we, said Wijeratne, have a date for the IPKF to pull out? Certainly, replied Gujral, shall we make it yesterday?" No, no, guffawed Wijeratne, not at all, dear boy. 31 March would make a splendid deadline.

And, betimes, the mandarins in attendance spluttered what about the implementation of the Agreement? What of the preconditions incorporated in the joint India-Sri Lanka communiqu of 18 September 1989? What about the safety and security of the Tamils? What of real devolution to the North-East Provincial Council? What

Where another government would have firmly escorted Wijeratne back to the airport and snapped a finger to hail a passing aircraft to take him back to Colombo, I.K. Gujral slipped a disc rolling out the reddest carpet available, for him of the future of the merger of these predominantly Tamil provinces? What of the induction of Tamils into the Sri Lankan armed forces, where they constitute less than one per cent of the personnel despite constituting over a quarter of the population? What of a police force under the command of the chief minister of the North-East, drawn from the Civilian Voluntary Force and the Additional Civilian Voluntary Force trained by the IPKF? What guarantees that the forcible Sinhala colonisation of Tamil lands will end? What promise that Colombo's divide and rule policy of driving a wedge between Sri Lanka's Tamil-speaking Hindus and Tamil-speaking Muslims will be stopped? What of amendments to the Constitution to give constitutional sanctity to those solemn pledges of the Indo Sri Lanka Agreement not covered by the 13th amendment piloted by former President Jayawardene through the Sri Lankan Parliament? What of the LTTE being restrained from murdering its fellow-Tamils? What of the LTTE being brought into the democratic process? And then -and only then the one question to be posed after all the other questions have been satisfactorily answered: what might be the possible time frame for the withdrawal in phases of the IPKF?

Instead of enunciating a Sri Lanka foreign policy, Karunanidhi, with the acquiescence of the Prime Minister, the external affairs minister and the union home minister, contented himself with inviting the Tigers into his own lair

Gujral had no time for any of these questions of substance. His aim was confined to earning plaudits from his superannuated luncheon companions at the India International Centre.

Even the notorious Anandpur Saheb Resolution of 1978 concedes that foreign policy should remain a Central subject. Not for V P. Singh such Constitutional proprieties. Either that– or he regards Eelam as a taluka of Tamil Nadu. Whatever be the explanation. V.P. Singh simply devolved Sri Lanka policy to the chief minister of Tamil Nadu The Great Artiste quickly hammered out a policy based on four key parameters that had everything to do with the DMK's domestic political compulsions and nothing at all to do with national interests, national perpectives or national imperatives

First, abuse the IPKF to curry favour with the LTTE, never mind that the IPKF was manned by Indian jawans, no less than 1200 of whom had laid down their lives in the service of the nation. Second, cultivate the LTTE for the gentle persuasion the LTTE resorts to against their own Tamil opponents so that the DMK cadres might usefully learn such instructive lessons for deployment against their own democratic opponents. Third, leave Sri Lanka to the Sri Lankans, even if it means the sabotage of everything so patiently achieved after years of negotiation by MGR and Rajiv Gandhi, so that a point can now be scored against Jayalalitha and Vazhapadi Ramamurthy. And fourth, as for the unity of Sri Lanka, the immunization of the island from powers hostile to our vital security interests, equality for the Tamil minority, autonomy for the Tamil regions, and the guarantee of basic civic, political and human rights to the Tamils—the Code of the Karunanidhis apparently deemed that since the DMK was intent on depriving India's Tamils of democracy, decency and the quiet life, why should the Indian government bother itself with guaranteeing such goodies to the Tamils of Sri Lanka?

Instead of enunciating a Sri Lanka foreign policy, Karunanidhi, with the acquiescence of the Prime Minister, the external affairs minister and the union home minister, contented himself with inviting the Tigers into his own lair Does it surprise you that old K is now heartbroken at the exit of his dupe and is rapidly emerging as the South-of-the-Vindhyas counterpart of Sharad Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan in nursing V.P.'s Great Illusion of the Backward Bylanes to the Comeback Trail?

As for the Tamils of Sri Lanka, I have for 11 months seen the pain and bewilderment in their haunted faces, the sorrow and the humiliation in their hunted eyes. It has been for them months of unmitigated misery. If we are relieved that the Raja's Raj is over, they are ecstatic. It is only the Tigers and their zoo-keepers who harbour any regrets.

When Mahatma Gandhi led the Salt Satyagraha to Dandi in Gujarat, Rajaji led the salt march in the South to the small fishing town of Vedaranyam on the Thanjavur coast. It is from that same Vedaranyam that Karunanidhi began the process of devolving to the Tigers our sovereignty over our coastal lands and our territorial waters. Admiral Ramdas, the new Chief of Naval Staff, has revealed how hundreds of LTTE cadres caught by our Navy cavorting illegally in our waters were simply let off on the orders of the chief minister. I have heard tales of a collector who, on his personal bond, secured the release of LTTE militants caught red-handed in the act.

RAW and IB reports—unread or, at any rate, unheeded by V.P. & Co—have swollen the files of the Prime Minister's Office with hair-raising stories of the Tigers smuggling gold into India, smuggling narcotics out in turn, smuggling more gold in, and smuggling arms, ammunition and explosives out in a never-ending but ever-widening chain of crime and vice. The same reports speak of cadres of the Dravidar Kazhagam (specifically the Kovai Ramakrishna faction) and the Naxalite "Tamil Liberation Army" receiving training from the LTTE in the use of arms, including the deadly AK-47. It is again the same sources that have detailed the growing links between the LTTE and the Punjab terrorists, the LTTE and the Hizb-ul-Mujahideen on J&K, the LTTE and ULFA.

Not intelligence but ordinary police reports exist in the files of both the State and Central Governments of a girls' polytechnic at Vallam, on the outskirts of Thanjavur, being used as a military base by the Dravidar Kazhagam's Tharkolai Padai (Suicide Squad) in conjunction with the LTTE—threatening, in real measure, to become the Tamil Nadu equivalent of the Golden Temple under the Bhindranwale occupation. Police officers routinely tell anyone who cares to ask that arrested LTTE cadres insouciantly demand hot-line communication direct with Karunanidhi or his ministers—and equally routinely receive instructions to let the "boys" off.

At the point of a gun, LTTE militants demand —and get —priority supplies of upto 200 litres and even 300 litres of diesel a time, while truck drivers and farmers on tractors sit it out in snaky queues for hours at a stretch to collect a measly five litres—which is all that diesel rationing in the state entitles them to.

Is it any wonder then that such a regime has done all it can to cover up the tracks of the assassins of the EPRLF's Pathmanabha and 14 others, that far from arresting any of the assassins' accomplices, it has merely indiscriminately harassed the relics of the victims themselves? Or that it does nothing about the extortion resorted to by gun-toting LTTE agents against not only Sri Lanka expatriates but even Indian businessmen? Or that it closes its eyes to the Tigers terrorising Sri Lankan refugees in their wretched camps with informers? Or that it lets a printing press in Madurai, owned by a DK activist, churn out, without let or hinderance, vast quantities of LTTE propaganda?

While Chandra Shekhar firmly tells Karunanidhi that the conduct of foreign policy has been resumed by the Centre (and that if the Great Artiste gets up to any unconstitutional mischief he'll get the order of the boot), Vidya Charan Shukla needs to hammer out a perspective plan for what the new government should set out to achieve in Sri Lanka. The point of departure of such a strategy must necessarily be the unambiguous reaffirmation by the Government of India (to make up for the lapses of the last 11 months) of the need to honour and implement the 1987 India-Sri Lanka Agreement. And Sri Lanka must be persuaded, cajoled, blandished, bullied, bribed and threatened—in whatever combination circumstances merit—into fulfilling its Treaty obligations.

Next is a time-table for talks, progressing in stages from bringing the LTTE and non-LTTE groups separately to Delhi for talks with the Central Government, followed, in due course and after a number of preliminaries are cleared, by direct talks between the non-LTTE groups and the LTTE, leading to the evolution of a Tamil consensus that can provide the basis for an interim settlement between the Sri Lankan Government and the Sri Lanka Tamils, guaranteed by the Government of India, which could result in a resumption of that process of democratic devolution—but this time with LTTE participation—which was so rudely interrupted by the tragic interregnum of our own Laurel & Hardy show, the V.P.-Gujral jugalbandhi. ●

For the Tamils of Sri Lanka, it has been 11 months of unmitigated misery. Now that the Raja's Raj is over, they are ecstatic; it is only the Tigers and their zoo-keepers who harbour any regrets

I must apologise to readers who have been appalled by my dreadful mistake in my last column in saying the bumblebee defied the laws of "thermodynamics" when I should, of course, have said "aerodynamics"! The No-men

Biman Bose of the CPI(M) and Govind Acharya of the BJP are two sides of the same coin

NPTN RAI

They represent, at one level, two opposite, even antagonistic, sides of the political spectrum. At another, they could not be more similar. On one side is: Govind Acharya, 47, a hardcore BJP activist; and, on the other, Biman Bose, 50, a diehard CPI(M) leader. The political chasm between them is so wide that this comparison would make them flinch. Yet, at one level, both are driven by the same basic forces and held together by an unlikely quality, the courage of conviction. They are the 'No' men of contemporary Indian politics. They are the antithesis of the 'Yes' men and the sycophancy that characterises today's age.

Neither men are household names. They cannot be seen waving to the crowds or hogging newspaper frontpages. The trappings of office do not excite them, nor does the prospect of a mention in contemporary history. Yet, these two men are currently perhaps the two most significant backroom boys in politics.

Both men are enormously important in their respective organisations. And they have reached their present positions through half a lifetime of backbreaking organisational work and the ability to think independently. For them, the real world is far bigger, more complex and awesome, than the narrow view afforded by partisan sights. They sense that a clouded or motivated reading of the real world can only lead to faulty actions and ultimately to an obscure future for themselves and their organisations as well.

For, both at heart, are wedded to their respective political parties. Both are bachelors for whom life revolves around the party. They genuinely believe in the ideologies they profess and if they are fierce about anything, it is the interest of their parties. Only, they are not two blind, servile soldiers of higher leaders. They are two independent minds that will survive the vicissitudes of present day politics.

Acharya is a national executive member of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and special assistant to the party president, Lal Krishna Advani. Prior to the 1989 Lok Sabha elections, Acharya had played a key role in the process of arriving at electoral adjustments with other parties, particularly in Bihar. In more recent times, he mediated between his party and the V.P. Singh government during the rath yatra and Ram Janmabhoomi crises. Political observers in New Delhi believe that Acharya functions as the right hand man of Advani and executes crucial party decisions in his inimitable, low-key manner.

Acharya's special clout derives from his association with the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangha (RSS), in which he holds the privileged rank of pracharak. The RSS along with the BJP, the students' organisation called Akhil Bharatya Vidhyarthi Parishad (ABVP) and the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), belong to the loosely knit family of organisations, called the Sangha Parivar. All the members of this family are free to frame their specific policies, appoint office-bearers and manage their own finances. At the same time, they all share a common ideal, that of Hindu revivalism.

Biman Bose, similarly, is a member of the Communist Party of India (Marxist) central committee (equivalent to the BJP's national executive) and an extremely influential member of the party's West Bengal unit. Bose has also risen from the party ranks. He started his political career in the CPI(M) students wing, the SFI (Students' Federation of India), which gave him opportunity to travel to diverse parts of the country. Bose's views, consequently, are not circumscribed by the regional boundaries within which he is confined. He has also been involved in a number of national level activities.

The trappings of office do not excite them, nor does a mention in contemporary history. Yet, these two men are perhaps the two most significant backroom boys in politics

In recent times, Bose's voice has acquired a new authority in West Bengal politics. However, he has chosen not to join the government or become a public figure, as has his compatriot, Buddhadev Bhattacharya. "My work is carried out behind the curtains," he says. "The more publicity I get, the worse it is for me." But when Bose puts his foot down, his party listens.

Neither Bose nor Acharya are scared of voicing opinions that might not exactly match the rhetoric of their leaders. Bose, for instance, publicly decried police action against protesting crowds. Earlier, he had spoken out against corruption in the CPI(M)-run Calcutta Municipal Corporation and was instrumental in the ouster of the former mayor, Kamal Basu. He is also critical of the blind conservatism preached by many of his Bengal party comrades. Recently, he was dismayed to learn that the women's wing of his party planned to issue strictures against women wearing salwar kameez and sporting short hair. "People don't seem to understand that times are moving fast," he says in exasperation. "The sari is a nice dress, but it is inconvenient and so is long hair."

Bose believes in adapting and rising above dogma. "Communist parties are basically democratic: if any member whether senior or the most junior, can support his point of view with logic—relevance to the prevailing objective and subjective conditions, and with the basic tenets of Marxism-Leninism—there is no reason why his view should not be affected." Bose believes in this and obviously practises it.

Acharya has not had occasion to publicly air his views. But if he did, it would raise a lot of eyebrows. For, his views are refreshingly candid, without the usual rhetoric spouted by his party leaders. He does not, for instance, hold that the BJP's impressive showings in the last general elections was a one-to-one reflection of the party's intrinsic strength. Rather, he believes at least four factors were responsible: Opposition unity, the Hindu factor, the anti-Congress(I) vote and the pro-change atmosphere prevailing in the country.

His analysis of V.P. Singh's downfall is equally dispassionate. He does not believe that deceit or treachery on the part of Singh played any part in the entire episode. "V.P. Singh was always clear about his politics. He wanted to win over other minorities, the backwards and the Scheduled Castes," explains Acharya. "We knew this and acted according to the dictates of our own politics. "Singh's mistake, according to Acharya, was in underestimating the Sangha Parivar's commitment to the Ram Janmabhoomi issue. In other words, had the BJP-V.P. Singh relationship been ruled merely by political compulsions, there would have been no showdown or collapse. And Acharya is candid in admitting: "The fall of the government was certainly a loss for us. But the loss was greater for the Janata Dal."

The similarities between the two go beyond their style of politics, their openness and cognitive abilities. Their lifestyles too are uncannily similar: austere, almost ascetic—Bose lives in a tiny room where the legendary CPI(M) leader Promode Dasgupta lived, while Acharya occupies a bare room at the back of the BJP office in New Delhi's Ashoka Road. Both politicians spend their days receiving party workers, getting reports and staying in touch through the telephone. And both come from middle-class backgrounds: Acharya grew up in Varanasi where his father taught in a local college; Bose was brought up in a joint family in Calcutta's middle-class neighbourhood, Ballygunge.

Acharya grew up in a world of ideas and tradition. He ultimately chose to uphold those ideas and find their expression through politics. Bose, on the other hand, rejected the old breed of politicians for whom politics is a mere tool to capture state power. They believe that state power is just an instrument to establish the values they believe in. At one level, the two men are potentially more dangerous than most politicians. For, it is the zealots and the believers who have wreaked havoc on mankind in recent times. On the other hand, politics bereft of beliefs and ideas has proved sterile and ultimately ruinous to the Indian people. Now, it is the turn of the believers—the Boses and the Acharyas. •

PREMIER SHOW

"A lot of people saw the film long before it was released," he admitted. Nevertheless, added director Satyajit Ray, his latest offering Shakha Prashakha went down well with the first-night audience.

The world première of the release, held at the Nandan auditorium in Calcutta, had several celebrities in attendance: French sex symbol Gerard Depardieu and Toscan Du Plautiere (joint producers of the film), Ketan Mehta, Habib Tanvir, Kumar Shahani, Mohan Agashe and, of course, such members of the cast as Soumitra Chatterjee, Mamata Shankar and Dipankar De.

LOOK, IT'S RUSHDIE!

The jowls were slightly heavier and there was less hair on that distinguished head. But it was Salman Rushdie, signing copies of his latest book, Haroun And The Sea Of Stories at a London bookshop, to the bemusement of most onlookers.

In hiding for nearly two years after Ayatollah Khomeini passed a death sentence on him for his blasphemous book, The Satanic Verses, Rushdie appeared in public for the first time, escorted by a posse of bodyguards.

Looking happy and relaxed, despite the strain he is under, Rushdie spent 20 minutes at the shop, chatting to shoppers, who clearly couldn't believe their eyes.

The surprise visit fuelled rumours that a deal had been struck between the Iranian and British governments to allow Salman to come out of hiding.

But Iran was quick to put everyone straight. No, the death sentence on Rushdie stood. And he could bid all hopes of leading a normal life goodbye.

Leave aside the occasional visit to a bookshop, no doubt.

Old cricketers don't fade away. They turn to modelling, column writing and administration, instead.

And now, former Test spinner S. Venkataraghavan has added a new vocation to that list, standing in as an umpire in a Ranji Trophy league match between Uttar Pradesh and Railways.

Always a keen student of the game, Venkat served on the technical committee of the cricket board. And then, after umpiring some local league games, sat for the board's umpire examination in Bombay.

S. Venkataraghavan: second innings

Not surprisingly, he was the only one to score a hundred per cent in the exam, and the Ranji assignment followed soon after.

But Venkat doesn't find his new role too different. "You only have to concentrate more," he maintains.

And, if his record as a spin bowler is anything to go by, that shouldn't be too difficult.

LOST AND FOUND

Confusion reigned in the Joshi household. Noted vocalist of the Kirana gharana, Pandit Bhimsen Joshi, had left his Pune home on what looked like a routine visit to some friends. But 36 hours later, there was no sign of the singer, and the worried family hit the panic button.

Without reason, as it turned out. For, Joshi was safe in Hubli, confabulating with his good friend Gangubhai Hangal on the 38th Sawai Gandharva Sangeet Mahotsav, soon to be staged in Pune. And, as is his wont, he'd forgotten to inform the family about his plans.

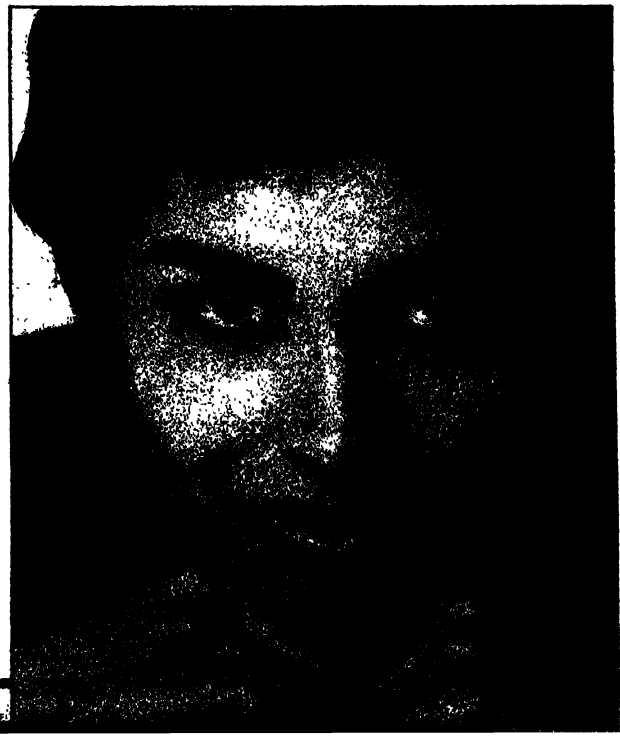
Bhimsen Joshi: up and away

He rectified the fault well after one day was over, calling Pune to give details of his whereabouts. And his nephew was promptly despatched to Hubli to escort an abashed Joshi home.

MY FAMILY AND OTHER ANIMALS

You've known Pamella the sex symbol, sleaze queen, wild-life and sport photographer. Now meet Pamella, lover of snails and other animals. (And no, it has nothing to do with her obsession with a teddy-bears' picnic, either.)



In a recent interview with Danny Danziger of The Independent, London, Bordes revealed a little-known side of what she describes as her "weird" personality. Said Bordes: "I had snails all through my schools and when I wrote to my mum I used to make them walk over the envelope and I would seal the letter with the slime and write 'sealed with love and a kiss and a hug from Cracker'."

The confessional mode continued. Her mother taught at a university where experiments were conducted on animals, disclosed Bordes. "One day the keeper forgot to lock the cages, my brother and I freed every animal and went away. It was wonderful. We kept it a secret until this day," said Pamella.

Unfortunately, this revelation, like her other disclosures, had little impact.

Perhaps, the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals will offer her life membership, if nothing else.

BACK ON THE TUBE

He'd boycotted television after being asked what he regarded as communal questions during an interview. This was in the run-up to the general elections.

But now that Doordarshan has established its bona fides as the best propaganda machine in the business, Sharad Pawar has reversed his stand.

Sharad Pawar: television makes for better publicity

The Maharashtra chief minister was featured on TV recently, being interviewed by Dr Jabbar Patel, the well-known film director. Answering questions on a wide range of subjects, Pawar came across as a surprisingly agreeable personality. And a family man to boot, the camera lingering on his wife and daughter occasionally, to drive the point home.

Now that he's proved himself a TV natural, Bombay viewers will, no doubt, be administered an overdose of the CM.

When even the latest innovations become history before they become news, there is no time for complacency. Philips* never forgets this. Yes, Philips gave the world the X-ray tube, the audio cassette, the laser video disc and the compact disc, and brought modern lighting and radio to India – but that was yesterday. Today's Philips is already in the future. As always, Philips components lie at the heart of most of today's electronics. Because they're based on Philips' inside knowledge of micro-electronics, our components are chosen worldwide in products ranging from computers to radios. Our professional electronics equipment provides analytical, testing, communication and automation tools for changing R&D and industrial needs. Our extraordinary audio equipment breaks barriers in sound. Our lighting technology is so advanced that it sets the standards for others to follow. And our TVs let you see right into tomorrow.

We've given India our best for over 60 years. We'll do it for the next hundred.

The TV epics

Ramayan and Mahabharat: were they responsible for the recent spate of Hindu revivalism?

There are some aspects of the impact of the TV serials Ramayan and Mahabharat that have been widely discussed. We know that they recorded unprecedented viewership ratings, raked in staggering sums of money, brought everything to a standstill on Sunday mornings and held the whole nation in thrall.

The other—and hardly considered—aspect is their impact on the Hindu mind. Could they, as both the political right and the left in India have obliquely suggested, have been a major cause for the recent spate of Hindu revivalism?

If the question has rarely been asked directly, it is because the answer is difficult to conclusively establish. No systematic empirical studies have been conducted on the influence of these serials on Hindus. All we have are informal newspaper surveys carrying the remarks of a haphazardly selected cross-section of viewers. (Examples: "I started visiting temples regularly only after Ramayan." "Mahabharat made me realise that being a Hindu is a matter of pride.")

Moreover, the question has a shallow or unacademic air about it. Can something as complex and mysterious as Hindu revivalism be caused by something as mundane as the idiot box? Surely, a social phenomenon of this import requires to be traced to more weighty causes—political, economic or other?

Perhaps. But there are still many people who believe that the two TV serials were major contributory factors towards the recent upsurge in Hindu religious sentiment. Even Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) leaders—some of who have publicly admitted that the serials "helped them"—appear to concede this. And as for the left, the plausibility of the thesis is perhaps suggested by its fierce criticism of the serials, which, it feared, could alienate the minorities and fan retrograde religious feelings among the majority.

While this may be impossible to prove, there is no doubt that the serials had an unprecedented impact on the people. Ramayan, at its height, had a viewership rating of over 70 per cent; Mahabharat clocked a giddy 96 per cent, a figure which suggests a national obsession.

A number of explanations have been proferred for this success. The serials were said to have embodied ancient and very Indian values, recalled memories of stories told at childhood and appealed to the collective unconscious. But, to many, the attitudes of the viewers were the most cause for concern. Pujas were performed in front of TV sets before Ramayan was shown, power cuts during the screening often led to violence and watching the serials became as compulsive and important as, say, a visit to the temple. Clearly, to most people, the serials represented more than well-produced entertainment (which they possibly weren't) but constituted a moving religious experience.

Here, one may well be tempted to ask: so what? For even if, as Mahabharat producer B.R. Chopra admits, "the two serials made millions proud of their culture and religion",

Says Mahabharat's Chopra: "My serial may have been misused by politicians. But this shouldn't be used to judge it" can this be equated with a dangerous Hindu revivalism?

SANTOSH GHOSH

Perhaps not. But, in part, the criticism of the left and liberal-minded is based on suspicions regarding the decision to air the serials. Both Ramayan and Mahabharat—along with the Discovery Of India—were cleared in 1986. And the decision to screen them, as well as the choice of producers, were made by the central government. To many, this smacked of cynical politics: that while the mammoth 52-part Discovery Of India, with 'Nehru' as anchorman, was a plug for the Congress party, the even longer Ramayan and Mahabharat were aimed at pleasing the Hindus.

Says well-known literary and film critic Iqbal Masud: "With these two serials, Doordarshan—which had evolved the formula of screening socially relevant programmes such as Hum Log, Buniyaad and Nukkad—made a dangerous departure. The government started to cynically activate religious sentiment. I see the impact of this on young people—particularly from the lower-middle classes." Adds P.C. Joshi, chairman of the Institute of Mass Communication and professor of Delhi's Institute of Economic Growth: "The reasons behind the decision to screen these serials must be examined. It would be simplistic to say that the ruling party wanted to be the beneficiary of the Hindu vote. But it may have wanted to make out that Hindu identity could be accommodated within the Congress. The serials sent the message: 'We (the Congress) are not anti-Hindu'."

Neither Masud nor Joshi—who, in fact, headed a Doordarshan committee which recommended that Indian culture be more widely represented on the electronic media—is against the screening of Mahabharat and Ramayan in principle. But both believe that there were far more sophisticated and less dangerous ways of doing so.

Says Masud: "Ramanand Sagar and B.R. Chopra are trashy filmmakers who failed on the commercial circuit. Why were these serials—which were full of commercial cinema masala – handed over to them? One result of this was that viewers came to understand that whoever is a non-Hindu is an enemy. You could say that Ram became a substitute for Hindu and Ravan for non-Hindu." Joshi has a similar but more moderate view: "These projects should have been handed over to people who could be regarded as authentic continuators of Indian culture. The result then would have been artistic and not propagandist."

There is, of course, another sense in which the serials led to politics becoming mixed with religion. During the Allahabad by-poll, the Congress used Ramayan's Arun Govil—dressed up as Ram—in its election campaign. Later, actor Raj Babbar (Mahabharat's Bharat) lent his character to the Janata Dal campaign during the November 1989 elections. And even Mahabharat's Muslim script-writer Rahi Masoom Raza admits that "L.K. Advani very consciously tried to associate his rath yatra with the theme of the serial." So great was the belief in the vote-gathering power of the serials that there were objections raised last year that the Janata Dal's election symbol—the wheel—resembled that used in Chopra's Mahabharat too closely. Says Chopra, "My serial may or may not have been misused by political parties. But this shouldn't be used to judge it."

Chopra says it is illogical to claim that Mahabharat vitiated the communal atmosphere as it is more a mythological yarn than a religious text. "This has nothing to do with TV serials. The truth is that we are passing through a period of Hindu revivalism. And there are certain political compulsions for the fostering of fundamentalist attitudes," he explains.

The strongest argument in favour of his view is, in his opinion, the secular viewership that his serial enjoyed. "Everybody has seen it in Pakistan. And nobody can deny that millions of Muslims watched it in India. You can't get a 96 per cent viewership with Hindus alone."

Both Masud and Joshi agree that Ramayan and Mahabharat were watched keenly by the Muslims but claim that the community, unlike some sections of the Hindus, saw them merely as spiffing yarns. Nevertheless, whether it approved of these programmes being shown on television is a different matter. The informal newspaper surveys, which have quoted Muslims both for and against their airing, are ambiguous on this question. Says Muslim leader Syed Shahabuddin: "My view is that most Muslims looked upon these programmes as the misuse of the national media for religious purposes and not as cultural programmes."

Such arguments and debates, of course, are all too likely to be subordinated to economic compulsions. Doordarshan earned a hefty Rs 20 crores from Ramayan and as much as Rs 57.42 crores from Mahabharat. Clearly, there are windfalls for more than just the producers of such serials.

It is probable that Ramanand Sagar understands this fact well. He is already in the midst of making a serial on Lord Krishna, which he hopes will be aired on television, despite Doordarshan not having approved it yet. Perhaps, in the end, it is not politics or religion but money which matters when it comes to mythological extravaganzas. •

Columnist Khushwant Singh calls it a day

It came as a bolt from the blue. When Khushwant Singh, the most widely read columnist in the country, decided to call it a day, editors of several newspapers and periodicals were not unduly worried. For, over the years, Khushwant's columns added both variety and revenue to the publications which carried them. But for the columnist himself, there were more pressing engagements at hand: Khushwant Singh had lined up his autobiography long back but was unable to concentrate on it because columns took away most of his time and energy. "In any case," he said candidly, "people have been telling me it is high time I stopped writing such rubbish."

D.V. JAYNER

It was a dinner meeting with author Vikram Seth which finally did the trick. Seth argued that Khushwant Singh should give up writing his columns and concentrate on books. And Khushwant agreed

But surely there must be more behind Khushwant's decision to quit. The columnist himself admitted that at 75, he felt that age was catching up with him. Moreover, two incidents hit him badly. First was the death of his friend, Charanjit Singh, followed by the demise of his cousin brother-in-law. Finally, it was a dinner meeting with author Vikram Seth which did the trick. Seth convinced Khushwant to devote all his time to writing books.

Readers apart, in strictly financial terms, Khushwant Singh stands to lose around Rs 45,000 every month. "In fact," joked Khushwant, "when my wife came to know of my earnings from the columns, she wanted to know if I was sure I was doing the right thing." Editors and owners have not yet reacted to Khushwant's decision as yet because he has told them that he might resume writing for newspapers after three or four months. "And during this period," he added, "if they decided they did not miss me too much, it might be an unpleasant surprise for me too."

Of course, there can be no doubting the popularity of Khushwant's pen. This episode should settle all doubts. When Khushwant Singh returned the Padma Bhushan award in protest against Operation Bluestar in Punjab, the then Hindustan Times editor, N.C. Menon, wrote a strongly-worded editorial criticising the action. Khushwant Singh promptly withdrew his With Malice Towards One and All column from the paper. And within three weeks, Khushwant recalled, the circulation of the Saturday edition, which carried Malice, dropped by at least 10,000 copies.

That's not all. Soon, the paper's executive director, Naresh Mohan, came to Khushwant with a request from proprietor K.K. Birla to resume his column. "I agreed only after I had it in writing that the request had come from Birla himself and that not a word of my column would be changed." Only Khushwant Singh perhaps could bargain for such a deal.

Khushwant Singh is indeed a prolific writer. Apart from penning his weekly columns, he also contributes to foreign magazines like Stern, Cosmopolitan, and The New York Times. Besides, Khushwant has already written more than 50 books and his latest, New Delhi, was an instant sell-out. The book has created publishing history by going in for its eighth re-print within one year.

In between writing his columns, Khushwant Singh started on his autobiography and is at present on the fourth chapter. Now, he will have all the time to concentrate on the book, which undoubtedly will be an epic affair. "I already have requests from magazines for exclusive rights of the first chapter— even at the draft stage," said Khushwant.

Such an interest is understandable. Critics feel that of particular interest to the reader would be Khushwant Singh's account of the pre-Partition days, the Emergency, Operation Bluestar and, of course, his relationship with women.

For all this, Khushwant says, he will be relying heavily on the personal diaries which he has been maintaining systematically. For instance, Khushwant has in his possession a detailed account of what transpired between Indira Gandhi and her daughter-in-law Maneka before they split. "I was close to the family then and I still don't forget the abuses used by Maneka and her sister," said Khushwant. The book will also have an interesting account of his friendship with Jayalalitha.

In literary circles, the autobiography is already being talked about as a best-seller—even before it has hit the stands. After all, it is the account of a man who is undoubtedly among the country's best story-tellers. ●

"One has to be realistic"

Aditya Vikram Birla on the economy, the government, group companies and his life as a painter

After the father, the son. Basant Kumar Birla spoke to SUNDAY six months ago (issue dated 17-23 June 1990), outlining his plans for his companies, talking about his corporate philosophy and giving our readers a glimpse of his personal life. But above all, B.K. talked about his son, Aditya Vikram, as someone whose capacity, dynamism and verve he believes in, and who, hinted B.K., would be the corporate presence of the 1990s. As a force in the B.K—Aditya Group's Rs 5,300 crores worth of companies.

Last fortnight, Aditya met SUNDAY. The son uses words more sparingly than the father, but no less emphatically. The scion of what is India's largest independent business empire talked to us about the state of India's economy, the government, his operations--specially, the synthetic textile, cement and fertiliser businesses—and his life as a painter. This year, Aditya went public with his paintings—copies of other masters' works, admittedly, but with enough of a personal touch to bring his exhibition positive reviews. Excerpts from the interview:

SUNDAY: How would you evaluate the present business environment in India?
Aditya Birla: Indian entrepreneurship and Indian management have finally come of age. They have matured and become systems-oriented. This, in turn, spells a bright future for the business environment of the country. Indian companies abroad are doing extremely well and are giving all multinationals a run for their money.

I have established 16 companies in South-East Asia—Indonesia, (the) Philippines and Thailand—which are not only faring well but growing with the day. Our balance sheets record the best sale-profit ratio in (the) Philippines, and we produce the best quality yarn in Indonesia. We also export 60 per cent of our products to Australia, Europe and a host of other countries which are highly quality-conscious.

Q: But how can one be optimistic about the economic environment of India when political conditions are so unstable?
A: Frequent changes in the systems of governance in any country directly affects its industry. But fortunately, we have a good bureaucracy which has prevented the total disruption of our economy inspite of successive changes in the government. Since the governments that came and went were all oriented towards encouraging the private sector, not much damage has been done.

But there is no denying the fact that when you have a stable government, then the (industrial) growth rate increases.

Q: What about the short-term prospects of the Indian economy?
A: The short-term prospects are difficult, very difficult.

There are several problems. At the moment we are burdened by the severe crunch of foreign exchange. Then there are problems that have been perpetuated by the Gulf crisis. The communications system is inefficient. You do not get power at reasonable rates and the quality of power too, is sub-standard. We get less of bitumen (coal), more of ash (in it) and even stones with coal that damage our boilers.

ASHOK CHAKRABORTY

The prices of inputs supplied by the Indian government are higher than elsewhere. All this culminates in a high-cost economy.

Q: To what extent has the Gulf crisis affected India's exports?
A: The United States of America and the United Kingdom have been hit by a severe recession, some of which has to be shared by us. But the basic fact remains that we are not as competent exporters as our neighbours— Taiwan, (South) Korea, Singapore, Thailand and even Malaysia. Theirs is a healthy low-cost economy characterised by high productivity and special infrastructural benefits made available by the government. Therefore, they have a distinct advantage over us.

What we require immediately is an improvement in productivity in each unit to increase our share of exports in the world market.

Q: What about the synthetic textile mills—including the ones run by your group—that are major consumers of petroleum products and by-products? These will surely be hit by rising petroleum prices. And if you plan to pass the cost increase on to the consumer, do you think he will be able to absorb it?
A: There are two basic fibres that we produce in our synthetic textile mills – viscose staple fibre and terylene. We are not very competitive in the production of the latter. But we have achieved a high degree of success in the production of viscose fibre.

You will be surprised to know that we sell viscose fibre in India at a price that is much lower than the prevalent world rates. This is primarily because we are the largest producers of viscose fibre in the world and our technology is extremely quality-oriented. Because of our relentless research, constant upgradation of our machines and de-bottlenecking we have become extremely cost effective and we are giving our consumers in India the advantage of this.

Q: And the cement industry? Is the industry optimistic, keeping in mind the bad patch that it went through recently?
A: Yes, as you say,the cement industry did go through a disturbing phase but the last four months have been reasonably good. The demand persists and prices have gone up. By the next two to three years cement fortunes should become much more satisfactory.

Q: But if the price of cement per bag increases, do you think the government will encourage it?
A: Not at all. But one has to be economically realistic. If the costs go up, if you want a fair return to ensure proper growth of the industry, then you must have price rises that are commensurate with a fair return to your commitment.

Q: Some newspaper reports have mentioned an acute shortage of fertilisers by 1991. Would Indo-Gulf Fertlisers stand to gain?
A: You must be referring to the speech made by the deputy Prime Minister (Devi Lal) where he said that while fertiliser demand had gone up, the production has not kept pace with the growing demands. If so be the case, Indo-Gulf is geared up to take up all challenges. Today we are operating at 126 per cent of the rated capacity. When we established the plant, we had a certain pricing formula. Thereafter, the government changed the formula and made it unrealistic. We protested and told them that with this kind of formula even repayment of debts would become difficult.

The government was compelled to revise the system. Indo-Gulf now looks forward to getting clearance from the government to expand its capacity to double. However, while we do expect a fair return we are not anticipating a very good return.

Q: Talking about Indian entrepreneurship, the general opinion is that while the average entrepreneur is shrewd, innovative and canny, he is dishonest, he does not have integrity.
A: My work experience spans eight countries. And I say this not by conviction but by experience, that our standards of honesty are no worse than the standards of integrity of an average entrepreneur in any other part of the world. This notion, that Indian entrepreneurs are dishonest is not true. Indian entrepreneurship is perhaps more intelligent and there is more of entrepreneurship in India than in any other part of the world.

But I concede that there is a dearth of managerial talent in the country. We have to produce better managers. I feel that barring the first five per cent of managerial talent that is available, Indian entrepreneurship is trapped within mediocrity.

Q: Could we talk about Aditya Birla, the painter? What inspires you to paint?
A: It is a long story. Fourteen years back, I went through a difficult phase and was at home for three weeks. A relative suggested that I paint to pass the time. It was then that I realised that I could paint. I was surprised. Over the last 16 years I have worked on 13 canvases.

Painting gives a lot of satisfaction to my creative instincts. As I have said before, putting up a factory and painting are similar in many ways. For putting up a factory you choose a site and conceive the plant. It's the same with painting. You have a blank canvas and start from scratch.

Q: Do you subscribe to the growing trend of commercialisation of art?
A: Not at all. Art should not be viewed as a commercial proposition. Art should be enjoyed for art's sake. You buy something because you appreciate it, not because it will fetch you a tidy sum in the next ten years.

Q: Is there any logic behind recreating paintings? Why don't you, for one, work on an original theme?
A: Well, you must have a lot of talent to work on an original theme. Moreover, I certainly do not have the courage to paint an original. Maybe when I have some time in hand, I may try an original. All the rave reviews that my exhibition fetched has made me more confident.

Q: What makes you tick?
A: (Laughs) God! ●

POLICY PROBLEMS

Amma, dear amma

Kerala's industry minister K.R. Gowri is in a soup over her protection of K.P.P. Nambiar, her scandal-ridden protégé

Not too long ago, amma was all Kerala's industrial sector talked about. Here was a lady who, despite being a solid, no-nonsense Marxist, was progressive enough to realise that the state required an economic boost, and that the only way out of a disastrous slump was to bring in private sector investment. Even three months ago, amma, as Kerala industry minister K.R. Gowri is popularly known, was the state's manna, its economic mentor.

Today, she is regarded as one of the biggest mistakes in recent times.

Gowri has fallen out with the state's Communist Party of India (Marxist) leadership. Over her highly personalised style of functioning, and the way in which she is going all out to protect Kerala's special advisor for industries, Kunnath Puthiyaveetil Padmanabhan Nambiar. There may be some rationale—after all, Nambiar is as progressive as Gowri. But the thing is, Nambiar, a former secretary of the department of electronics in New Delhi, is as scandal-ridden as they come. And Gowri is staking her political future for a person whom nobody will now touch, even with a bargepole.

Recently, Nambiar has been the subject of a controversy involving Bangalore-based Namtech Exports Pvt. Ltd and KELTRON, the state government's electronic goods manufacturing agency that he helped set up. The brouhaha involves Namtech's being appointed agents to push a deal for KELTRON, for digital control systems, to the Soviet Union. (See SUNDAY 14—20 October, 1990) Nambiar is part-time chairman with KELTRON, and chairman of Namtech, a company that his son, Padman, owns.

Still, the Marxists would not dare to take any action—yet—against Gowri because she is a popular leader. Highly-placed CPI (M) sources—who decline to be identified, told SUNDAY that the party has asked Gowri to change her style of functioning and to drop Nambiar from her orbit. Because, they say, from what was her once exalted status in the party, Gowri has been virtually reduced to a cipher, Nambiar's, actually.

Which is not really a bad thing, considering what the duo started out to do. Less than a year ago, Gowri set forth to court private business for setting up industries in the state.

Gowri is staking her political future for a person whom nobody will now touch. For, Nambiar, a former secretary of the department of electronics in New Delhi is as scandal-ridden as they come

Nambiar and Gowri talked about an aggressive approach to industrialisation. Gowri even announced in the state Assembly that private ventures would be welcome. And Nambiar confidently told SUNDAY in an interview in April this year that "the government is very keen to industrialise the state, and I am sure big names in Indian industry are bound to come to Kerala ...(Gowri) is sharp and goes through all files pertaining to her department and is able to take quick decisions. I am just coordinating with her for the rapid industrialisation of the state."

Now, it seems that the duo is out of step with Kerala's ground realities. For one thing, their progressive approach angered Stalinist hard-liners within the party who accuse Gowri of never consulting them before taking any decisions. Besides, they do not agree with anything remotely resembling perestroika—this time, Mikhail Gorbachev notwithstanding. For another, as a call for privatisation meant curbing Kerala's militant trade unions, a major reason behind entrepreneurs shunning the state, the Centre for Indian Trade Unions (CITU), a CPI (M) affiliated organisation, is livid.

Perhaps the most important shortcoming of the team, however, is the fact that of all the projects with big names they had tom-tommed as being indicative of their policy success, not a single one has actually gone through. And the Gowri-Nambiar team is also being accused of lying and, deliberately misleading the government and the people of Kerala by presenting untruths for personal glory.

The first major operation was the much-talked about move to hand over the state-run titanium dioxide unit, Kerala Minerals and Metals Ltd (KMML), to the Tatas. Nambiar is a former Tata employee, and in fact, gave TELCO chairman Ratan Tata

Nambiar, Gowri and Nayanar basked in the glory of bringing one of India's top industrialists to the state...Ratan Tata announced that he would finalise a Rs 30 crore telecom project in the state within six months. Now, eight months later, nothing has happened the red-carpet treatment when he visited Trivandrum last February (See SUNDAY 11--17 March, 1990) At that time, Tata said that his visit formed part of an "old personal" commitment to Nambiar. As flash-bulbs popped and Nambiar and Gowri basked in the glory of bringing one of India's top industrialists to the state, they raised the state's hopes. Especially as Tata announced that he would finalise a Rs 30 crore telecommunications project in the state within six months.

Now, eight months past the date, nothing has been heard of the telecom project. But still more shocking is that KMML is still in the red, and the Tatas have gone to neighbouring Tamil Nadu to set up a titanium unit, thanks perhaps, to chief minister Muthuvel Karunanidhi's more persuasive charm. Says a top CPI (M) leader in Kerala, who declines to be identified: "Gowri amma never got the green signal from the party secretariat to hand over KMML to the Tatas. All this big talk of the Tata takeover was engineered by Nambiar." The trade unions, particularly CITU, was against the deal, so it appears to have been a non-starter from the beginning.

(Gowri, who readily spoke to SUNDAY even two months ago, and Nambiar, who earlier, practically went overboard to talk to the magazine, both refuse to clarify their stand with SUNDAY.)

More criticism. About a year ago, Nambiar visited the US and brought back with him one Dr Satish K. Sanan whom he introduced to the Kerala cabinet and the press as a computer software expert. Gowri even arranged a presentation by Saran at the secretariat. There, Saran announced that he will be setting up a Rs 300 crore export-oriented software unit at the Cochin Export Processing Zone. It was to be a joint-sector project with KELTRON, and Gowri asked the government agency to prepare a project report. Three months later, KELTRON, report all ready, sent it across to Sanan's US address. Says a senior bureaucrat at the industry ministry: "The report was returned with a postal note that the addressee could not be found."

At the prestigious Trivandrum Golf Club, where senior bureaucrats meet in the evenings over drinks, the joke is that any fly-by-night operator can get a red-carpet treatment from the Kerala government, provided Nambiar sponsors him.

Nambiar keeps on saying that the Tatas, Birlas, Kanorias and Vijay Mallya's UB Group have made overtures to Kerala. But the fact is that nothing concrete has emerged out of these proposals. Even the Raunaq Group, which already has its Apollo Tyre unit in Kerala, preferred to locate another unit in Gujarat, far away from trouble-prone Kerala.

Nambiar keeps on saying that the Tatas, Birlas, Kanorias and Vijay Mallya's UB group have made overtures to Kerala. But nothing concrete has emerged out of these proposals

Another much-talked about instance: a venture between the Kerala Tourism Development Corp. (KTDC) and the Taj Group of Hotels to set up a hotel project in Trivandrum has not come through. The land has yet to be allotted. Besides, the unions are opposed to another project, a Taj takeover of an incomplete KTDC hotel in Cochin (where Taj already runs a hotel, the Malabar).

Recently, some of Gowri's moves have been negated, an indication of her plummeting clout. She sought to remove K. Vijayachandran, secretary of the state's bureau for public enterprises who has CITU backing, from his post. But last month, she was embarassed when the party leadership intervened, and extended Vijayachandran's term, despite Gowri's strong opposition.

Today, noone really takes Nambiar, Gowri and chief minister Nayanar seriously. And their critics are going around building public opinion against them, especially Gowri and Nambiar. For instance, Susheela Gopalan, a member of the state secretariat of the CPI(M) and Vijayachandran's relative is said to be the main force behind the anti-Gowri lobby in the state. The two questions doing the rounds in party circles are: why is Gowri protecting Nambiar? And why is chief minister Nayanar shielding Gowri and Nambiar?

The threesome are not talking. And according to party sources, while Nayanar may hold on to his political mantle, he is likely to sacrifice Nambiar. And even Gowri, who will be allowed to continue as minister till the next elections, but will not be allowed to contest polls.

Nambiar's exit from Kerala's industrial scene is unlikely to generate tears. But Gowri is another matter altogether. As a pragmatist, she was appreciated. But now, there appears to be a sense of disappointment over her actions and the fact that she has not been able to fulfill her promises. As far as amma concerned, her political sunset is near. And with her—unfortunately—Kerala's economic sunset too. •

■ Bury the Centaur

With the A320s back in the air, the civil aviation ministry has resolved its most pressing problem. But it has yet to decide how to tackle another problem: the Hotel Corp. of India (HCI).

Owned by Air India, HCI runs the two airport Centaurs (Bombay and Delhi), a beachfront hotel in Bombay's Juhu, a hotel that caters to Japanese pilgrims in Rajgir, Bihar, and an ill-starred property in Srinagar.

Of these, the airport hotels survive on the traffic from delayed flights. The Kashmir property is closed. The Rajgir hotel operates only for five months a year. And the Juhu Centaur which was opened with great fanfare recently has deteriorated alarmingly, with cockroaches over-running the bedrooms, inedible food and unhelpful staff.

Harmohan Dhawan: curtains for the Centaur?

When he was managing director of Air India, Rajan Jetley tried to hand HCI over to the India Tourism Development Corp. but didn't succeed. Now, the new civil aviation minister, Harmohan Dhawan is also keen to act before things get much worse.

One proposal that finds much favour in Sardar Patel Bhavan is for Air India to sell 49 per cent of HCI equity (or to hive off the hotels as individual companies and sell just below half of each company's equity) to non-resident Indians in return for hard currency payments. Private sector hotel companies would then take over the management.

The idea is appealing but there are two catches. One: who would want to buy the Srinagar Centaur? And two: what happens to HCI's surly, unprofessional staff?

Kishore Chhabria: to our health and theirs

■ A Vôtre Santé

France prevented Indage India's Sham Chougule from using the 'champagne' tag for his sparkling wines. But that didn't stop him from exporting the stuff and carving out a name for Indian 'champagne' in the West, even Japan, giving France the go-by.

Shaw Wallace has it easier. The Rs 600 crore-plus Indian liquor giant, managed by Kishore Chhabria, doesn't have to battle French pride, and chauvanism.

The company plans to export six of its premium wine and liquor brands—Muscari and Golconda red wines, Moghul Monarch and Royal Challenge whiskies, Pink Lady gin and Olde Adventurer rum—to France by the beginning of 1991. This is purely an experimental export attempt, but a crucial one for Shaw Wallace. If the French—noted for their fussy affinity to all products Bacchanalian—accept the Indian liquors, the company can trumpet the achievement to the rest of the world. Especially with the Muscari brand wine, which company executives say has been made from superior grapes. This is a first, the export of Indian wine to France. Well, cheers. ●

ALLIANCE OF THE WEEK

B.K. Modi-CIT Alcatel

● If it works, it could be a major telecom alliance. The B.K. Modi Group and France's largest telecom outfit, Alcatel, have signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) to make digital telephone exchanges. These exchanges are to be based on Alcatel's E10 series of exchanges. The E10-B is already being manufactured at Mankapur, Uttar Pradesh, in collaboration with Indian Telephone Industries, and has a capacity of five lakh lines a year. The thing is, Alcatel was denied a second facility at Bangalore, courtesy Sam Pitroda, which now makes exchanges with Centre for the Development of Telematics technology. Pitroda and Alcatel have never really got along, and the French company's venture with Modi—the post-MOU situation willing—could help circumvent the Pitroda bogey. With Pitroda around, however, it won't be easy to do that. Unless Alcatel pulls some heavy-duty strings thanks to B.K. Modi. But the French company's last attempt to reach out in India failed. It was said to have recruited the Hindujas' help, mention industry observers, but that got Alcatel nowhere.

A different reshuffle

Chandra Shekhar plays the good guy

"A good leader," Richard Nixon once said, "needs to be a good butcher." This was an axiom that Rajiv Gandhi never paid much heed to. At the best of times, he is a bad butcher: firing chief ministers at airports and foreign secretaries on TV. Vishwanath Pratap Singh, on the other hand, made a marvellous butcher. Soon after he took over, he reshuffled the bureaucracy, sacked Governors and yet, managed to cloak his butchery with an air of moral uprightness.

Over the last week, Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar finally wielded the knife. The changes, when they came, were not particularly surprising (most had been anticipated by SUNDAY : Who's in, who's out, 9—15 December). What was most extraordinary, however, was that a strict no-punishment policy seems to have been followed. Those that had to go, went. But all found jobs elsewhere that were more or less equal in status, even paan-chewing Cabinet secretary Vinod Pande, who had presided over the politicisation of the bureaucracy.

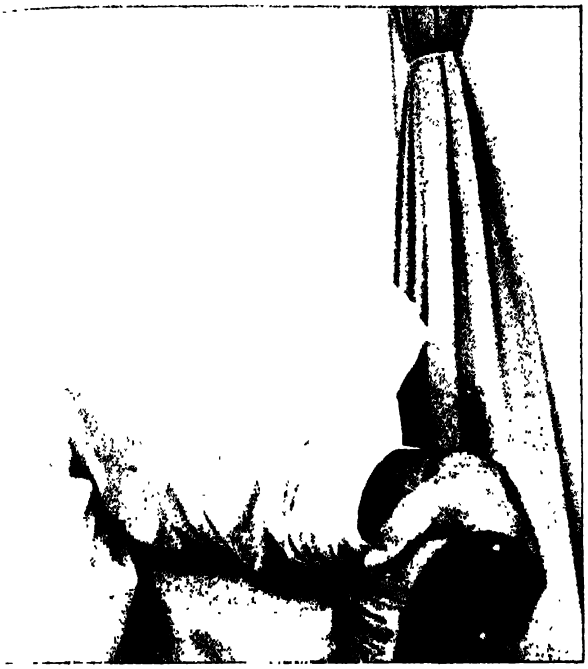
Consequently, the civil service reshuffle was regarded with relief by the bureaucracy and earned surprisingly little rancour from its victims. Only one man seemed unhappy: Rajiv Gandhi.

It is now becoming increasingly clear that while Chandra Shekhar is grateful for the Congress(I)'s support, he is certainly not going to waste his long-awaited shot at the prime ministership by being perceived as Rajiv Gandhi's puppet. Those who had maintained that he would have no more freedom of action than a Congress(I) chief minister have had to revise this opinion: as the weeks go by, it is obvious that Shekhar is his own man.

Hence the disquiet in the Congress(I). Before the reshuffle, Rajiv's men had put forward their own candidates for each key job. In nearly every case, their recommendations were disregarded.

As Cabinet secretary, for instance, the Congress(I) wanted T.N. Seshan, the stocky, aggressive, abrasive secretary to the Planning Commission. Seshan had been Rajiv's Cabinet secretary. V.P. Singh broke with precedent by removing him and he only got the Planning Commission job because principal secretary to the PM, B.G. Deshmukh, insisted that he be given a post of equal rank.

The Congress(I) believed that the time had now come to right that wrong and revert Seshan to his old job. Unfortunately for Seshan, Subramaniam Swamy was the only Cabinet minister who pushed his case. And in the end, Shekhar went by the recommendations of the civil service: whose members regard Seshan as being arrogant to his inferiors and sycophantic to his superiors.



The Congress(I) would not have been unhappy with S.K. Mishra as Cabinet secretary either. The easy-going Mishra earned his reputation as Bansi Lal's principal secretary in the Seventies but since then, has concentrated on relatively light-weight jobs (India Tourism Development Corporation, civil aviation secretary, Festival of India, etc.). He has shown a remarkable capacity for getting on with Jat leaders though. Despite his background as a Bansi Lal man, he is now a Devi Lal favourite. Moreover, his wife, Sukhda Mishra, is a Cabinet minister in UP and thus, his candidacy had Mulayam Singh Yadav's backing.

In the end however, Shekhar decided to give both Seshan and Mishra good jobs—but not the one they wanted. Seshan, who was due to retire on 15 December, became chief election commissioner (an appointment that drew howls of outrage because of his perceived Congress leanings) and Mishra got the key assignment of secretary to the Prime Minister.

Shekhar made it clear that in choosing the next Cabinet secretary he would go by the bureaucracy's views. As as far as the Indian Administrative Service (IAS) was concerned, there were only two candidates: A.N. Verma and Naresh Chandra. Of the two, Verma is the more senior but Chandra (who has a full two years to go before retirement) was the favourite largely because of his outstanding record as Union home secretary.

Finally, Shekhar chose the favourite and Chandra's appointment was widely welcomed by his peers. Like his predecessor (Vinod Pande), Chandra, 56, is a bachelor from the Rajasthan cadre. Unlike Pande (whom he regards as a close friend) however, he does not have a choti, play politics or spend his time planting stories with a coterie of favoured journalists. Chandra served in the home ministry at a time of unprecedented stress and strain, yet kept a low profile and avoided the media.

While Verma's is a neutral appointment, Rajiv Gandhi regards the choice of former Delhi police commissioner Vijay Karan as director of the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) as plain wrong. At a dinner for journalists thrown by a party functionary last week, the Congress president made his displeasure known: "Those who were with Charan Singh are now in positions of power," he complained to one editor.

While Chandra Shekhar is grateful for the Congress(I)'s support, he is not going to waste his shot at the prime ministership by being perceived as Rajiv Gandhi's puppet

The reference was clearly to Vijay Karan, who was special assistant to Charan Singh during the Janata period. Perhaps Rajiv regards him as being involved in the Shah Commission, which caused so much grief to his mother and to Emergency-era Congressmen.

But this is a strange position. After all, it was the Rajiv regime that appointed Karan to the sensitive post of police commissioner of Delhi. If he was good enough for that job then he is clearly, good enough for the CBI.

The loser in all this has been Rajendra Shekhar, who proved to be one of the best CBI directors in recent memory and professionalised the organisation following the havoc wrought by Mohan Katre. Shekhar kept himself aloof from the keystone cops-like shenanigans of the VP regime's Bofors investigators (who reported directly to S. Gurumurthy and Vinod Pande) and once, when attempts were made to pressure him over the Sanjay Singh case, he even threatened to quit.

But because he was a V.P. Singh-appointee, he had to go. The Rajasthan government has requested that he be returned to the state cadre, but it is not clear if a suitable job can be found for him. When he left, he was already director-general of police. That post has now been filled and there's talk of making Shekhar chairman of the State Industrial Development Corporation.

It is indeed surprising how Raj Bhargava managed the home secretary's post for himself. A 1958 batch UP cadre officer, Bhargava had even failed to become an additional secretary in Delhi. His case was twice put up before Rajiv Gandhi when he was the PM by former Cabinet secretary P.K. Kaul, but on both occasions, Rajiv turned them down. However, Mulayam Singh Yadav found him an able administrator and made him the chief secretary of UP last December, superseding several IAS officers.

Ironically enough, it was Bhargava's stint in Lucknow which got him the top job in Delhi. While in Uttar Pradesh, Bhargava was dealing with the sensitive Ram Janmabhoomi issue, and the Prime Minister felt that his experience in the matter could well be utilised by the Union home ministry.

Obviously, the Congress(I) could not be too happy with this key appointment too. As one party leader put it, "It is uncomprehensible how a Prime Minister can appoint a person to such a post, someone whom the previous government had found unfit even for an additional secretary's job.

When finance minister Yashwant Sinha began looking around for a secretary in his ministry, his eyes naturally fell on Shitla Prasad Shukla, who was then the commerce secretary. Shukla has known Sinha since the latter's days in the administrative service. And despite the fact that Shukla worked closely with the former Prime Minister V.P. Singh—he was the ambassador to GATT when the Raja was commerce minister under Indira Gandhi—Sinha chose him because of his reputation as a highly capable man.

Another posting which has had the Congress(I) up in arms is that of P.K. Lahiri as the revenue secretary. Rajiv Gandhi is yet to forget how his predecessor, Nitish Sengupta, was humiliated by V.P. Singh and was reverted to his state cadre, West Bengal. It took a Jyoti Basu to persuade the Raja to retain Sengupta in Delhi. (He was finally made secretary, civil supplies.) With the change of guard at the Centre, Rajiv had hoped that Sengupta would be given back his place in the revenue department, but that was not to be.

The first round of reshuffle has sent out the following signals:

- Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar is prepared to work with any officer irrespective of his past loyalty. In meetings with partymen, Shekhar has stated that he is against the policy of "my men and his men".
- No officer should be humiliated. Thus, all those who were replaced found good postings elsewhere, except perhaps Rajendra Shekhar. Take the instance of Montek Singh Ahluwalia. He was a special secretary in the PM's Office, whose views of ecomonics clashed with those of Chandra Shekhar. What's more, just a few months back, Shekhar had publicly lambasted the VP regime's indistrial policy, which was largely Ahluwalia's handiwork. Thus, soon after taking over, Montek Singh was shunted out but he was not punished: he was sent to the commerce secretary.
- The Prime Minister has made it clear that seniority and experience must be respected. Thus, despite R.P. Joshi's association with the previous regime, Chandra Shekhar was reluctant to remove him from the Intelligence Bureau (IB). But when Joshi insisted, he was made chief of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) in place of M.K. Narayanan, who was reverted back to the IB.
- Finally, the Prime Minister does not seem to be in a tearing hurry to accommodate his favourites. While Dr Manmohan Singh has found a place in the new set-up, Dr S.K. Goyal continues to wait in the wings. This, despite the fact that Goyal and Shekhar share more or less the same views on economic matters. •

The second liberation

Bangladeshis celebrate the end of army rule

Bangladeshis are celebrating what they call 'the second liberation' of their country. Ever since former dictator, General Hussain Mohammad Ershad, resigned on 6 December, 1990, euphoric crowds have taken to the streets, singing patriotic songs, hurling invectives on Ershad and hailing the restoration of democracy. The transformation is dramatic. For, till the night of 6 December, totalitarianism in its worst form, had held complete sway over the country. The country's most prominent political leader, Awami League chief Sheikh Hasina Wajed, was under house arrest; protesting students were being gunned down by the soldiers; and for a long time it had seemed that nothing could dislodge General Ershad, the man who had ruled the country with an iron hand for 8 long years.

But when the collapse came, it was astonishingly swift and dramatic. At a heavily guarded ceremony, Ershad resigned, appointed Opposition nominee Justice Shahabuddin Ahmed, acting head of state, shook hands with the three service chiefs and quietly drove back to his house in Dhaka Cantonment. When the resignation ceremony was telecast that night, lakhs of Bangladeshis came out in the streets screaming with joy. In Dhaka, the crowds made their way to the houses of Ershad's ministers. They wanted to tear them apart. But the ministers had fled, leaving their possessions and houses behind.

The Jatiya Patry, the powerful political organisation created by Ershad, vanished overnight. Not even its office was left intact. In downtown Dhaka, rampaging mobs attacked the party's plush city office and took away carpets, furniture, airconditioners, and even the doors and windows. What remained was a ghost building with a newly pasted sign in Bengali that read: public lavatory. A few days later, mobs attacked the house of former vice-president Moudud Ahmad and managed to set ablaze the reception area before the police arrived.

Bangladeshis evidently wanted their 'second liberation' to be completely free of the Ershad legacy. Within a few days after his fall, posters demanding that Ershad be hanged began appearing on the walls. Dhaka University students, who had spearheaded the anti-Ershad movement, demanded that the ousted President be tried and hanged. They threatened to storm Dhaka Cantonment, where Ershad was ensconced. Ultimately, the interim government headed by Justice Ahmed was forced to arrest Ershad and intern him in a government house miles away from the cantonment.

This move was greeted with more celebrations. It was beginning to look as if the 'second liberation' was here to stay.

"December 6 is a historic day for Bangladesh," says Sheikh Hasina Wajed. More than anything else, this was a day of national catharsis. Fifteen years of military rule had finally given way to democracy. And most significant of all, the change had not come about through an armed struggle or a counter-coup. Hasina points out: "As a first step, we have been able to prove that it is the ballot, that is, the people who are the real strength. Not weapons."

It was not merely the denial of democracy that made Ershad a national villain. The people of Bangladesh also felt that the General and his military minions had siphoned off public wealth

ANIL BARAI

The Bangladesh Army, as a matter of fact, quickly relinquished power because they realised how ineffectual guns were proving against the awesome tide of a mass uprising. In the past, Ershad had been able to quell popular agitations through the use of brute force and by exploiting the deep-rooted animosity betweeen the country's two principal political parties, the Awami League and the Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP), led by Begum Khaleda Zia. This time Ershad's standard tricks failed. Chiefly, because of the rock-like determination of the students.

Ershad had clamped Emergency on 27 November, the day his goons had shot dead a prominent doctor outside the Dhaka University campus. The same day, Hasina was placed under house arrest. The BNP chief, Begum Zia, managed to evade arrest, thanks to a last minute tip-off. Processions, meetings and all kinds of political activities were banned. But the students blew the lid off Ershad's Emergency by refusing to be cowed down. Defying curfew orders, they fought pitched battles with carbine-wielding soldiers. According to conservative estimates, over 100 students and ordinary Bangladeshis were killed by security forces between 27 November and 6 December, this year.

The country's political parties too expressed total solidarity with the students' movement and refused to compromise with Ershad. Both the Awami League and the BNP were united on two points: General Ershad had to resign with immediate effect and, secondly, free elections were to be held under a neutral, interim government. When Ershad found that his Emergency was not working and thousands of students were preparing to martyr themselves, he began offering all kinds of sops. In the end, nothing worked. Ershad had to go.

Political observers in Bangladesh believe that the final blow for Ershad was the army's disinclination to kill students. The army chief, General Nooruddin Khan, apparently was of the view that continued fighting between citizens and the army would ultimately consume the latter. In other words, the army, after a point, decided not to support Ershad in his crusade against the masses because of reasons of self-preservation.

The army, by that time, had become an object of national revulsion. Military officers, under Ershad's regime, had been promoted to key administrative, police and public sector posts. Many of them had amassed sizeable fortunes and the average Bangladeshi believed that the military was the source of corruption. Once the army started killing the protestors, it was clear that this time it would be a fight to the finish. The leaders of the anti-Ershad movement threatened that the relatives of armed forces personnel would be lynched if the army continued to kill ordinary people. Some leaders even hinted that the entire cantonment would be overrun and razed to the ground.

Confronted with this grim prospect, the military leadership appears to have decided to make a tactical retreat. In the process they even sacrificed Ershad. The political parties, in turn, appear to have assured the military that its interests and the personal businesses of individual servicemen would not be touched. On 12 December, the army even allowed Ershad to be arrested and placed in the custody of the civilian administration. According to preliminary reports, General Ershad will be tried for corruption and perhaps, even for his alleged involvement in the assasination of former General Zia-ur Rehman.

Disclosures by the Opposition show Ershad to be another Marcos, albeit on a somewhat smaller scale. They alleged that the ousted General and his two mistresses, who live in New York, own a luxury hotel in Hawaii and a palatial house in the United States bought with funds siphoned off from the state treasury, foreign aid and through gold and drug trafficking. Besides, they further alleged that Ershad—a keen golfer—had bought golf clubs that cost more than US $ 100,000. Ershad was, however, cunning as well as cupid. To build up a coterie of loyalists around him, he had shared the booty with key people, both within and outside the armed forces. The fact that none of these men rallied around him in the end must have come as a bitter disappointment for the General.

Army chief General Nooruddin is believed to have worked hard, quickly and efficiently to ensure that no Ershad loyalist rebelled against the collective decision to sacrifice Ershad. General Nooruddin, an Engineers Corps officer, might not have pulled it off alone. For, at least two powerful divisional commanders, who were well-known Ershad loyalists, could have easily disobeyed the army chief. Bangladesh has about five divisions of troops, and had two of the divisional commanders rebelled, the remaining commanders too might have withdrawn support from the army chief.

Army chief Nooruddin Khan: deserting Ershad

General Nooruddin, however, found a powerful ally in the person of the chief of general staff, Lt. General Salam, who is an infantry officer and an Ershad appointee. Salam backed Nooruddin and together they neutralised a handful of key senior officers who might have revolted. Major General Rafique-ul Islam, the commander of Bangladesh's elite 9 Division based some 20 miles north of Dhaka, was relieved of his commands. A few other army officers were posted out or relieved of their commands These included Brigadier Faruque of the 46 Independent Infantry Brigade.

Most significant were the charges made against the country's intelligence agencies. Major General Mohammad Ashraf, the chief of Bangladesh's National Security Intelligence (which is a civilian outfit akin to a secret police) was stripped of his post and sent back to the army. The

"The military rulers have looted the country"

Awami League leader Sheikh Hasina Wajed on the fall of Ershad

Sheikh Hasina Wajed, leader of Bangladesh's largest political party, the Awami League, is delighted at the turn of events in her country. She is confident that the era of military rule in Bangladesh is finally over. In an interview to SUNDAY, Ms Wajed explained why General Ershad fell. Excerpts:

SUNDAY: There have been several agitations against Ershad in the past. But all had failed. Why did this round of agitations succeed?
Sheikh Hasina Wajed: I won't call it an agitation. I would say that ours has been a movement for establishing democracy. Ever since Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rehman was killed on 15 August, 1975, this country has seen only authoritarian rule.

Authoritarian rule, as only to be expected, is characterised by misdeeds, violations of fundamental rights, denial of the right to vote, the looting of national resources and the protection of the interests of a small group. The ordinary people have been suffering. They have not been getting anything to eat, they were not even getting enough clothes to wear, and most important, they were deprived of employment facilities and proper education. As a result, discontent that had set in over the last 15 years, exploded. 6 December, 1990, was a historic day for Bangladesh. We can call this our democratic liberation day.

Q: Many people fear that Ershad might return to power through a counter-coup...
A: One thing is significant in this country: after 15 August, 1975, all the changes that have taken place in the government, have occurred through conspiracy and murder. In other words, by means of bullets. Change has never taken place through the ballot. This is the first time that power has changed hands through constitutional means.

The people of Bangladesh want that democracy should be institutionalised, and that democratic processes should begin. In other words, they want that the change of power should come about through the ballot. And, as a first step, we have succeeded in proving that the will of the people is the strongest weapon. After this, if anybody tries to establish another authoritarian situation, I firmly believe that the people of Bangladesh will not director general of the Forces Intelligence (FI) was similarly posted out. The Forces Intelligence, modelled along the lines of Pakistan's Inter Services Intelligence (ISI), had sensitive files on all senior military officers and Ershad had used these files as extremely effective instruments of blackmail. The NSI and the FI chiefs were staunch Ershad loyalists and were known as the angels of death. Their ouster marked the defeat of the pro-Ershad elements in the military. After this, the remaining Ershad loyalists, inlcuding the commander of the Chittagong Division, fell in line.

General Ershad might have made a permanent exit, but his legacies survive. And it is these legacies that could be far more difficult to negate. The ousted General has left behind a country that is perhaps the poorest in the world. The extent of dependence on foreign aid can be guaged from the fact that as much as 92 per cent of development expenditure is financed through external sources. While the country's capacity to create productive resources has been dwindling, its population has been constantly rising. The result is an economic nightmare, made worse by rampant corruption and inefficiency.

Shrinking opportunities have made life extremely stifling for the average Bangladeshi. It was not merely the denial of democracy that made Ershad a national villain. People felt that the General and his military minions were siphoning off national wealth which otherwise would have gone to the people. They believed that corruption was the cause of their poverty. Only, the truth is not quite as simple. For, prosperity is determined by the level of productivity and corruption is only a peripheral factor.

Political leaders like Sheikh Hasina and Begum Zia realise that they have an uphill task ahead of them and that no economic miracle is possible. The big question, however, is whether the people will give the next democratically elected government time to reverse the negative processes started by Ershad. The people of Bangladesh want freedom—not merely from the military but also from hunger and deprivation. Only, for that they just might have to wait for a third liberation. ● accept it.

Q: The people of Bangladesh want that Ershad and his ministers should be tried. Will this be possible?

A: Obviously, this should happen. Considering the way people have been misruled and their rights taken away, there should be a trial of the guilty. But that should be according to the law.

Q: What if Ershad flees the country?

A: If he runs away, at least the people of this country will be free from his clutches.

Q: Do you think that political parties like the one you lead will be able to solve the major problems confronting the country within a reasonable period of time?

A: It won't be possible for anyone to solve the country's problems in a short time. But what we do believe is that without democracy, there can be no progress. There can be no quick solutions to the problems because over the last 15 years, the military junta has looted the country. The mess created cannot be cleared overnight. The people will have to be patient.

Our people have suffered a lot. After Mujibur Rehman was assassinated, this country was ruled by military dictators. They indulged in corruption, nepotism and they ruined our economy. So, it will take a while to overcome the problems. But there is one thing: our people will not tolerate military rulers. The masses now want democracy, they want their fundamental rights restored and above all, they want a people's government.

Settling scores

Om Prakash Chautala tries to get his own back on the press

HARYANA

He is a man that the press loves to hate. Over the past year, Om Prakash Chautala has been ridiculed for Disneyland and derided for his bluntness. But while he may have been at the receiving end from the media all this while, the Haryana strongman—now in his powerful avatar as the Janata Dal(S) general secretary—appears to have decided to hit back.

The main target of Chautala's ire is the India Today group (whose Newstrack video-cassette carried an extremely critical programme on the rigging and violence in Meham). Apart from getting back at the press, the Dal(S) general secretary is said to be promoting himself through a Gurgaon-based Hindi daily, which he allegedly owns.

Fortunately for Chautala, Thompson Press, which publishes India Today and the other Living Media magazines, is located in his own backyard—Faridabad, Haryana. For long, Chautala has claimed that he "will not rest until Thompson Press is closed down". Now, there are reasons to believe that he has begun to try and fulfil that promise.

Apparently, Chautala has chosen an indirect and clever way to harass the Thompson Press management—using the workers. Although the press' union is dominated by the Hind Mazdoor Sabha (HMS), some of the workforce owe allegiance to the Lok Mazdoor Sanghatana (LMS)—which Chautala helped create in 1987 when his father, Devi Lal, was Haryana chief minister. Although the HMS won the last union election, the press has faced worker unrest—supposedly at the direct instigation of Chautala and his men.

Early this month, LMS members hoisted their union's flag outside the press' premises. Some HMS followers—who had known of the LMS' plan—had maintained an all-night vigil at the main gates to prevent this. But they were picked up by the police in a pre-dawn swoop and the LMS workers (allegedly with the protection of the cops) arrived to raise their flag to shouts of "Chautala zindabad". This led to hundreds of HMS sympathisers pouring out from the adjoining factories in Faridabad and a police lathi charge.

The Thompson Press management is diplomatic about Chautala's interference in its affairs. Says works director Vinod Kumar: "He has not come out in the open though he may be the invisible hand behind all the trouble we are facing." Last week, however, the press' administrative manager, Ramesh Kapur, was called to the police station only to be told that he should "talk to political bigwigs" if he wanted the union's problems resolved. Vinod Kumar says that the press loses lakhs of rupees every time the LMS declares a strike.

The HMS, however, is more frank about Chautala's role. Says Haryana secretary R. S. Yadav: "Chautala's nuisance value has increased even more than when he was chief minister. The police and the city administration are in collusion with him. They have been instituting false police cases against our men, blackmailing the management and creating a crisis all over Faridabad."

At the same time, Chautala has been actively promoting a Hindi daily called Jan Sandesh, which he is believed to have acquired in a benami deal a year ago. The Gurgaon-based newspaper enjoys a circulation of 36,000 and the trust which owns it plans to launch an eveninger soon. Jan Sandesh's editor, Chander Trikha, claims that too much is made of Chautala's association with the newspaper. "I admit, though, that he is sympathetic towards us. But this is because we do not display an absolute bias as other newspapers do," he says.

However, there have been recent and growing complaints that Janata Dal(S) politicians in Haryana have been discouraging the sale of other Hindi dailies in the state. Says Anuj Sharma of The Times of India group's circulation department: "Our agents in places such as Panipat and Hissar have complained about the forced sales and subscriptions of Jan Sandesh. The circulation of the group's Hindi daily, the Navbharat Times, has dropped by 1,000 copies in the state because of the government's backing of Jan Sandesh.

According to Sharma, this has taken two forms. The state government tries to despatch copies of Jan Sandesh to all village panchayats and to panchayat-run schools. Also, the state tourist department has taken over a large number of bookstalls located on the national highways. These, he implies, are used to restrict the circulation of rival Hindi dailies.

The Indian Express group's Hindi daily, Jansatta, has also been affected badly. Says the newspaper's circulation manager, S.C. Thakur: "We have received specific complaints that agents have been instructed not to lift copies of Jansatta. If this continues, it could develop into a very serious problem."

Chautala has made no effort to hide his intention to settle scores with those newspapers that attacked him. Now that he 'owns' one, his resolve may well have become that much firmer. •

UTTAR PRADESH

Few took the Shiv Sena's role in the agitation to claim the Babri Masjid in Ayodhya seriously. Till two Sena members struck. In the thick of night, at around 10 pm, the pair—Suresh Chandra and Samant—were nabbed by a CRPF posse manning the shrine. They were carrying four bundles of dynamite, with which they had planned to blow up the entire structure. Samant, however, managed to slip away.

Suresh, who was later interrogated by the police and the CID in the presence of central investigating agencies, said he and Samant had arrived in Ayodhya on 29 November. Suresh was from Brindavan, in Mathura district, where he worked as a carpenter in an ashram, while Samant, from Ratnagiri district of Maharashtra, was employed as an electrician in Bombay. Suresh revealed that his accomplice was an active worker of the Shiv Sena, while he himself was involved with both the BJP and the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP). And on 29 October, when BJP president L.K. Advani was arrested in Bihar, Suresh too had courted arrest in Mathura.

The UP chief minister, Mulayam Singh Yadav, saw the attempt as "part of a deep-rooted conspiracy by some anti-national elements, who wanted to take advantage of the Ayodhya issue and were out to disturb the peace in the country". His statement might acquire credence in view of the fact that Samant and Suresh had not known each other until very recently and were probably hired by another group, based in Ayodhya, which was bent on asserting itself violently. Sources in the district administration said that a fringe group of about 30 are doing precisely this in Ayodhya; its leaders are unknown, its members do not recognise one another, nor are they individually informed of its programmes. They are only told what they have to do.

At the same time, why the security forces and the intelligence have not been able to nab such a small group is a mystery. After all, Samant and Suresh were amateurs. The attempt was not a well-planned operation of a mastermind. They had smuggled the dynamite bundles in thick blankets and clothes—the most obvious camouflage. The CRPF spotted and caught them some 200 metres away from the mosque as they tried to get past the barbed wire fence around the complex.

"The reality is that the administration is a puppet in the hands of the VHP," commented a journalist based in Faizabad. He pointed out how BJP leader Vijaya Raje Scindia openly held a meeting on the Ram Lila grounds in Faizabad on 29 November, without seeking the administration's permission. The grounds are located right in the middle of the Muslim-dominated area of Chowk, and no public meeting has been permitted there for the last five years. The Shiv Sena itself was not considered a force, even by the BJP and the VHP, which had isolated the Sena members from its ongoing agitation, as they feared that they might disrupt the VHP's peaceful programme of offering satyagraha and courting arrest. But on 6 December itself, when the second phase of the VHP's agitation began, the Shiv Sena members, visibly incensed at not being issued membership cards by the VHP, shouted slogans and tried to force their way inside the shrine complex through a special pathway opened by the administration for ordinary pilgrims. They threatened the Faizabad district commissioner into allowing them entry in groups of six and eight. The Shiv Sena certainly managed to score a point over the VHP and its allies. And fearing that they might steal the thunder, that very day the Bajrang Dal chief, Vinay Katiyar, proudly declared: "We have performed kar seva."

The Shiv Sena apart, the younger, hot-headed elements within the VHP itself publicly condemned their leadership's newly discovered "peaceful strategies". "It is like giving up the spoils of victory to the losers immediately after the battle. Such magnanimity has no place in our movement," said Mahant Balibaba, who came from the Chambal ravines of Madhya Pradesh and is a leader of the newly constituted Garam Dal. Balibaba clearly indicated that his group would "resort to activities that will make our leaders sit up and learn a lesson or two". Sources in the administration have not ruled out the possibility of the Shiv Sena teaming up with such elements within the VHP to create large-scale violence.

More than anything else, the recent attempt to blow up the mosque, was clearly intended as another message to the Muslims that they had bettter give up the shrine without further ado, or else face the consequences. And the country-wide communal riots do not seem out of place. •

Women rally for communal harmony

DELHI

As riots broke out in every corner of the country and an older generation recalled the trauma of partition, women's organisations in Delhi did their bit to promote communal harmony. In a fortnight-long joint campaign, eight women's organisations covered every corner of Delhi, spreading their message of communal amity– from the Sikh dominated Bhogal and Turkman Gate in the walled city to the BJP stronghold in crowded Karol Bagh.

And, at a time when every small effort mattered, it seemed that the women's organisations did succeed, if only to make people stop and think about the newspaper headlines they read mechanically every day. "Mandir masjid nahin girenge, Hindu-Muslim ek rahenge", the women activists shouted as they stopped at a crowded intersection in the capital's busy Karol Bagh area. Passers-by stopped and stared. Then they clambered on to the open tempo asking for the leaflets being distributed. "Can you give me an extra copy?" asked a bystander. "I want my family to read it as well."

At a time when every small effort mattered, it seemed that the women's organisations did succeed in making people stop and think

And there was a lot of emotion as well. An activist recounted the riot killings, how the mania spread from city to city, the politicisation of the Babri Masjid—which was essentially a non-issue—and the agony of a young mother in Aligarh whose six-month-old baby was burnt alive in Aligarh. The crowd listened in rapt silence. But then, with the tension mounting, apprehensive shopkeepers, fearing trouble, threatened the activists with "dire consequences" if they did not move away. That the simple speech and slogans, like "Bharat ma ke char sipahee, Hindu, Muslim, Sikh, Isahi" had obviously touched a raw nerve somewhere, was evident from the heated arguments that followed.

And, in strife-torn Trilokpuri, which witnessed the worst incidents of the post-assassination riots in 1984, at least 200 women joined the march, also shouting slogans.

"The one thing we have not faced as yet is indifference. Tension yes, hostility yes, and sometimes enthusiastic crowds, but never indifference," said an activist. The communal tension in the country had visibly spread to apparently safe and secure capital, representatives of the organisations felt. To counter every rabid fundamentalist who threatened to drive away the activists if they spoke one word against the Hindus, there was one woman who came out of her home to join the campaign. And, if nothing else, the fortnight-long campaign, including padayatras, exhibitions, speeches and corner meetings, was worth it just for that. •

Pardon, the split is showing

The differences within the state Congress(I) surface during Rajiv Gandhi's visit

ORISSA

Perhaps for the first time this year, the Congress(I)'s stock in Orissa is showing signs of improvement. The long drawn out bickerings and the entire unsavoury episode of the Janata Dal's fall at the Centre have no doubt contributed immensely to the Congress(I)'s present position.

However, such gains have been negated to a large extent by the increasing factionalism within the party. The discontent within the state Congress(I) unit was on public display when party president Rajiv Gandhi visited the state on 7 December.

When Rajiv Gandhi landed at the Rangeilunda airport for his day long tour of the flood-hit Ganjam district, the factional alignments in the state Congress(I) unit were all too visible. On one side was the former chief minister J.B. Patnaik, his wife and former president of the All India Mahila Congress(I), Jayanti Patnaik, and their numerous followers. On the other, was the anti-Patnaik group, headed by PCC(I) president Giridhar Gomango, MP, Congress(I) Legislature Party leader Basant Kumar Biswal, former chief minister Hemananda Biswal and former Union minister Ramachandra Rath.

As the Congress party president emerged from his King Air Private Plane, there was a stampede. The rival groups fought for the limelight as they welcomed Rajiv. The situation worsened when the Patnaik loyalists raised the slogan "Rajiv Gandhi zindabad" and "Janaki Patnaik zindabad". This was a breach of an earlier agreement that there would be no slogans in favour of any state leader on that occasion. In the ensuing fracas, some anti-Patnaik youth tried to pull off Patnaik's clothes. Even former chief minister Nandini Satpathy was not spared in the ugly episode—jostled by the crowd, the lady almost fell flat.

The state party leaders continued to demonstrate increasingly crude instances of their pettiness. First there was great confusion and speculation about who would go in Gandhi's car on his visit to the flood-ravaged areas. Initially the party president invited only Gomango and the local party MP, Gopinath Gajapati, to accompany him. Later on he invited Basant Biswal and Ramachandra Rath when he toured the district's other parliamentary constituency, Aska. Patnaik was left far behind in the convoy following Gandhi. The anti-Patnaik leaders were visibly jubilant at this turn of events, since Gandhi had not only "ignored" Patnaik at the airstrip earlier, by not enquiring about him, but had also taken no note of him throughout his visit.

However, the anti-Patnaik faction was taken aback when the ex-CM accompanied Rajiv Gandhi in his aircraft back to Delhi. Now it was the turn of Patnaik's followers to crow in delight and claim that whatever his adversaries may say their mentor was the party president's most trusted leader in Orissa.

The anti-Patnaik camp is probably being over-optimistic about its chances of winning favour with the party high command. Patnaik, most observers feel, is still a force to reckon with in Orissa politics. ●

Military presence in Punjab creates speculation

PUNJAB

The death toll was the highest since Operation Bluestar in 1984. There were more than 500 killings in Punjab in November 1990. And finally, in mid-December, the army moved in. So, now the border with Pakistan is completely sealed off, from Jammu and Kashmir to the Rann of Kutch.

The army has been deployed in Amritsar, Ferozepur, Gurdaspur, Bhatinda and Faridkot. Of these, divisions seven and nine of the army which were moved from Khemkaran and surrounding areas into Ferozepur, had also been involved in Operation Bluestar. And special commandos have been posted, allegedly, to help Chandigarh police nab militants.

Not surprisingly, there has been a lot of resentment over the army deployment. All Akali factions and the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC), among others, are strongly critical of the deployment. Gurcharan Singh Tohra, ex-president of the SGPC, was the first to condemn the act: "The present situation in the state is the result of army action in 1984. The government is repeating the mistake." Prakash Singh Badal, former chief minister of Punjab and president of the Akali Dal(Badal) was quite resentful too: "This army deployment will prove to be the greatest blunder of the government."

Simranjit Singh Mann has called this an "authoritarian act" on the part of the Centre. And the Panthik Committees led by Sohan Singh and by Bhai Wassan Singh Zaffarwal have jointly condemned the army deployment.

Meanwhile, the Prime Minister has categorically denied that the army deployment had anything to do with terrorism. It was just a matter of routine exercises, he stated. And Virendra Verma, as Governor of Punjab, said the army was in the state to check infiltration. ●

Blood, oil and tears

Lord of oil adulteration Shiva Kumar is killed, as gang wars continue in Bangalore

KARNATAKA

Fate finally caught up with the 32-year-old B A. Shiva Kumar on the night of 19 November. As he got down from his Maruti in a posh residential colony in Bangalore, the don of oil adulteration was brutally hacked to death.

But "Oil" Kumar, who ran a business of petrol and diesel adulteration was not the first ganglord to be killed so brutally. Meanwhile, the fight for supremacy over the illicit business has reached fever pitch.

Shiva Kumar: felled

The enterprising kingpin of the adulteration racket was also a politician of sorts. His "business"—which used to fetch him about Rs 5 lakhs a day—had funded many political bigwigs of various parties.

In fact, Oil Kumar had such good ties that he had even been appointed the principal election manager of the Congress(I) in the Gandhinagar Assembly constituency election, in 1985. But when he died—by the same rules that he had lived by—there were no mourners. It was just the murder of another baddie, who in his time had ruled the roost, called the shots, loved fast cars and enjoyed Scotch.

The attack on Oil Kumar was said to have been masterminded by his "business and financial associate," Mutthappa Rai. The gory act was carried out by some hired hoodlums, five of whom are now cooling their heels behind bars. The police are still on the hunt for Rai, who is said to be hiding in Bombay.

What is surprising is that such gangs and their lords should exist at all in a place like Bangalore, which is otherwise known for its peace and tranquility. But they do and their business is mainly extortion, unlike the gangs in Bombay which thrive on smuggling and related activities.

The gangs came into the limelight only after the Emergency. A well-known criminal, M.P. Jairaj, had the audacity of attempting muder in broad daylight, in front of the High Court. While he was serving his term of nine-years imprisonment, another man was making his presence felt in the underworld—Kotwal Ramachandra.

Wanted for rape and a number of other crimes, Ramachandra achieved notoriety when he barged into Ramakrishna Hegde's—who had just taken over as chief minister—chambers and brandished a chopper. And to show that he had the active support of some politicians, a photograph surfaced mysteriously in which Ramachandra was seen alongside S. Bangarappa, the present chief minister. Bangarappa had, however, dismissed it saying he could not help it if some people wanted to get photographed with him.

But Kotwal Ramachandra did have political connections. Although he was spotted many times at the Congress office, he had still eluded the police. By then, Jairaj was released from prison and the big time gang warfare started in right earnest. A short while later Ramachandra disappeared. Three months later his bones surfaced in a well on the outskirts of Bangalore.

Jairaj was immediately booked for Ramachandra's death. But with his connections, he got first class treatment even in prison. For a short while during his sentence, he was even falsely admitted to the government-run Victoria Hospital, as a patient, from where he conducted his illegitimate businesses.

He was soon acquitted from the charge of murdering Ramachandra for lack of proof. But he had to contend with a new rival—Sriramapuram Kitty. In the battles between these two gangs, over 16 persons were chopped to death. And it left Kitty partially paralysed. To this day, the don supervises his interests from a wheelchair.

With cries of Bangalore turning into a criminal city, the police swung into action and raided Jairaj's house. They unearthed an armoury, and Jairaj did his stint in prison again.

His release saw a new avatar of Jairaj. Publisher of a newspaper called Garibi Hatao, Jairaj also decided to contest as an Independent candidate from the Jayanagar Assembly constituency in the city, in 19 November 89. But his political career was nipped in the bud as Jairaj was felled by a hail of bullets.

It was after Jairaj's brains were blown out that Oil Kumar took over. By then, at least 37 persons had been killed in gangwars in Bangalore alone. Now, with Oil Kumar dead as well, it is not a question of whether the gang rivalries will end, but a question of who will be the next underworld king. And possibly he will go the same way as the others—dead in a pool of blood, not unheard, but certainly unsung. ●

Samantha Fox promises Indians an exciting winter

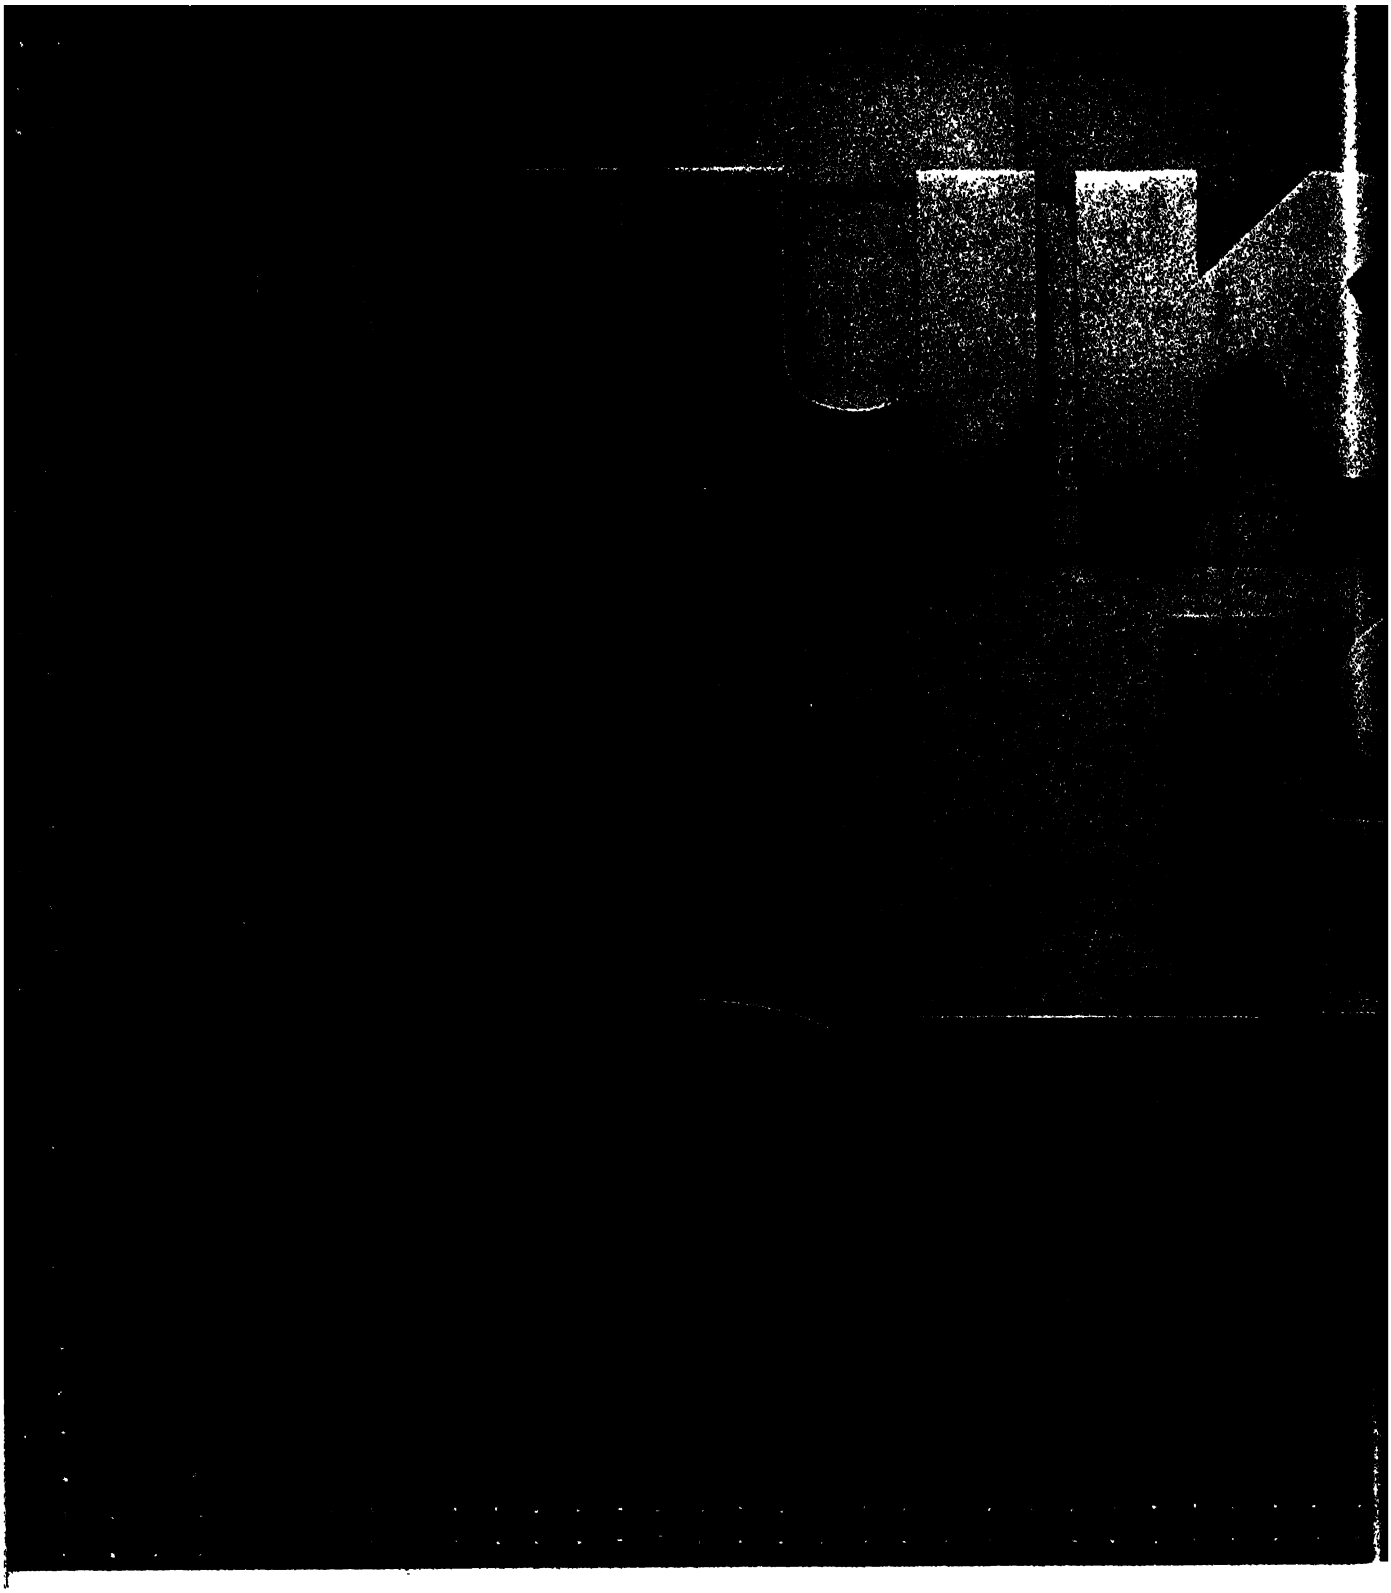
It was as a pin-up girl that she achieved fame, her nude pictures pushing up the circulation of many a publication. But Indian audiences will have to make do with Samantha Fox, the singer—never mind how difficult it is to recognise her with her clothes on. On her way to South America for a concert tour, Fox has decided to stop over in India to perform at Bombay, Delhi and Madras, along with the London City Dancers. Says Fox: "I've always wanted to come here. It's just that the opportunity didn't arise." So, when Shaw Wallace offered to sponsor her Indian tour, the singer was game.

But then Samantha Fox has always been game for anything. Beginning her career as a page 3 model in England, she more than proved her lack of inhibitions, only stopping short of frontal shots. Then came the mysterious pornographic video movie with David Essex (a pop singer) which kept the gossips busy for a while. And once she was a public figure—of sorts—Fox decided to switch over to a career in music.

GAUTAM PATOLE

A crooner with social consciousness she isn't. But Samantha Fox realises only too well that she can't keep her fan following with titillation alone, and has begun taking her music career more seriously

For someone perceived as just another dumb blonde bombshell, Fox didn't do too badly in the highly competitive world of pop music. Her first album Touch Me zoomed to the number three position on the UK charts. She followed up this success with Nothing's Gonna Stop Me Now and I Wanna Have Some Fun. The charge that all her songs have to do with sex puts her on the defensive. "People think that I sing about sex all the time because of my modelling career. But if they really cared to listen to the lyrics, they will discover another side," she pouts. "I don't want to sing about politics."



A crooner with a social conscience she isn't. But Fox realises only too well that with such talents as Madonna and Paula Abdula around she can't keep her fan following with titillation alone, and has begun taking her music career more seriously. At her age she can't get back to modelling (though she wouldn't be averse to a Playboy or Penthouse assignment, she confesses) so music is all that's left to her. Hence, she plans to release her fourth album in February next year. A Hollywood movie project is also on the cards, but Fox is loath to say anything about it at this point.

But her Indian concert will come before that, with Fox enthralling audiences with her singing and body language. Abroad, her audience largely comprises under-18s, who come to boogey the night away at her live shows. And Fox, who lists the Beatles among her early influences, hopes that her numbers will keep Indian audiences swinging as well.

She won't get to see much of the country, though, which she knows little about. "I've heard about the poverty, the very rich and the very poor," she says. "But it's too early to form an impression."

Anyway, Fox hasn't any intentions of wasting her time trying to analyse the Indian reality. She'll content herself with sunbathing in Goa and singing at her shows before making off for southern climes.●

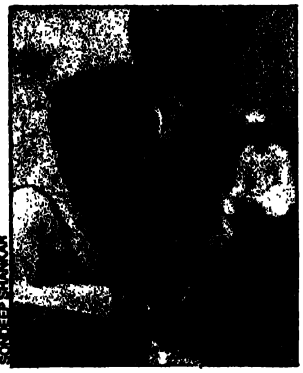
DIFFERENT MOODS



The life and times of Ravi Shankar

The past has a way of catching up with all of us. And with sitar maestro Pandit Ravi Shankar, reluctant idol to the drug-happy Sixties generation, it did so in the guise of Ghanashyam, a dance drama exploring the twin themes of addiction and exorcism. For Shankar, the return to his first love, traditional dance, wasn't just a trip down memory lane. The opera served as a vehicle to express all those forebodings Shankar had harboured when he played guru to George Harrison, the rest of the Beatles gang, and by extension to the entire brood of flower children. Recalls Shankar: "The whole thing was drug-oriented. They said Indians take ganja, bhang and charas. That's why they are so advanced in literature, art and music. I was protesting all the time. These are things people don't know."

Hence, Ghanashyam—A Broken Branch, to drive home the anti-drug message Shankar had always ached to convey.

SOMNATH GHOSH

SOMNATH GHOSH

MUSIC AND BEYOND

In deep concentration with his sitar; relaxed and smiling

It all began in 1989, when the City of Burmingham Touring Opera Company director Graham Vick asked Shankar to produce a piece meaningful to the modern audience. And what better theme for that sort of work than drugs?

Using the dance forms of Kathak, Bharatanatyam and Kathakali, Shankar decided to convey the anti-drug message through a simple tale, reminiscent of the Jatakas. The story was fairly uncomplicated. Two couples, Raman and Kantha and Ghanashyam and Lalita, teach dance in a small village at "the turn of the century". During Holi, bhang is distributed and Ghanashyam overindulges himself. He soon becomes addicted to stronger drugs given to him by some sadhus, selling his wife's jewellery to buy the stuff.

Ghanashyam's fall down the moral ladder is complete when he spies on Kantha while she is bathing and is caught in the act by his wife. Things go from bad to worse and finally he dies the death of an animal, being chased by the villagers for having stolen a precious jewel.

Soon after Ghanashyam's death, a spirit possesses Kantha. The ojha says she can only be saved if the ghost is accepted by another person, who will die in the process. Lalita volunteers, the ceremony is duly performed, and a branch breaks to mark the moment.

This incident is autobiographical—Shankar witnessed such another breaking of the branch after an exorcism as a child—as are passages which deal with the problem of addiction. According to British critic David Toop, the opera was "a reflection" of Shankar's role as an idol to the Sixties drug culture with his "performances at American rock festivals as Monterey and Woodstock". Shankar, for his part, insists: "These characters are real. I have seen them."

This verisimilitude seemed to have worked in Britain, where Ghanashyam got rave reviews and standing ovations wherever it was performed. The reception in India, however, was lukewarm in comparison. While everyone agreed that the production was an interesting experiment, it was said to lack the intensity that marks a great work of art. And the inevitable comparisons to Uday Shankar's Kalpana didn't do Ghanashyam much good either.

Shankar readily admits the influence of brother Uday on his work. "Ghanashyam," he says, "is a meeting of dada and baba (Ustad Allauddin Khan)." The maestro is equally candid about the bad press the piece had received. "People are not saying anything good about it now, maybe they will later. First let me get the gaalis," he says ruefully.

Most of the criticism is misguided, anyway, maintains Shankar: "For instance when people say that in the Shiva episode it was raga malkaus, it was not, it was dhani." Nevertheless Panditji is content: "I have shown the hypocritical side of religion and as an artist I have the right to do that."

For Shankar, the tears of those enthralled by the show are adequate recompense. And more than make up for the damage he may have inadvertently done in his guru-of-the-flower-generation avatar.

But flower power and the Beatles came much later. Ravi Shankar began life in Banaras (on 7 April, 1920), born into a Brahmin household. Exposure to the outside world came soon enough, though. When Shankar was nine, the family moved to Paris so that his elder brother Uday's ballet troupe could get better exposure. Here, Ravi began his career as a dancer, under the shadow of his more illustrous sibling, learning several languages, stagecraft, set designing, lighting and the art of showmanship on the side. In 1932, he accompanied Uday Shankar's troupe to USA and then in 1934 he returned to India to master traditional dance.

Only to hear Ustad Allauddin Khan perform on the sitar one evening and succumb to the magic of his music. "It was as if a floodgate had opened and an ocean of beautiful and divine music was flowing out," he recalls.

The experience changed the course of Shankar's life. And he travelled straight to Maihar, a serene village in Madhya Pradesh, to learn music at his guru's feet. In 1941, Shankar married the Ustad's daughter, Annapoorna Devi, no mean sitarist herself. But the marriage soon turned sour,

TARAPADA BANERJEE

The verisimilitude seemed to have worked in Britain, where Ghanashyam got rave reviews and standing ovations wherever it was performed. The reception in India was lukewarm in comparison and broke up rather bitterly. While Annapoorna became a recluse, giving up public performances, Shankar drifted more and more into the world of music, seeking catharsis in its strains.

He didn't just restrict himself to concert-hall performances, scoring the music for such films as Dharti Ke Lal and Neecha Nagar. Joining the Indian People's Theatre Association (IPTA) Shankar formed the Indian Renaissance Artist's Movement to stage the choreographic presentation of Chitrasena, Discovery of India and Samanya Kshati. Working with All India Radio (AIR), the sitarist took the initiative to form the Vadya Vrinda (national orchestra).

The Fifties proved to be the decade for tie-ups with other geniuses. Shankar worked with Satyajit Ray on the music for Pather Panchali, Aparajito, and Apur Sansar. Then came Tapan Sinha's Kabuliwala, which went on to win the Golden Bear award at the Berlin Film Festival.

In 1951, Shankar met celebrated violinist Yehudi Menuhin and teamed up with him to perform duets at the Bath Festival in 1966 and at the United Nations Humans Rights Day Concert (New York) in 1967. Said Menuhin about the experience: "By the magic aura of his (Shankar's) presence and music, he made sense and brought order out of chaos."

The Sixties was the decade of Beatlemania. The sitar attracted great attention as, following Geroge Harrison's lead, Jefferson Airplane, The Doors, The Rolling Stones and Grateful Dead took to it. The high string music appealed to the highly-strung generation, and inevitably Pandit Ravi Shankar was dubbed the "honorary hippie" for his contribution to the movement. Recalls Shankar: "Thanks to my musician friends and their chamchas, I was facing criticism. They were having a heyday saying that I was making Indian music Americanised and had become one of the Beatles."

But despite the tag of cult guru, Shankar clung on to his principles. He reminiscises: "They (the American audience) would be drinking beer and making out with their girlfriends. The atmosphere was against my principles. Many musicians from Indian never objected but I'd keep telling them, 'don't smoke'. I used to walk out..."

He performed at the Woodstock Festival, though, before a 3,50,000-strong audience only to be accused of prostituing Indian music in the West by the critics the day after.

Unfazed by such criticism, Shankar went on to choreograph such ballets as Melody And Rhythm and Nava Rasa Rang, composed the score for such dance dramas as Immortal India and Chandalika and was the music director for such films as Canadian Fantasy, The Charity Tale, Alice In Wonderland and The Flute And The Bow.

And, to be fair, something good did come out of his partnership with Western musicians: the Concert in Aid of Bangladesh. The plight of the Bangladeshi refugees drove Shankar to get George Harrison, Bob Bellani, Harrick Captan and Ali Akbar Khan together for a show to raise money for the homeless lot. The concert proved more than successful: an astounding $8 million was made in the course of one night.

BEHIND THE LEGEND Shankar at a concert, and his two gurus Allauddin Khan (top) and Uday Shankar (above)

You don't see anything of that enfant terrible in the Pandit Ravi Shankar of today. With honours such as a nomination to the Rajya Sabha and the Padma Vibhushan under his belt, the sitar maestro has turned into an establishment figure, despite his second marriage to 34-year-old Sukanya Rajan (who'd been a regular member of his entourage over the last ten years) in 1989 at the secluded Venkateswar temple in Chilka. The event attracted a fair amount of media attention, with Rajan's—and Shankar's—daughter Anushka being in attendance. But gossips soon tired of the topic and Sukanya and Ravi Shankar now do the rounds as any other happily-married couple, while Anushka, discloses her mother, "spends half her time in London and the other half in Delhi".

Shankar remained in the news for other reasons as well. His sitar concerto, A Garland Of Ragas, with noted conductor Zubin Mehta and the European Community Youth Orchestra, for example. Or even his self-described "birthday performance" for Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth and President R. Venkataraman at the Saint James Court Hotel in London. Early this year, Shankar did a recording with American composer Philip Glass, doing the orchestration for his pieces and vice versa. The album Passages, says the maestro, will almost certainly be a chartbuster, as much a hit as his efforts in Attenborough's Gandhi, the '82 Asiad and the several Festivals of India.

Like most establishment figures, Shankar is critical of the dilution of Indian culture. "Nowadays people feel uneasy to touch the feet of elders. It seems like their backs would break," he says. "We knew humility. Just being able to play a bit, shampooing your hair and dressing tip-top cannot make you a good musician. You need sadhana (dedication)."

And all artists, he adds, "need encouragement" and a fair bit of applause. Ghanashyam didn't do too well on that score in India. But Shankar has seen too many bad patches not to take that in his stride. And go on to the next phase of what has proved to be an immensely rewarding career. • mahurat, perhaps 'happy times are here again'—for Aamir that is, not the midget.

Sunny Deol's happiness is quite complete. Now in addition to a sexy girlfriend and dutiful wife he also has a beautiful baby to boast of.

Is it any surprise then that the Jat hunk can't stop grinning these days, in celebration of his recent fatherhood.

No, not even in Dimple's presence. ●

The Indian experience

Raine's journal is the stuff of tourism

"When did I set out on my passage to India? Since I arrived there I must have set out, but when? Or did I arrive? Perhaps I have not arrived—am as far from India as before I set out." A somewhat unfortunate beginning to a book on the country, especially as the author goes on to ask, "Who am I to write of it?" Who, indeed.

Kathleen Raine is a poetess of formidable output and co-founder of Temenos, an imaginative arts review. When she first set foot on Indian soil she was over 70, but then she arrived after a detour of Blake, Yeats, Tagore and other areas of the mind.

Her India, she defines, is not geographical but metaphysical; a state of mind. This work is a gentle, loving appraisal of what she perceives to be a gentle, loving subject. She refers to it more than once as her "passage to India" and, in fact, the books resemble each other in so far as they employ a mystical I-don't-know, an eternal question-mark to typify the country's stance in the world. It is the vast, listening quality of the land that most captivates Raine, that state where all certainties melt away.

She is especially lovely in her frequent dissertations on poetry, and her style and syntax do in fact suggest that she is more comfortable in that medium. She arrives often upon a happy turn of phrase or thought: "I hope there may be such poetry in a world that seems rather to be experiencing a darkening of thought than an evolution of higher consciousness. But although Western civilisation is perhaps spent, it is possible that India feels the urge to create what we no longer can."

She is chasing a sort of "higher consciousness", and a good many rainbows besides. Her great fortune lies, perhaps, in seeing India only from afar, in being the one that got away. For those of us that stay, perchance to read, Raine's India remains where she found it: in her imagination. Her visit to the country was coloured by the concept and was an exercise, purely, in déjà vu.

Self-confessedly, she absents herself inwardly from that which is not of her imagination. As a result of this faculty, her work, while it stops short of being a picture-book India, is certainly a romance. In India she saw no vandalism; in its wonderful parks no one picked the flowers. Everywhere she perceived a "pride and happiness in being Indian". A scene typical of her ability to withdraw from what does not conform to her "India of the Imagination" appears towards the end of the book: "The gentle servants bring tea, the dhobi washes my dresses and presses my suit; I skim the newspapers that appear under my door for nature items."

One of Raine's influences is "an Indian Prince of the Solar dynasty...Rama was his ancestor, the Lord Buddha a sort of second cousin" Dizzied by such Oriental splendour, she can only apologise for the West. Gentle, mournful but never bitter, she is plagued by the fear that "civilisation has done its work and is over". She can still find and rejoice over traces of this civilisation in various territories of the imagination; above all, India. Therefore, she laments the adoption of Western mores in that country, fearing they will lead to a stripping of the last vestiges of permanence in that culture.

Raine is equally disturbed by vignettes of Christian India. Confronted at a church service with the sight of Indian Christians in dresses, she is taken aback—clearly unprepared for the new paradigm. Unable to reconcile the powerful, three-eyed, ten-armed, many-headed gods of the country with Christ, naked and helpless on the Cross, she is consoled by the Jesus she sees in calendar art at the back of shops "beautiful and uncrucified. India has claimed Him".

This book will endear itself to the Indian reader who acquiesces to the type-cast role assigned to him of a noble, if colourful, savage

That Raine is disconcerted by anomalies is understandable: neither East nor West likes a watered-down version of the other. Each wants the gamut and the whole of the exotic experience. This is the stuff of tourism. But here we have an artist who is so artlessly grateful for the 'Indian experience' that she wants to pay it back.

Now and again, her perception and natural maturity have some lovely consequences. In Banaras, listening to legends of Krishna, she is charmed by the story where the child Krishna vanquishes the serpent but spares its life when it implores him with the unanswerable "After all, you made me!" Later, reflecting on the destruction of art along with the desecration of religious monuments, she explains, "But it is not 'art' to those who create such beauty, nor is it to those who destroy it." She admits against her will that "the Indian experience may be spacious, may include beauty, even joy; but it is not consoling." Nor does she attempt to pose a simplistic solution—she is too close to her subject not to know there is none.

One may suppose this book will endear itself to the Indian reader who acquiesces to the type-cast role assigned to him of a noble, if colourful, savage. The truth of the matter is we're tired of being told we are, quaintly and "quietly poor", old, eternal, charming in our squalor and our proximity to the animal kingdom, majestic in our paradoxes. It would be a relief to get all that over with and down to the business of profitable living—and an occasional good read. ●

The money changers

Forging currency notes is big business in Kerala

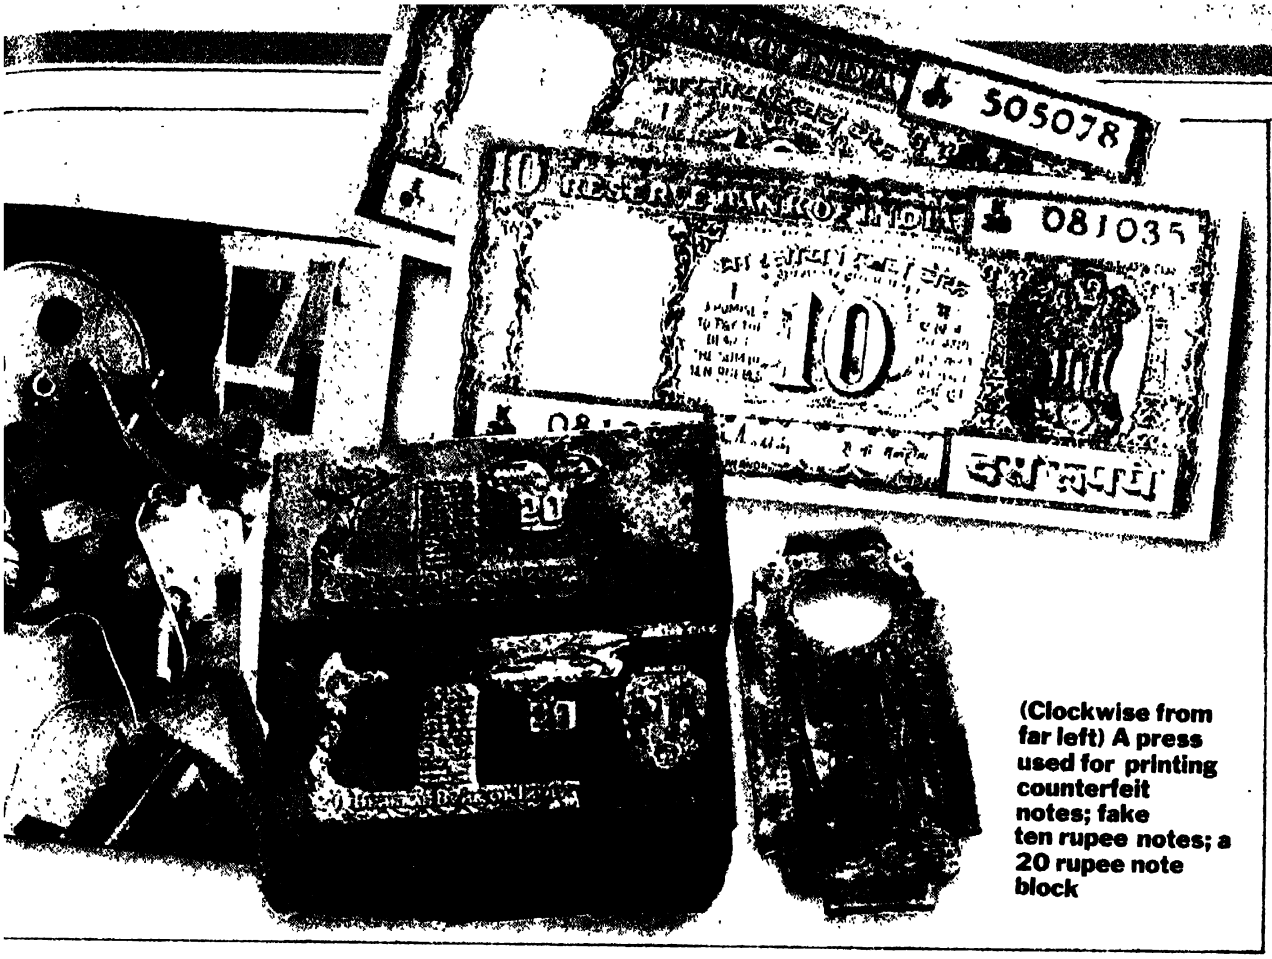
Changing money in Kerala is risky business. Over the last few years, fake notes worth crores of rupees have been pumped into the state market by racketeers and the change you get may contain counterfeit currency. The enormity of the problem can be judged from the fact that the Crime Branch (CID) of Kerala Police is at present investigating into as many as 380 cases relating to currency fraud. Said a senior police official: "The manufacture of counterfeit currency has become a cottage industry in Kerala."

Last fortnight, the Trivandrum city police seized counterfeit currency of ten-rupee denomination worth Rs 7.5 lakhs and arrested three people: Manvila Joseph, owner of International Printers and Publishers, his printer Shahabuddin and Appukuttan Nair, who was allegedly in charge of circulating the fake notes. Joseph had taken a loan from the state-owned Kerala Financial Corporation (KFC) to start his press in a suburb near Trivandrum. According to the police, the gang had already printed notes to the tune of Rs 20 lakhs. Which means a large sum of counterfeit notes printed by Joseph are still in the market. Besides, the cops also recovered blocks for printing 100 rupee notes as well.

The haul from Tripunithara near Cochin last March was even more shocking. In a swift move the police seized fake notes—again of ten rupee denomination— worth Rs 35 lakhs. And, of the eight persons arrested, one was a college lecturer. The eight-member gang was led by Thomas, owner of a 50-acre rubber plantation, and his brother Johnson, a college lecturer from Thodupuzha. And it was by sheer accident that the two brothers got into this murky business. During one of his trips to Sivakasi, the printing town of Tamil Nadu, Thomas was fascinated by the modern press. And when one of the brokers suggested to him that he buy a press that could print currency notes, Thomas promptly bought the idea. The rest followed: the two brothers purchased a Swift 300 model offset press, leased a lonely house at Thipunithara and hired the best hands in the business. It was clearly the beginning of the end for Thomas and company.

The success of the counterfeit currency business depends solely on the quality of the notes printed—they must look exactly like the ones churned out by the government press at Nasik. Thomas employed three of the best block-makers in the job. Each room of the rented house was used as a printing unit which included a dark room. The notes that these men reproduced were near-perfect. But there was one problem: the paper used by Thomas and company did not quite match the quality of genuine currency.

The confiscated 50 rupee notes



As a bank cashier put it: "The quality of counterfeit notes have improved over the years, but still an expert can detect it by the texture of the notes because they have not been able to get the paper in which genuine notes are printed at Nasik."

Apart from the quality of notes, another important aspect is marketing. The technique is to palm off the fake notes with genuine ones and never to release it in bulk. In most cases, the fake currency is distributed by petty traders, chit fund operators and small-time contractors. The cardinal rule is never to market it in bulk but only in small amounts, carefully hidden among genuine notes.

The economics of the counterfeit business is also mind-boggling. And as in any other trade, there are retailers and distributors, who buy fake currency from the kingpins in exchange for genuine ones. The profit margin is usually 100 per cent: thus, one could buy Rs 20,000 worth of counterfeit currency for Rs 10,000. Of course, there is a lot of bargaining and the exchange rate could vary accordingly. Recently, a farmer from Idukki bought Rs 50,000 worth of ten rupee denomination fake notes for Rs

20,000. The notes were not up to the mark and had such glaring spelling mistakes like the "Riserve Bank of India". Still, he managed to distribute them to the labourers in his farm. But the police nabbed him when one of his employees tried to change a 'note' at a post office and was caught. The racketeers find it safer to operate in remote villages since the innocent people can be easily duped and there are less chances of being detected. And, it is always the middleman who gets caught while trying to palm off fake notes. But rarely the kingpin, who is always on the move.

The risks are immense but the lure of making the fast buck is attracting more and more Keralites to the counterfeit trade. Points out Rajesh Devan, SP, Crime Branch (counterfeit squad): "Like all other socio-economic crimes, counterfeit is also on the increase in Kerala. Even the middle-class has joined the counterfeit bandwagon mainly to get rich by hook or by crook."

Of course, the rising unemployment problem has a lot to do with youths taking to this illegal profession. Take the case of Satish Kumar (26) from Trivandrum. Satish, who is now behind bars, told the police that he wanted to become rich like his friends who made it big in the Gulf. He also wanted to go to the Arab countries, but didn't even have money to make the trip. So, he started learning the art of block-making from a teacher of Fine Arts College, Trivandrum. Using a camera, Satish started making blocks from negatives of genuine currency notes. And he sold one such block of a 50 rupee note to a man for Rs 10,000. But the police somehow got wind of it and nabbed him.

But the profits in this business are so huge that forgers stick to the trade despite serving prison sentences. At most they shift their business elsewhere: many forgers who were caught in Kerala are now operating in neighbouring Tamil Nadu and Karnataka. Of course, many people maintain that the business could be busted if the police would have been more vigilant and strict. So far the men who have been pulled up were sent to prison for a few years, though the law clearly says that they could be imprisoned for life. Last year, the Kerala High Court had even indicted the state government for its lukewarm attitude in the prosecution of counterfeit currency cases. Alarmed by the increase of such cases, Justice K.T. Thomas remarked that the government was apparently not serious enough to bring the culprits to book.

The police seems to be somewhat handicapped due to a shortage of staff and the frequent transfer of officials involved with the investigations. The state government however, has made a belated effort to tackle the problem and has decided to appoint an SP to head the counterfeit wing besides agreeing to double the manpower. Moreover, seizures have increased after the Reserve Bank set up its office in Trivandrum. Now on an average ten cases are referred by the RBI to the counterfeit squad every month.

Such measures, however, have not dampened the spirits of the counterfeit racketeers. There are also rumours that the veterans of this trade are planning to set up computerised printing of counterfeit notes. But top police officials are tight-lipped about the steps they will take to counter such a possibility. For the moment at least, it seems that there is nothing that can stop the counterfeit currency business.

Striking terror

The changing profile of Bombay's underworld

Hours before midnight on 4 December, a green jeep was speeding down the Gandhi Nagar area of Vikhroli in north-east Bombay. The car ignored the red lights at a traffic junction and continued on its journey towards Ghatkopar. It was then that the police got suspicious of the vehicle. Constable Shantaram Deoke followed the car closely and as soon as it slowed down, he rushed towards it and forced the driver to stop the vehicle. All the four occupants panicked and one of them, a Sikh, pulled out an AK-47 rifle and threatened Deoke. The constable beat a hasty retreat and informed his superior, sub-inspector Amar Singh, who was patrolling the area on his bike.

For a while, Amar Singh tried to chase the jeep, but seeing that he was steadily losing sight of the vehicle, got off at a road-side restaurant and alerted the police control over the telephone. But as soon as sub-inspector Singh stepped out of the hotel, he found the jeep waiting. One of the occupants trained his rifle at him and gunned him down.

The bloodbath did not end there. Constables Deoke and Shivaji Bhosale were the next victims. While Bhosale was also gunned down on the highway, Deoke managed to run towards a petrol pump. But the jeep followed him and he too was shot dead. An auto-rickshaw driver at the gas station also fell to the criminals' bullets.

This is not an isolated incident. Ever since the beginning of this year, the Bombay Police have had to deal with a new kind of weapon: the AK-

Policemen investigating a crime: up against formidable foes

A jeep used by the terrorists: hit and run tactics

47. And if there were any doubts that several terrorist gangs from Punjab and Kashmir had infiltrated into the metropolis, the following incident set them to rest. In May this year, the cops nabbed five men in Bombay. When interrogations revealed that they were from Kashmir, a message was sent to the police of that state. Soon a team from the Jammu and Kashmir Police flew down to Bombay and identified them as terrorists from the Valley who had been trained in Pakistan.

Then in September, a police constable challenged some Sikh youths who were aimlessly loitering on the streets of Bombay. One of the boys promptly took out a stengun and fired at the cop. Later, the police managed to apprehend one of the culprits and he confessed that his links with a terrorist group which operated in Punjab.

Senior officials of the Bombay Police feel that a good number of terrorist groups have made their way into Bombay from Punjab and Kashmir. While some have found the city's underworld to be an ideal temporary retreat away from the searching eye of the police, others have made the journey to the city to purchase arms. And the gun merchants of Bombay are doing brisk business. Recently, the police recovered a large number of sophisticated weapons from a posh flat in Andheri. This was followed by yet another seizure from near the same place. And in September, the cops arrested a leader of the People's Liberation Organisation of Tamil Eelam (PLOTE) from the city. Interrogations revealed that he had made the trip to Bombay to buy arms.

Indeed, Bombay today has become a veritable arms bazaar. Pramod Navalkar of the Shiv Sena once said very rightly that "guns can be bought like sweets in the city". And to prove his point Navalkar even smuggled a gun, which he claimed he bought from one of the arms markets in Bombay, into the Assembly.

There is yet another disturbing trend. The police feel that the underworld dons of Bombay have begun to use the terrorists for hit and run operations. Of late, the city has witnessed several bloody gang wars and the possibility of hardcore terrorists taking part in them cannot be ruled out.

The terrorist hand in the series of bomb blasts that rocked Bombay in the last one year, too, cannot be ruled out. In August, a powerful bomb exploded in a public place injuring at least 20 people. A week later, the police spotted yet another explosive inside a train which was about to leave Bombay's Church Gate station. Fortunately, the cops succeeded in defusing the bomb. Police sources feel that these incidents are a frightening repeat of the violence that rocked Delhi and the rest of north India last year.

The Sri Guru Singh Sabha and other Sikh societies have always condemned terrorist violence in Bombay. But they also have a grouse against the police. Members of this community feel that the Bombay Police suspect every Sikh in the city, especially after Punjab terrorists have descended on Bombay. Harbinder Singh, a cloth merchant at Dadar, said: "We have nothing to do with the terrorists. Yet we are treated with suspicion. This is unfair."

But then the police are up against a formidable challenge. The city's cops may be acquainted with Bombay's underworld, but when it comes to battling professional terrorists—many of them have been trained in Pakistan—it surely requires a different kind of skill. So far, the Bombay Police have proved unequal to the task. ●

Our man from Madras

US Indians prepare to celebrate the arrival of the first countryman 200 years ago

He was a servant. An Indian servant, who crossed the dreaded kalapani with his American master, stepped on Massachusetts soil, caused much eye-popping, and sank into oblivion. And 200 years later, this nameless 'man from Madras' has been resurrected as the token seed of the Indian presence in America.

Committees were formed, research initiated, seminars organised and there was excitement all around. Indian Americans, or Asian Indians (as differentiated from American Indians of cowboy fame) got busy polishing their desi hats as they prepared to celebrate the bicentenary of the 'first' Indian's arrival in the New World.

The bicentennial plans were in full swing when the internal power-structure of the organisation spearheading the celebrations programme, the Washington-based Indian American Forum for Political Education (IAFPE), allegedly collapsed. After an intense build-up to a promising bicentenary on 29 December,1990, the IAFPE suddenly went limp.

But the re-emergence of the nameless servant had sparked off the curiosity of Indians in the States. Was this man truly the first Indian to set foot in America? Does his arrival set a date to the Indian American sub-culture, which has actually developed over the last 30 years? No, the event is significant, say IAFPE officials, as the first recorded visit of an Indian in America.

Strange as it may seem, everything hinges on a diary notation by a clergyman in Salem, Massachusetts. In the entry for 29 December, 1790, Reverend William Bentley writes: "Had the pleasure of seeing for the first time a native of the Indies from Madras. He is of very dark complection, long black hair, soft countenance, tall and well-proportioned. He is said to be darker than Indians in general of his own caste, being much darker than any native Indians of America. I had no opportunity to judge of his abilities, but his countenance was not expressive. He came to Salem with Capt. J. Gibaut and has been to Europe."

Apparently, the arrival of this Indian in Salem caused as great a sensation as his rediscovery. The 26 December, 1790, entry in the local paper, The Annals of Salem reads: "Capt. John Gibaut arrived from India. He brought with him a native of Madras, who excited much curiosity." The rest of the story comes from the log-book of the American brigantine Henry. This ship had picked up our friend from Madras and delivered him to the shores of Salem, Massachusetts.

Those were the early days of Yankee trade with India. America offered ice to the sunbaked British in India, along with European wines, silver coins and other civil necessities for the Raj. India offered a stunning variety—spices, indigo, cotton and silk being the major attractions. This trade gave America its first millionaire, Elias Haskett Derby. But Derby never went to sea himself. His sons did. And E.H. Derby Jr was in charge of the Henry.

According to Captain Benjamin Crowninshield's log-book records, the Henry sailed from Madras on 21 March 1790: "At 2.00 pm Mr Derby and Mr Smith and Mr Gibaut and servant came on board. At 3.00 pm weighed anchor on Madras roads." Derby Jr had found a virgin field for American commerce. And John Gibaut had found a servant.

The rest is speculation. This Indian's name, birth, death, place of origin, function and family life are shrouded in mystery, and the 'man from Madras' remains an obscure object of celebration on the one hand, and a faceless servant on the other.

But Susan Bean, curator of the Peabody Museum of Salem, throws a little more light on the subject. "In Derby's Madras accounts we come across a servant called 'Dada'," says Bean. "Since 'Dada' in India is a term of respect, it is possible that he wasn't just any other servant. This was probably the Madrasee who came to Salem with Gibaut. His wages, too, were twice those of the 'Derwanee' and 'Mattronee' also named in the accounts."

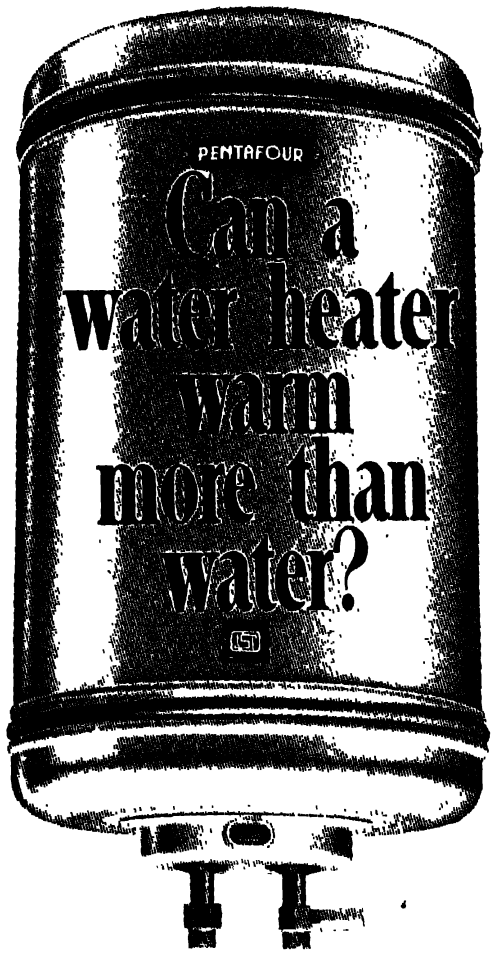
William Lamoy, archivist of the Essex Institute of Salem, shares Bean's view. "Only one of the individuals named in the accounts is clearly defined as to his function," explains Lamoy. "Dada is described as the butler to Elias Haskett Derby Jr. He is the most likely of the servants to have made the journey to Salem."

Dada cannot be traced beyond Salem, though. "He probably left for the East on the ship Astrea with Gibaut, on 17 May, 1791," says Tapan Mukherjee. A top official of the National Science Foundation, Washington DC, Mukherjee has done a good deal of research on early Indo-American links. "But it is terribly difficult to track down Indian immigrants who came before 1900," he admits. "Because of the Hindu socio-religious strictures, crossing the kalapani was considered extremely inauspicious. Thus, the early arrivals were usually Christians and their names are lost among all the Christian names in available American records."

But was this Madras man the first Indian in America? Mukherjee gives a whole list of people who had been to America before him, complete with name, age, date of arrival and period of bondage (these were indentured servants). The earliest seems to be John Adams, 17, indentured in England for Maryland, America, on 27 January, 1719. Yet, with no details of Gibaut's servant, no trace of his lineage, no sub-culture of the early Indians in America, there is still this urge to celebrate the date a Salem clergyman first saw an Asian Indian, as the bicentennial of the Indian presence in America.

"This is mainly to perpetuate an awareness of Indians as citizens of this country and contributors to this society," says Achamma Chanderasekaran, president of the IAFPE. "We are trying to change the image of Indians as newcomers. Indians have been settled here for ages and it is time we established our rights." The fight is against the 'new immigrant' stigma that Indians seem doomed to bear. And in this struggle for equal treatment, establishing the presence of Indians in 18th century America does help. At the initiative of Joy Cherian, founder of the IAFPE and member of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in Washington, research on early immigrants is in full swing.

But not all Indians in America are thrilled. "Why is it important to prove that Indians are not new immigrants?" asks Ratnabali Day, a primary schoolteacher in Washington. Partha Sengupta, a graduate student at the University of Maryland, seems pretty annoyed: "How would it help to establish that Indians are not new immigrants who have come to the US on their own merit, out of choice, but have actually been around for centuries, having been dragged over as slaves or thereabouts?" An undergraduate at Harvard, Nandana Dev is slightly amused: "This desire to prove a hazy pedigree sprouting from one traceless servant is rather odd." And ninth-grader Indrani Sen flashes an embarrassed smile: "A slave, was he?"



Unlike African Americans, reared in a sub-culture based on an awareness of centuries of racial exploitation, Indians in America—mostly students, doctors, well-paid white collar workers or private businessmen—cannot claim such a race-history. Today they are happily aware of having the highest per capita income among immigrants. They pride themselves on being the lucky ones who passed strict immigration laws to escape from the Third World into the First by talent and sheer grit. Thus, this bicentennial celebration might seem a bit incongruous.

"But this is a question of our roots," says Tapan Mukherjee. Maybe. But roots that have not formed branches, fruits or flowers. There is no record of those isolated labourers, who probably got assimilated in the Black community in those days of segregation. No family can trace back to them, nor can any sub-culture. Unlike the Afro-Americans, these Indians do not have a race identity enriched in any way by those uprooted Indians lost in a foreign land centuries ago.

Nevertheless, the celebrations are on. Were on, rather. With the IAFPE's sudden silence, one is not quite sure whether or not to expect a bicentennial bash on 29 December. The coordinator of the programme, J.John Wycliff, has been keeping a low profile for a while. But there are quite a few enthusiasts waiting for the merry-making. Whether one calls it the Brown man's salute to the White, or just romantic nostalgia, is quite beside the point. •

A landmark judgement

The Calcutta High Court rules against solitary confinement

It is a landmark judgement that could well bring about a transformation in the status of condemned prisoners. On 15 November, a division bench of the Calcutta High Court comprising Justices Sumsuddin and Amal Kanti Bhattacharya ruled that prison authorities had no right to keep prisoners on whom death sentence had been pronounced in condemned cells—away from the other jailmates in solitary confinement.

This is, of course, not the first time that the courts have come down heavily on solitary confinement. In the celebrated Sunil Batra vs the Delhi administration case in 1978, Justice Desai had ruled that the provisions of the Prison Act do not allow the authorities to impose solitary confinement upon a condemned prisoner. It may be recalled that Batra was sentenced to death by a sessions court and was kept in one of the condemned cells of the Tihar Jail.

Twelve years later, came the judgement of the Calcutta High Court. And, along the same lines. It all began with the Alipur sessions court sentencing two youths, Anup Biswas and Prasenjit Tapadar, to death. They were removed to the Alipur Central Jail and lodged in condemned cells since 17 September 1990. Anup and Prasenjit went in appeal to the Calcutta High Court which admitted their petitions.

But before the appeal could be heard, another petition challenging their solitary confinement was moved by three senior lawyers, Balai Ray, Sekhar Bose and Dilip Dutta. Citing the precedent of the Sunil Batra case, they argued that sub-section 2 of Section 30 of the Prison Act—which deals with solitary confinement—violates the provisions of Article 20 and 21 of the Constitution. So, the detention of Anup and Prasenjit in condemned cells pending the final determination of their crime by a higher court was illegal. Balai Ray told SUNDAY, "Psychopathological expert Mr Chitley had observed in Sunil Batra's case that such retributive punishment has had its detrimental effect which can cause insanity."

Justices Sumsuddin and Amal Bhattacharya, while delivering the judgement, observed that solitary confinement of condemned prisoners was not only a gross violation of constitutional protection of life and liberty of an individual "but also a violation of constitutional guarantee of a single punishment for a single offence". The judges said that "solitary confinement is itself a punishment and the imposing of such punishment upon a person with death sentence tantamounts to double jeopardy for a single offence." The court also rejected the prosecution's prayer for an appeal and ordered Alipur Jail officials to shift Anup and Prasenjit to general cells.

The ruling of the divisional bench was made known to the jail authorities on 15 November itself. Yet, nothing was done and Anup and Prasenjit continued to languish in the condemned cells. Defence lawyer Shyamal Banerjee made one more effort to wake up the prison authorities. On 19 November, Banerjee sent a letter to the Alipur Jail superintendent, reminding him of the High Court's order. Said an agitated Sekhar Bose, "Our intention is to let everyone know that the Alipur Jail authorities have scant respect for court orders."

The legal implications apart, the lawyers have a point. For, a sentence pronounced on the accused by a lower court does not indicate that the trial is over. For, the accused still has the option of appealing against the judgement in the High and Supreme Courts. And, in the case of death sentences, the accused can even appeal to the President for clemency as a final resort. Thus, argued the lawyers on behalf of Anup and Prasenjit, it would be unfair to detain them in condemned cells because the judgement in their case was pronounced only by a sessions court.

But the jail authorities seem to be unmoved. For Anup and Prasenjit, it is a living hell. The cells where they are lodged are dank, and even the bare essentials are denied to them. But both the youths have not given up hope. They wait patiently for justice.

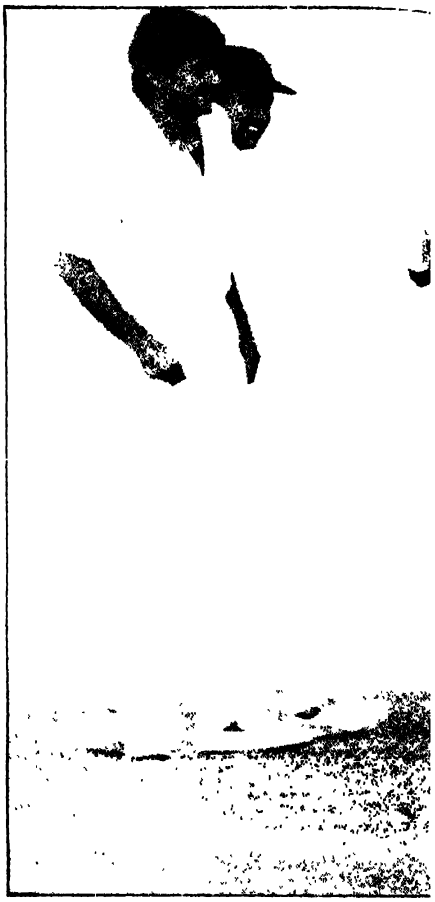
WASHOUT!

The Pakistani cricket team calls off its tour of India

Whatever one may have to say against Imran Khan, one can never accuse him of talking through his hat. When he said, early this month, that the law and order situation in India could jeopardise Pakistan's tour at the turn of the year, sceptics thought he was just shooting his mouth off. The fact of the matter is, when Imran speaks on cricket, Pakistan listens. In this case, the secretary of the Board of Control for Cricket in Pakistan (BCCP), heeding his advice, wrote to its counterpart in India to postpone the tour, "until the situation there improves".

This postponement comes in the wake of the cancellation of the tour albeit short of the West Indies team, which was to have played limited overs matches after the conclusion of their trip to Pakistan. The Board of Control for Cricket in India (BCCI) had even proposed a three-way competition, with Sri Lanka forming the third peg.

Pakistan was to have taken part in the Asia Cup competition along with India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh. This tournament was originally scheduled to be held in Pakistan. When they declined the offer, Bangladesh tried to stage it, but due to India's objection, it was "transferred" to this country. So, midway through this year, there were great prospects of an exciting season at the year-end. Ultimately, one Test and three one-dayers against Sri Lanka, is all that cricket-lovers are likely to get.



Likely, because at the time of going to press, the BCCI was making desperate attempts to salvage the Asia Cup and the full, five-Test series with Pakistan. Officials were frantically trying to use the good offices of the external affairs ministry in allaying the fears of the BCCP about the security of its players. But this is not likely to succeed because it is not in Pakistan's interest to get on with the game at this stage.

The BCCP secretary, Arif Abbasi, wrote to BCCI secretary [illegible] saying: "Due to public opinion in the country and the situation being what it is in India, one wonders whether for the sake of maintaining our good relations, would it not be pertinent to postpone the commitment to a date which would be more conducive to such important events." His suggestion was that fresh dates could be discussed after the World Cup in Australia/New Zealand in 1991-92. Of course, more to assuage feelings here than to really mean it, Abbasi added that if the situation improved, "perhaps we can come to India at an earlier date".

But with the present thinking in Pakistan, it is highly unlikely that the Pakistanis would come to India in the near future. This makes the Asia Cup a second-grade tournament—if it is held at all—for the third time running. The first Asia Cup in 1984 went off smoothly. But from the next, held two years later in Sri Lanka, there have been continuous problems. The 1986 tournament had just Pakistan and Sri Lanka as contestants. The next one in Bangladesh was postponed once and then held amidst terrible natural calamities.

The fourth, cleared by the central government early in December, was to have been held between Christmas Day and 3 January 1991. Now, with Pakistan withdrawing, there are three teams in the fray, making the competition a lack-lustre affair, if it is held at all.

With the withdrawal of Pakistan, the Asia Cup competition will be a lack-lustre affair, if it is held at all. Thus, the prospects of an exciting season of cricket have come to an end

And, India certainly cannot complain about Pakistan's withdrawal. India had done just that when the second competition was held in Sri Lanka. The ethnic conflict in that country was the reason cited by India, while withdrawing from the three-team competition. And India withdrew at the last moment, just as Pakistan has done this time. The reasons cited by Pakistan are the same as those given by India to hosts Sri Lanka four years ago.

But present indications are that the Asia Cup will have to be held within the teams left in the fray. The Asian Cricket Conference secretary, Tanvir Islam, said in Dhaka that, "as far as the ACC is concerned, it is perfectly alright if only three teams take part in the competition. As of now, there's absolutely no question of postponement (of the tournament)."

But if he did leave an escape route open for India, which the hosts may now prefer to take, considering that there would be little interest in the competition with just Sri Lanka and

(Above) The last Asia Cup competition held in Bangladesh in 1988: jubilant Indians; Imran Khan and Jagmohan Dalmiya (right): managing contradictions

Bangladesh facing India. The ACC secretary said: "It will, of course, be a different matter if, for non-cricketing reasons, India is not able to host the tournament."

So, in one stroke, the entire season of international cricket in this country, was written off. For, the BCCP letter is merely a gentlemanly way of telling India that the tour was definitely off. The "situation" referred to is the communal disturbance that has erupted in different parts of the country. It is another matter that the simultaneous outbreak of violence of this nature could very well have been engineered by agents provocateurs from across the border. What is tangible is the loss of entertainment for millions this winter.

Actually, this cancellation was on the cards for a long time. When the World Cup boxing was in full swing at the Bombay Gymkhana, the president of the world amateur boxing body, Prof. Anwar Choudhury, expressed his doubts about the cricket tour coming off. Although it was an adjunct to his excuse for the absence of the Pakistani boxing squad, it was a clear expression of Pakistan's thinking. And he said it in early November, which means the decision to call off the tour had been taken privately a long time ago. And, in all probability, it was taken by Imran Khan because he is the last word in Pak cricket.

Apparently, there was a lot of discussion over first, the Ayodhya incidents and then, their repercussions in different parts of the country. Pakistan's Prime Minister, Nawaz Sharif, and his Islamic Democratic Alliance overwhelmingly voted against a cricket tour. Although, this was more because of the political implications of sending a Pakistani team in the face of the country's official barrage against communal riots (never mind the fact that Pakistan dispensed with the problem in this sphere by destroying temples in both west and erstwhile East Pakistan), the reason cited by the BCCP is the risk the players will face in playing during the disturbances.

The irony of the situation here in India was the pronouncement by the BCCI secretary, Jagmohan Dalmiya, that the Pak tour of India was "definitely on" even as his counterpart in Pakistan was sending a letter requesting postponement of the tour. Worse, the Cricket Association of Bengal (CAB), had a full-fledged meeting on the very day Pakistan's decision was known, to finalise the ticket rates for the two Asia Cup matches scheduled for Calcutta. The round-robin league match between Sri Lanka and Bangladesh was to be held on the last day of the year and the final on 3 January next year.

"I have spoken to my Pakistani counterpart over telephone (on 10 December) and I had no indication from them (BCCP) of their having second thoughts on the tour," he said. Of course, he did add, "However, I cannot say if something unforeseen happens." Actually, it was not unforeseen, especially if one goes by what Anwar Choudhury had said over a month ago.

The dialogue between the two secretaries covered the itinerary, with Arif Abbasi suggesting certain changes of venues. In fact, the police authorities in Hyderabad, one of the cities in Pakistan's tour, had withdrawn the clearance it had given earlier for the match in the city. Naturally, a change of venue was on the cards.

Now, of course, all that has changed. Ticket rates for the Asia Cup will have to be drastically scaled down and the venues re-allotted.

But the saddest person in India today must be Gundappa Vishwanath. After a great deal of preparation, he had almost finalised his benefit match at the Eden Gardens, with Indian and Pakistani players. ●

Jute couture

It is emerging as the fashion fabric of the Nineties

Jute for cordage, jute for carpet backing, jute for packaging and now, jute for fashion. Invariably dismissed as sackcloth, jute will soon emerge as the fashion fabric of the Nineties. At least, if the Jute Manufacturers Development Council (JMDC) has its way. Entrusted with the responsibility of rejuvenating the fast-dying industry, the JMDC has identified product diversification as a thrust area. And priority has been given to introducing jute into the charmed world of fashion, in the hope that haute couture may be the answer to the fall in demand, what with synthetics taking over the packaging market.

JUTE FOR FASHION

Jute is bound to catch on in the fashion market. It has that comfortable look. If used with suitable embroidery, applique work and other accessories, the new item will be quite unique

Hence, the series of fashion shows in Bangalore, Delhi and Calcutta to introduce what is certainly a revolutionary change in the world of design and familiarise prospective consumers with the fabric and the things that can be done with it.

In Calcutta, the fashion show, choreographed by Shyamolie Verma and presented by the JDMC in collaboration with the National Institute of Fashion Technology (NIFT), with Prasad Bidapa of the Design and Print Group overseeing proceedings, was the highlight of a two-day conference on jute. Collections of seven NIFT designers were on show at the Taj Bengal before a capacity audience of approximately 400. City suits, waistcoats, jackets, skirts, dresses, salwar kameez sets, and men's ethnic wear were included in the display, with the emphasis on block prints and fabric paints. Prasad Bidapa's External Affairs, Sushanta Kumar Das' Paat Paridhan and Nikhil Kapoor's Form and Formality went down particularly well with the audience. Chetna Bhat's experiment with the comma motif in her shawls and drapes and Ranjan Sengupta's generous borrowing from the Japanese kimono concept were also appreciated.

The outfits, modelled by 15 models from Delhi, Calcutta and Bangalore were predominantly white or beige with bold red and black geometric prints. The kurtas, according to Wilma Machaya of the Designer and Print Group, required as much as eight metres of cloth for achieving the right effect.

According to G.K. Roy Chowdhury of the JMDC, the fabric is bound to catch on in the fashion market. "Jute has that comfortable look," he says. "If used with suitable embroidery, applique work and other accessories, the new item will be quite unique and click in a big way with those who prefer natural fabric." And once it has been introduced in the home market, tapping export potential will be the next priority.

Prasad Bidapa agrees, maintaining that jute will ride on the khadi wave to make a place for itself in the fashion scene. Calcutta artist and designer Goshto Kumar wasn't too impressed by what he saw at the Taj, insisting that the designs were largely repetitive.

Others in the audience were more appreciative, however. Said one socialite: "We came here expecting to see sacks on show but instead were treated to such beautiful outfits that I wouldn't mind paying a fortune for it."

The show lasted 45 minutes at the banquet terrace of the hotel. With good music, informative commentary, photo-slides and a suitable ambience, it was without a doubt the best debutante ball the golden fabric could have hoped for. "The only grievance against my organisation," says an amused Bidapa., "was that the show began on time."●

ODDS AND TRENDS

Ghost teachers?

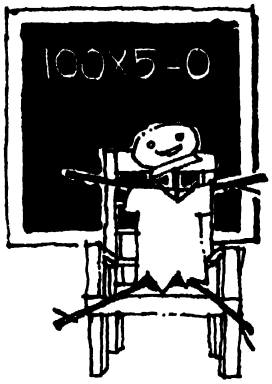

ILLUSTRATION BY ANJU ROY

■ Anything can happen in Bihar. Recently, about 500 secondary teachers were appointed to posts that do not exist by the state government. Revealing this, Shatrughan Prasad Singh, general secretary of the Bihar Madhyamik Sikshak Sangh, added that many of the posts were for subjects not taught in schools.

Citing examples to substantiate his charge, he claimed that a large number of Maithili teachers were asked to work in the tribal areas of south Bihar where the subject has never been offered. Others were commissioned to teach ancient history, a subject which is only taught at the higher secondary level.

Seems like the government is all set for an illiteracy drive!

Coming alive

■ The West came as a saviour. At least to the Kalamkari, the school of painting that once flourished under feudal patronage.

Western interest is now sustaining the only family in Tamil Nadu that has kept the Kalamkari tradition alive. Emberumal, the maestro from Tanjore, shot into fame after visualising the Seoul Olympics mascot 'Hodori' in the Kalamkari style.

Apart from 'Hodori', Emberumal has to his credit tantric and metrical designs and symbols in Kalamkari style.

And that is not all. His paintings found a place in the Festival of India in Moscow and he says that "though there is a gradual decline in the royal patronage, the art is hoping for a revival."

Heart to heart...

■ Another chapter in India-Pakistan relations. Until recently, a poor vendor from Karachi had accepted the fact that his son, who was suffering from a complex heart ailment, was destined to die. But then there came along Dr K.M. Cherian, director, Madras Medical Mission, and honorary surgeon to President R. Venkataraman, to save the child.

The doctor performed the necessary paediatric heart surgery free of cost. "Ten per cent of the surgeries in the mission are free for the totally poor", says Cherian.

Both father and son are delighted. "What the heart speaks matters for me," says the beaming father.

STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—ARIES

A Scorpio woman, with fixed ideas and a strong need for security, cannot in general find fulfilment in a partnership with an Aries man, who will not understand and will be impatient of her unrelenting moods and unforgiving nature.

One good turn...

The Tau may have dropped out of newspaper headlines, but his abilities as a fixer are as sharp as ever.

Not only did the deputy prime minister manage to get his protégé S.K. 'Chappie' Mishra into the PMO, he also wangled a prestigious job for T.N. Seshan.

Yes, contrary to popular perceptions, it wasn't the Congress which got Seshan

T.N. Seshan: the Tau looks after his own appointed as chief election commissioner, but Chaudhary Devi Lal. Evidently, when the Tau had been sacked by V.P. Singh, Seshan had proved to be a friend in need, providing Lal with inside information on various matters of state. The senior bureaucrat has also visited Lal and Shekhar at home while the dissidence drama raged, hiding his face in the folds of a shawl to escape being seen by mediapersons.

And now a duly grateful Chaudhary had returned the favour by getting him made the CEC.

Coffee House camaraderie

If the Raja clung to his Allahabad aristocracy, Chandra Shekhar intends to prove true to his coffee house compatriots.

During V.P. Singh's tenure in South Block, only bureaucrats from the Uttar Pradesh cadre in general and Allahabad in particular were regarded as being of consequence. Not only did they get prize posts almost effortlessly, promotions also came of their accord.

HEARD AT NORTH BLOCK

In most governments, ministers make the policy and bureaucrats deal with cases. In this government, the bureaucrats make the policy but the ministers like to deal with the cases.

A SENIOR CIVIL SERVANT

Chandra Shekhar's accession to power changed all that. For the bearded baba of Ballia decided on rewarding all those he'd chatted up at the Lucknow Coffee House for years altogether. The first coffee companion to gain from the Prime Minister's resolution was Markandeya Singh, recently-appointed Lieutenant Governor of Delhi after the resignation of Air Chief Marshall (retired) Arjan Singh.

And soon other members of the coffee brigade will be in clover as well.

THERMOMETER

Dr Sanjay Singh's friends—and enemies

- Chandra Shekhar: Despite the reservations of certain sections of his party and the Congress(I), Shekhar appointed Sanjay Singh to the ministry. The Prime Minister maintained that Singh had been let off by the court, so there was no justification in keeping him out on the issue of his alleged involvement in the Syed Modi murder case

- Mulayam Singh Yadav: In the perception of the public, Sanjay Singh was always the Raja's man But the perpetually smirking prince of Amethi, in fact, owed primary allegiance to Mulayam Singh Yadav, who'd also got him a seat in the Rajya Sabha. And now that the communications minister is in a bit of spot, the UP CM has taken on the responsibility of ensuring that he stays. It is, of course, another matter that Yadav's own position in his state is less than secure.

- Captain Satish Sharma: Ever since the last election in Amethi, where Sanjay Singh and the good Captain found themselves in opposing camps, Satish Sharma has been looking for an opportunity to knife Singh in the back. And what better way to do it than lobby for his removal from the ministry now that the government has gone in appeal in the Modi case.

- Chaudhary Devi Lal: His animosity against Sanjay Singh is no secret. Even when Singh was a favourite in the Raja's durbar, the Tau derided him at every turn. He is now trying his best to get him removed from the post of communications minister. But Shekhar refuses to give in to his pressure tactics.

- Subramaniam Swamy: Political observers feel that Swamy, as law minister, could have refused to go in appeal in the Syed Modi case. And the fact that he has chosen to put his ministerial colleague in an embarrassing position only means that he is against Singh's continuance in office.

Facts about figures

If Arun Nehru's around, Arif Mohammad Khan can't be far behind. This simple law of Janata Dal politics has never failed before. So, it was quite a surprise when Arif Mohammad turned up at Ram Dhan's house to begin an indefinite fast to protest against the wave of communal violence in the country, and AKN was nowhere in evidence. Enquiries revealed that the former commerce minister was in London, and it wasn't long before observers had begun joking about how Nehru didn't want to risk losing his impressive figure in any such exercise.

Arif Mohammad Khan: but where is Arun Nehru?

Dal spokesman Jaipal Reddy was also in for some embarrassing questions at his press briefing, with reporters asking him to request Nehru to fast along with Arif. It would do AKN's health good, suggested assembled hacks.

Pride and prejudice

His views on economics have always been regarded as being of Fifties vintage. Small wonder than that Chandra Shekhar didn't have much time for the Montek Singh Ahluwalias of the world, regarding them as members of the much-abhorred World Bank lobby.

But the Prime Minister seemed to be carrying his prejudice– and opposition to the industrial policy - too far when he refused to make Ahluwalia commerce secretary.

Thankfully, good sense and Subramaniam Swamy's arguments in the bureaucrat's favour prevailed. The commerce minister convinced Shekhar that with his knowledge of the export-import market, Montek Singh would be the ideal choice.

And the Prime Minister relented, though against his better judgement.

Image problems

Ever since the Janata Dal(S) government assumed office, the security phalanx around Rajiv Gandhi has been strengthened But strangely enough, the Congress president has taken kindly to what may be best described as a good-will gesture on the part of Chandra Shekhar. Rajiv, apparently, feels that there are too many sten guns in his vicinity, they will damage his image far more than they will any prospective assassin.

These days, therefore, whenever Gandhi sees an policeman deployed to protect him, he loses his proverbially short temper. "What are you doing here?" asks Rajiv in his most peremptory manner, while the cops beat a hasty retreat in the face of his obvious ange

But Rajiv doesn't stop at that. He follows them for a distance of as much as 300-400 yards to ensure that they have really left, and are not hiding behind the nearest tree.

Only then does Gandhi, image intact, revert back to the charming man of the people mode.

HEARD AT 24 AKBAR ROAD

Chandra Shekhar's idea of fairness is that if Mulayam Singh has to step down as CM because of riots, then he'll bring him to Delhi and make him home minister in charge of the whole country's law and order.

A CONGRESS MP

Rajiv Gandhi: gunning for security men

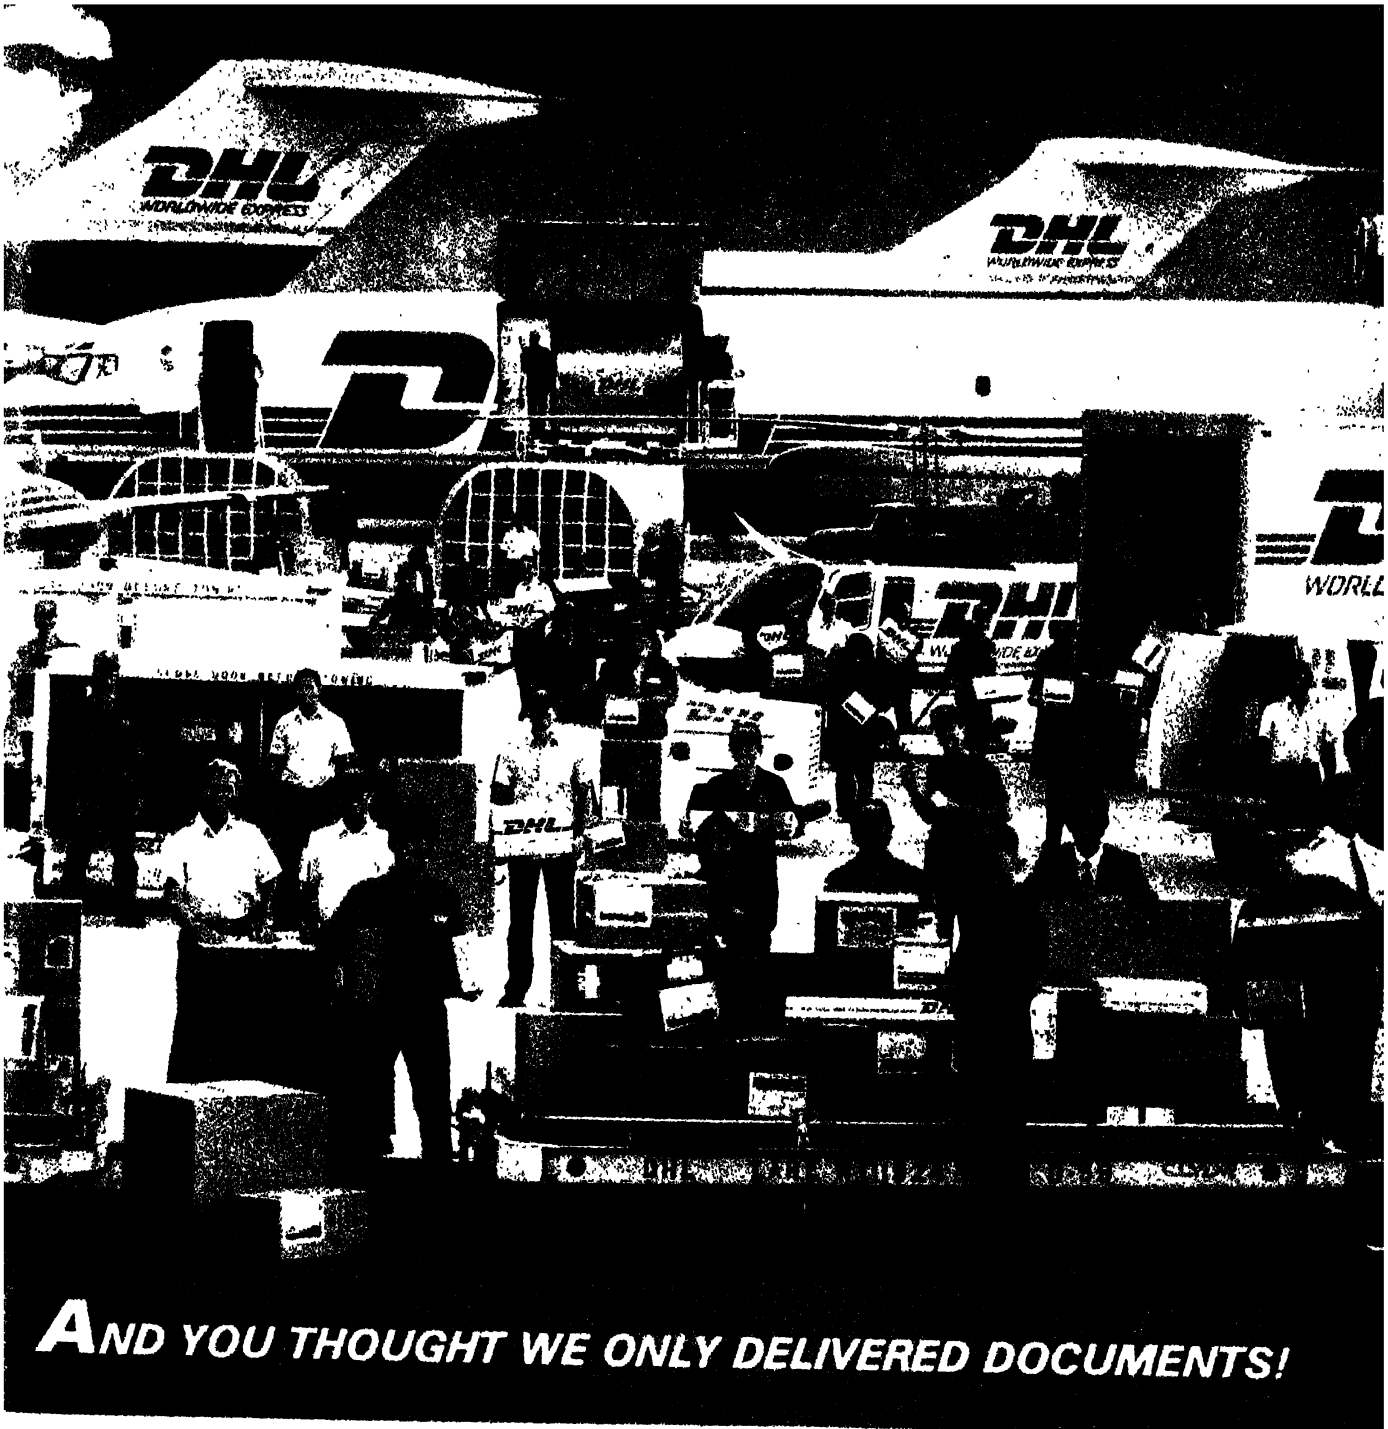
C H E C K – L I S T

State Governors: the great survivors

- Khurshid Alam Khan: Appointed Governor of Goa by Rajiv Gandhi, Khan survived all through the Raja's regime, perhaps because V.P. Singh did not want to fire any Muslim. Shekhar has also kept him on and with the imposition of President's Rule in the state, Khan has become an important figure
- Chintamani Panigrahi: Another Rajiv Gandhi appointee, the Manipur Governor went along with V.P Singh on the issue of the change in the state government. Naturally, the Raja retained his services Taken by his obliging nature, perhaps, Chandra Shekhar has also decided against firing him
- Dr Swarup Singh: Despite being a relative of Ajit Singh, he has maintained close ties with Chaudhary Devi Lal. His Haryana connections have now paid off, with Dr Swarup Singh being given charge of Gujarat rather than the less-important Kerala.
- Surjit Singh Barnala: V P Singh appointed him to the Tamil Nadu governorship for being an Akali leader obviously, has its advantages when Shekhar is Prime Minister, for Barnala stays, with additional charge of Andaman and Nicobar islands.
- Mahmood Ali: Governor of Madhya Pradesh, he has been a good friend of Chandra Shekhar since his Socialist Party days. And knowing the PM's well-developed sense of loyalty, there is little doubt that he'll stay in office

Shekhar knows best

Never mind the rumours. The Congress doesn't really get its way when it comes to appointing people to crucial posts.



The Punjab governorship, for instance. The party was very keen that either General K.V. Krishna Rao or General Hoon be appointed in Veerendra Verma's stead, for it was considered that only someone from the army could get the situation under control. But it was O.P. Malhotra who got the nod, despite the Congress deriding him as a soft-liner.

O.P. Malhotra: soft-liner?

Apparently, while Krishna Rao declined the offer, maintaining that he could only work with Rajiv Gandhi, Hoon's name was scratched off the list by Chandra Shekhar, in a brave show of independence.

The Congress, however, has already begun a campaign to the effect that Malhotra will prove to be another Nirmal Mukarji (read disaster). It remains to be seen if Shekhar will take the hint.
